THE TRAGEDY OF DISARMAMENT

TWO PROMISES AND THEIR FATE

"The Members of the League recognise that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments...."

"In order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations, Germany undertakes to" disarm.

"The representatives of the Governments here represented declare their firm conviction that the entry into force of these Treaties and Agreements will contribute in a high degree to induce a moral relaxation of tension between the nations and, by consolidating peace and security in Europe, will prove an effective means of accelerating the disarmament contemplated in Article 8 of the Covenant of the League."

"They undertake to co-operate sincerely in the work of disarmament, and to endeavour to give practical effect to the same."

So ran Article 8 of the Covenant of the League. So ran the Introduction to the Locarno Treaties. So ran the condition precedent to the fulfilment of these two pronouncements.

The condition precedent was fulfilled; but the two pronouncements remained empty words. Why?

One's thoughts stray backward to a day just five years ago—February 2nd 1932.

On that day, to the solemn accompaniment of church bells pealing in the League of Nations city, Geneva, the doors of the Disarmament Conference—after how many delays, how many postponements—were at length thrown wide to the accompaniment of the wishes, hopes and prayers of the peoples in every country. Appeals beyond number were received from millions and millions of petitioners, organisations of mothers, wives, former front-fighters, war invalids, war mutilated, war prisoners, war widows and orphans, organisations of all professions, churches and youth associations, all clamouring passionately, threateningly, beseechingly, pitifully, hopefully, warningly for Disarmament, Disarmament, Disarmament. Ten millions of these petitions were on view conspicuously in the glass cupboards of the Lobby to the rooms where the Conference met; and every day the Delegates of the 64 nations which took part in the Conference passed them by as they crossed the Lobby on their way to the meetings. "A cry for peace rises to our ears, and must be heard!" In these words the Head of the Belgian Delegation, Premier Hymans, summed up the message of all these manifestations.

The cry was not heard. Bare and deserted, the famous glass house in which the Conference met now stands, a sight for curious tourists; and somewhere in the new Palace of the League the ten million Petitions lie packed in bundles, unheeded, forgotten. Yellowing papers, thick with dust! Accusing papers! Silent witnesses against those who came to the Conference with the high hymn of peace and disarmament on their lips and their armour on their backs, to prove to the world how easy it is to attend a Disarmament Conference without putting off one's armour first.

Search the no less yellowed pages of the records of the Conference, and you find the history of the greatest illusion the world has ever known. But it was an illusion which had power to hold the nations after the War under its spell. It came to them as a legacy from the millions of the fallen, a sacred trust inscribed after the catastrophe in the Paris Peace Treaties and sealed by the Covenant of the League. But the power of its appeal to those who had emerged from the War was not sufficient to give it that overwhelming momentum which was needed to sweep aside all obstacles. The force of the ideal was shattered by the attempts to give it practical shape and form—a form which would allow the highly armed countries to keep their armaments and even increase them, without allowing the disarmed countries any appreciable improvement of their means of defence.

The focal point of the struggle for disarmament was the conflict between highly armed France and disarmed Germany—on the one hand the fight by Germany for equality of rights and fulfilment of the promises to disarm which were made in 1919, and on the other hand the French thesis of security and all that diabolical dialectic which hovered between "disarmament" and "security" and forms of words left purposely in the vague, intended as they were, not for the attainment of peace or disarmament, but for the maintenance of the status quo established by the Treaties of 1919.

All the world knows how the conflict ended. Refusal to recognise the German claims of July 23rd 1932 led to the withdrawal of Germany from the Conference, and subsequently on October 14th 1933—after continual departures from the principle of equality of rights laid down in the declaration of the Five Governments on December 11th 1932—to the final abandonment by Germany of both the Conference and the League.

The path of Disarmament narrowed as the path of Security widened. "The reports of disarmament are becoming rarer and rarer and shorter and shorter," wrote Mussolini at the time, "while the news of fresh armaments on land, at sea and in the air are every day fuller and more frequent." An exact picture of the endless discussions which were proceeding at Geneva! And all the while the Powers with France at their head were busy arming and straining every effort; and the purpose of their efforts was not merely to retain the independent position which their armaments enjoyed—politically, they were free to arm as they pleased without reference to others, and technically they had the necessary plant and equipment to do so—but also to conclude ententes and military alliances and with the aid of these diplomatic combinations, backed by an accumulation of military strength, to hold the presumptive adversary in check. All this, it is hardly necessary to add, in the name of the defence of their threatened security and in the interest of Peace! When at the beginning of 1934 England, Italy, and Germany sought to rescue what was left of Disarmament, half strangled by now under the mountainous mass of documents, the death-blow to the cause was given by the French answer of April 17th. Security had swallowed up Disarmament.

No less a person than the former Premier and present War Minister Daladier described what happened from that moment onwards in the following words, in a speech delivered by him at a Radical-Socialist demonstration at Bauge on March 15th 1936: "The famous Note of April 17th 1934 threw over a logical and just Plan for equal, simultaneous and effectively controlled disarmament, which would have made it possible for Europe to inaugurate a new order without endangering the true interests of France, but on the contrary defending and protecting them." That sentence places the responsibility where the responsibility lies. The events that followed—the restoration of German Defence sovereignty on March 16th 1935, the Defence Law of May 21st 1935, and the so-called German rearmament—were no more than milestones on the retreat from an enterprise, the legal basis of which had been shattered by that Note. It was only logical that Germany should arm to catch up the others, to make good the damage done by 15 years of one-sided disarmament in a world of heavily armed neighbours—an eleventh hour effort to bring the German armaments up to the level of those Powers who were not prepared to fulfil their obligations or allow the crushing superiority they enjoyed to be one whit diminished.

Of the mighty stream of Hope and Faith on which the idea of Disarmament was borne when the Conference opened at the beginning of 1932, there remained only a tiny runnel of water which was in the end lost in the wilderness of disillusionment, mistrust and efforts to consolidate existing hegemonies. The world of ideas in which Disarmament had lived and moved and had its being was shattered; and, in place of disarming, the world began to rearm. The system of security which the League was to have established brought no security. The Disarmament Conference had been its great effort to establish security. When that failed, its place was taken by Rearmament. The very countries which had given it to be understood at the Conference that they were prepared to accept restrictions of what they had hitherto cherished as the most sacred function of their sovereignty, the right to determine their own armaments, were now at pains to assert their sovereign right more vigorously than ever and to lay down the measure of what they considered adequate protection of their national security.

It was no fault of Germany's. Over and above the full and complete disarmament carried out by her in accordance with the provisions of the Versailles Treaty, she never ceased to make contributions to the cause of Disarmament. Countless proposals were put forward by her, on quantitative and (when that failed) on qualitative disarmament, on the limitation and (when that failed) on the stabilisation of armaments, on the prohibition of aggressive weapons and (when that failed) on the limitation of their use, on the humanisation of war, on the localisation of war, on the elimination of war for an initial period of 25 years. Perhaps the greatest irony in the whole story of Disarmament is the fact that the country to which even to-day the blame for the failure of the efforts made is often ascribed was responsible for the initiative which led to the negotiation of the only instrument of disarmament that ever actually emerged from the discussions—the Anglo-German Naval Agreement!

Thus it was that the idea which had moved the world, the idea of consolidating universal peace by universal disarmament, withered and wasted and was found wanting. There remained only the other alternative, the inevitability of which, in the absence of a Convention for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments, Mussolini had throughout endeavoured—unhappily, in vain—to impress upon the Conference, the alternative of ARMAMENTS COMPETITION.

The Pact with Bolshevism

The Alliance and Armaments Bloc: Russia, France and Czecho-Slovakia

Public opinion throughout the world is by now almost unanimous in regarding the Franco-Russian and Czecho-Russian Pacts of mutual assistance of May 1935, and their corollary in the shape of the intrusion of Russian Bolshevism (with the Soviet Union and the Red Army at its back) into the community of European States, as one of the most momentous developments of the post-war period in so far as the efforts of the European community to establish peace and arrive at an agreement in the matter of armaments are concerned.

The attention of all countries is increasingly focussed on the ominous designs of the Soviet Union in the field of international politics. Without exaggeration it may be said that the destructive machinations of the Soviet State organs and the Komintern—operating now separately, now together—are beginning slowly to become apparent even to that section of the world on the shores of the Lake of Geneva which still believes, or has hitherto believed, in the possibility of a “refining process”.

The Temps itself in a pair of articles which it published on October 11th and December 1st 1936 under the impression of events in Spain was compelled to admit—not, of course, without the usual side-hits at Fascism and National Socialism—that “there are all too many indications of the Soviet Russian design to divide Europe into two blocs of powers which are bound in the end to conflict with one another. In spite of all official statements the Moscow Government is profoundly imbued with the revolutionary spirit of pure Communism in its integral form. The present policy of Moscow appears to be to compel the Liberal and democratic Governments of the West of Europe under pressure of the popular masses led by the Communist organisations to take up a position by the side of Soviet Russia in opposition to the authoritarian States....

“There are unhappily all too many indications,” the Temps added, “that the Komintern, which may be called the political armament of the Soviet system, is obstinately set on the attainment of its aims of social disintegration, and is exerting all its strength to prepare for the world revolution—it has indeed no other object, no other raison d'être—and, as a means to world revolution, to prepare for war. Revolution as the prelude to war or war as the prelude to revolution—that is the formula on which Communism has lived and moved and had its being ever since it first made its appearance in the world.”

In No. 138—140 of this periodical on the negotiations for the Eastern Pact we dealt with the previous history of the movement, and predicted that April 17th 1934, the date of the famous Barthou Note, would be found to be at the same time the date of birth of a new Franco-Russian military alliance of the pre-war model with its point directed, now as then, against Germany.

That prognostication was confirmed by the “indiscretion” of Archimbaud, Reporter for the French Defence Estimates, in the French Chamber on November 23rd 1934, when he let fall the remark that the help of the Russian Army had been offered to France in the event of a conflict with Germany. Shortly afterwards the co-operation of France and Soviet Russia was officially announced by the publication of the Protocol drawn up by Laval and Litvinov at Geneva on December 5th 1934. It announced briefly that neither of the two Governments would enter into negotiations with a third party independently or without the consent of the other. The Echo de Paris tore the veil from the face of these undertakings when it observed laconically that “The Agreement guarantees France against a new Rapallo and Russia against the risk of a direct Franco-German understanding”.

We asked at the time, since when a peaceful understanding had been a “risk” and since when a reconciliation of Germany and France had been a “danger”. We added: “The future will show which is the greater risk for Europe—the risk of a Franco-German understanding or the risk of the two Agreements concluded in May 1935 by France and Czecho-Slovakia with the Soviet Union.”

The “future” of which we spoke was not long in coming. A bare two years sufficed to reveal the tragic consequences for the peace of nations which attended the unhappy policy pursued by Barthou, the policy which in deplorable ignorance of German—and, still more, of Soviet—policy was to culminate in the Pact with Bolshevism and the crystallisation of the existing grouping of Powers and Alliances for the maintenance of French security and the repression of Germany.

A general increase of mistrust in Europe was the sequel to this Pact of coalition, the text of which was so drafted as on the surface to come within the framework of the Covenant of the League. From that moment onwards all the plans and proposals of European diplomacy for the settlement of the most burning issues have come to nothing, while all countries have continued to arm at an ever increasing tempo.

* * *

In the meantime it has been conclusively demonstrated that the Soviet Government and international Communism are one and the same thing. The essential unreality of the assurances which the Agreement between Stalin and Laval contained as to the cessation of the underground activities of the Komintern in France, and the disclaimers of world-revolutionary objectives, is bitterly realised by now in France, and by none more than by the French Government itself.

The process of bargaining with Bolshevism which was then introduced has left patent evidence in its trail of the determination of the Soviet rulers to let loose the world revolution and swamp mankind in the flood of levelling and disintegrating Marxist doctrine.

It is no longer a question of a struggle waged—more or less—with intellectual weapons, a struggle in the world of ideas. It is a struggle of current realistic policy, such as Radek foretold some years ago. “Each day,” he wrote, “of the continued existence of the Soviet Union is a great work accomplished for the world revolution. The world revolution is on the march. For the moment it is not accompanied by the movement of flags waving in the breeze or the sound of the guns of the civil war. Budenny is not yet watering his horses in the Rhine, and the Cossacks are not yet fighting in the streets of Paris in support of the French worker. But he who has ears to hear may hear the work of the pioneers of the Revolution.”

In our special number on the Red Army (No. 126-130) we spoke of the revolutionary objectives of the Soviet Union, and explained how the rulers of the Soviet State in their efforts to rearm, and enormously expand, the organisation of their Army invariably regard such rearmament and expansion as the prelude to the world revolution.

The very oath which the conscripts of the Red Army take embodies an obligation to direct all their actions and all their thoughts towards the high object of freeing the workers of the whole world, and to give their strength and their lives to the cause of Socialism (as interpreted by Bolshevism).

The design of making the Red Army the shock brigade of the proletariat of the world has been voiced with increasing frequency in recent years by the rulers of Soviet Russia. Previous quotations in this sense may here be supplemented by additional extracts. They constitute one more proof of the cynical frankness of Soviet military circles.

That Marshal Tukhachevsky is an apt pupil of Lenin's is apparent from his book on “The Red Army and the Militia” in which he proclaims the duty of preparing for the revolutionary war. “One thing is certain,” he writes, “and that is that, if once a Socialist revolution obtains the mastery, it is obviously entitled to extend its sway. It will resort to brute force in order to operate directly in neighbouring countries one after another till it has spread throughout the world. Its most powerful instrument in the process will necessarily be its military strength. Thus we see how necessary it is for the Socialist Revolution to be enabled by means of its Army to undertake offensive operations, first in neighbouring territories the other side of its frontiers, and subsequently, as the course of events may indicate, further afield.” And in another passage he writes: “Can we envisage our military activities as confined within the borders of the Republic? Of course not, for the reason that we have no serious military objectives within the Republic.... Consequently every activity of our Republic must be closely correlated with the objective of the World Revolution; and this is true in the first instance of the organisation of our Red World Army.”

These world-wide aims of the Moscow politicians and statesmen, which are in reality the ultimate objective of all Moscow's policy, were very plainly formulated at the end of 1935 in an appeal broadcast by the Russian wireless on the first anniversary of Kirow's death. The speaker said: “We shall win the whole world to Communism. Our belief is based on the fact that the lever has been created by the Bolsheviks, and it is in the hands of the Party. It is in the hands of Comrade Stalin and many millions of the unconquerable Soviet people." The message is all the more significant in that it emphasises the close connection of the Party and the Government as the guarantee of the fulfilment of the aims in view. In the same sense Stalin in his capacity as Commander-in-Chief of the Red Army is described in the Moscow Press as "Marshal of the Socialist Revolution and Marshal of the Communist movement of the whole human race".

Another symptomatic feature in this connection is a speech of the War Commissary Voroshilov on the subject of the Red Army. He argued that no country would be able to catch up the lead gained by the specially trained parachutist troops of the Red Army, and added: "There are no such countries, and I think I shall not be wrong in saying there never will be, until the power of the Soviets extends to other countries." The conclusion which these remarks suggest is hardly, one would say, that the vast armaments of Russia serve a purely defensive purpose! The same Voroshilov himself said that the enemies of the Soviet Union have no intention of surrendering the field to the Socialist State. Such a conception of the national right of self-determination of other countries is a sufficiently clear indication of how the objectives of the future are visualised. The nature of these objectives was very plainly set forth in a speech delivered by Voroshilov in Kiev on the conclusion of the autumn manoeuvres on the Polish frontier. "The Army and the people must so organise their defence as to be able under all circumstances to beat the enemy on his own territory." In the same speech Voroshilov also made the notable declaration that "We are ready for war, and we propose to wage it on foreign soil".

Similarly Marshal Budenny at a meeting of the Council of Nationalities in January 1936 when he spoke of the division of labour as between the Red Army and international Communism made no attempt to disguise his admission of the fact (to quote his actual words) that "the Red Army is sure of victory for the reason that it has at its side the Komintern of the Bolsheviks, while its leader is Stalin, the leader of the masses of the world's workers, who will lead the army into battle for the victory of the Communist cause".

On this subject of the world revolution as the aim and object of the Soviet State Stetzkyi, the responsible chief officer of the Communist Party in the U.S.S.R., made the following declaration on January 25th 1935: "So long as capitalism continues to exist outside the Soviet borders, our country as the shock brigade of the world proletariat, our Socialist State which is fighting, and will continue to fight, against capitalist encirclement and for the victory of the Socialist world revolution, will assume the dictatorship of the proletariat. One thing, one little thing, we should never forget, when we are thinking of our country's destiny. To fulfil that destiny, the power of the Soviets must prevail throughout the world. To that end it was born."

How right was the Swiss Federal Councillor Motta in his great speech to the Assembly of the League of Nations on September 19th 1934, when he warned the delegates of the dangers attaching to the admission of the Soviet Union to the League in the following words: "The object of Communism is world revolution. Its nature is such, and its will is such, as to force it to conduct propaganda in other countries in support of that object. It is a natural law of its existence that it should seek to spread beyond its own borders. It is denying itself, if it ceases to do so. To be true to itself, it must be the enemy of all, for it threatens us all.... The League of Nations will be embarking on a dangerous enterprise, if it attempts to reconcile fire and water. But the die has been cast."

Once again in his speech of June 10th 1936, on the occasion of the debate in the Swiss National Council on the resumption of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R., Dr. Motta hit the mark, when he said: "Between the Soviet Government and the Communist Party there is a partial identity of personalities and a disconcerting solidarity of ideas and interests. Moscow's influence is everywhere operative. The Third International waves aloft the burning torch in Western Europe, and celebrates the union of Communism and Anarchy in those countries. Moscow's influence works as and where it can; and Communist tactics assume every form and every shade."

The double face of Soviet Russia's Janus head stirred even The Times on one occasion to comment. It was in connection with the Soviet protest in Geneva against the severance of diplomatic relations by Uruguay, when the Russian representative endeavoured to argue that the Komintern and the Soviet Government were independent bodies. The Times then wrote that the assertion of the Soviet Government that it has nothing to do with the Communist International is a masterpiece of legerdemain, if not of shamelessness: This perpetually identical answer to all complaints in regard to the activities in foreign countries of the "Agency for the World Revolution" is as much as to say that Stalin qua Head of the Soviet Government can take no responsibility for the behaviour of Stalin qua leading member of the Executive Committee of the Komintern. To run two businesses under different names, the Times added, one open and above board at a League of Nations Assembly, and the other secret and underground with the purpose of undermining the Governments of other States and remodelling their order of society, is a practice which cannot be reconciled with friendly or honourable relations. The results of international intrigue of this kind cannot well be anything but international mistrust. To plot the crime of civil war and at the same time to profess adherence to the principle of international war is a communist contradiction in terms.

Actually it was the French Press of the Right which wrote of Litvinov's attitude at the end of September 1936 as being tantamount to torpedoing the League of Nations. That was when he had succeeded by his lobbying activities at Geneva (in the matter of allowing the Abyssinian delegation to continue to sit in the Assembly) not merely in keeping Italy once more away from the League, but also in delaying still further the diplomatic conversations on the calling of the Five-Power Conference. It is true, at the Extraordinary Session of the Council at the beginning of December Litvinov's all too transparent game failed; but at any rate he had attempted through the agency of the Spanish Foreign Minister del Vayo—behind whom loomed the shadow of the Ambassador Extraordinary to Madrid, Rosenberg—to exacerbate the divergencies of opinion to such an extent as to induce a "Frente popular" of League diplomatists to give their blessing and recognition to the Bolshevisation of Spain.

If there are any who still believe in the alleged "turning over of a new leaf", the supposed "democratisation" of the Soviet Government and its executive agent, the Komintern, they may be recommended to read the many hundreds of pages on the World Revolution in the Reports of the Seventh World Congress of the Komintern which was held in August 1935. At this Congress the General Staff of the World Revolution issued a new pass-word in regard to the ways and means of overcoming the world's opposition to the blessings of bolshevisation. The delegates were recommended to try the tactics of the "Trojan horse", or (to use a more modern and more Russian metaphor) to try the parachutist tactics of the Red Army—that is to say, to despatch advance troops to do the work of destruction on foreign ground behind the enemy's back. The parachute diplomacy of Litvinov was to prepare the ground for such attack.

And here is the Epilogue to the Eighth Extraordinary Soviet Congress in Moscow from the pen of the representative of the Swiss paper Neue Zürcher Zeitung. He writes on December 13th:

"The idea was that there should be a great profession of faith in the Stalin system, which was to be represented to all observers in and outside Russia as a modern system of government embodying genuine democracy and real freedom in contrast to the 'medieval spirit of the European dictatorships'. And the result? A gigantic public meeting all in the manner of the established Bolshevik propaganda. Not a trace from beginning to end of the Congress of the 'dignity', the 'high tone' which were to have marked the beginning of the 'new era'. The introduction of the new Constitution no less than the abuse of imaginary enemies remained from first to last along the lowest lines of party polemics and petty vituperation. Not once in the course of the torrent of oratory of the past two weeks was it possible to feel that the leaders of Soviet Russia were looking forward, or that they had any conception of the meaning of the words 'democracy' or 'freedom' which they had continuously on their lips. There is no change in the position in Russia. Stalin himself, with the brutality which he has always shown, put an end to all illusions from the outset which may have attached to the announcement of a democratic Constitution, leaving no room for doubt as to the continuance of the dictatorship of the proletariat even under 'the freest Constitution in the world'....

"While on the one hand the results of the discussion of the Stalin Constitution can only be an occasion for disappointment and disgust in presence of so much duplicity, the speeches dealing at the Congress with the foreign policy of Russia leave an impression on the other hand that the Moscow Government does not mean, or know how, to contribute to a genuine relaxation of the international tension, but is on the contrary continuing to lie in wait to spy out the weaknesses of its opponents....

"So the political situation is as it was. Only the military strength of Russia is growing, and leaving its imprint in ever greater measure on the character of the Soviet regime. The fact is that Stalin hopes by means of the Army to consolidate the system and his own personal predominance, and so to keep democracy under, though the name 'Democracy' is good enough to serve him for business purposes."

I. The Red Army

The greatest fighting machine in the world

"The greatest fighting machine in the world!" With this headline the Daily Express on December 8th 1936 introduced its report of the details given by Stalin on the last day of the Eighth Soviet Congress in regard to the rearmament programme of the Red Army. It was no more than the truth.

The Red Army to-day is the most powerful army ever formed in the history of the world. Down to the end of 1934 its peace strength without short service territorials was not more than 562,000 men according to official figures: but its establishment was then raised to 940,000. In fact its strength at the end of each training year, including short service territorials, had for some years past been in the neighbourhood of 1,300,000 men. Under the service system which prevailed down to the end of 1934 there was

- a standing army of cadre troops, representing one-third of the whole, with two years' service, and
- a militia of territorials with a short period of service, representing two-thirds.

But from the beginning of 1935 the position was reserved, and the Army was reorganised as

- a standing army of cadre troops, representing two-thirds of the whole, with two years' service, and
- a militia of territorials with a short period of service, representing one-third.

The transition to the new system is not yet complete. But a Decree issued by the Soviet Government on August 10th 1936 announced that the age of conscription for Soviet nationals liable to military service, which was fixed under the Defence Act of 1930 at 21, would in future be reduced to 19. For the purpose of the transition to the new age, provision was made for the calling up of 1½ years of recruits in each of the next four years. That meant that in the autumn of 1936 the recruits of the year 1914 and half of those of the year 1915 were to be called up: in 1937 the second half of the year 1915 and the whole of the year 1916 were to be called up: in 1938 the whole of the year 1917 and half the year 1918 were to be called up: and in 1939 the second half of the year 1918 and the whole of the year 1919 were to be called up. From 1940 onwards a full year's quota of recruits was to be called up annually. The motive for this Decree cannot have been solely the desire to make good the gaps in the lean War years, as these gaps are by no means the same problem in the Soviet Union—owing to the vast numbers of the population—as they are in other countries; nor is there in fact any reference to this consideration in the Decree itself. Moreover the lowering of the age of conscription does not effect the length of the period of service. This will still be to the 40th year of age, and will in future be divided into the following stages:

- From 19 to 24 with the colours,
- From 25 to 34 with the Reserve, 1st Ban,
- From 35 to 40 with the Reserve, 2nd Ban.

The effect of the Decree of August 10th 1936 will be to bring the peace strength of the Red Army gradually up to something between 1.8 and 2 million men. The conscription of 1½ years of recruits each autumn will enable the Red Army to man the existing cadres of the peace army (hitherto consisting, as to one-third, of short service territorial troops) with men serving their full service. The Defence forces, when the operation of the Decree is complete, will probably consist only of a standing army of cadre troops with two years' service, which will set the territorials at present serving for short periods free for enrolment in reserve formations.

This increase in the numbers of the Red Army gains in significance from the recent statement of Gusjev, a high Soviet official, to the effect that "Socialist upheavals in some West European country may at any moment involve us in a revolutionary offensive war: nor is it out of the question that we may be compelled to initiate a revolutionary war with the object of provoking the revolution in the West—in which case it is essential that our strategy should be of a definitely offensive character."

If these considerations are taken into account—as they unquestionably must be in presence of the sanguinary developments in Spain and the intensification of Soviet machinations in France and other West European countries—the concentrated effort of the Soviet Union's rearmament in the last year and the last year but one acquires new meaning.

The peace organisation of the Red Army at present comprises some 100 Rifle Divisions and (probably) 30 Cavalry Divisions, at least 160 Artillery regiments, a number of Pioneer and Signals formations and a large number of special troops such as Gas formations, Railway troops etc. In addition, there are Corps, Army and Command troops consisting of strong Artillery formations with modern heavy and extra-heavy artillery, and further Pioneer and Signals units, together with special troops at the disposal of the Higher Command. Some 9 to 10 million trained reserves are already available. Theoretically therefore it would be possible in war to mobilise 10 to 11 million men. The recent reduction of the age of conscription will increase the number of available reserves by 1940 by some 2 more million men, bringing the total up to approximately 13 millions.

A further important factor to be taken into account in this connection is the activities of the Komsomol (the Communist Youth Association) and the Osoaviakhim (Association for the Promotion of the Study of Aviation and Chemical Warfare). Both Associations have been responsible for new efforts in the last year and last year but one in connection with the pre-military instruction of the Soviet youth. In compliance with the watch-word of the Fourth World Congress of the Communist Youth International ("Military preparation of the World Revolution and intensification of the United Front agitation") the education of the young in the purely military sense has been carried vigorously forward. What is true of the Komsomol is equally true of the Osoaviakhim. The latter's activities include training of young persons before they are called up to active military service, training of persons not called up, organisation of Air and Gas Defence societies, training of airmen, parachutists, cavalymen, artillerymen etc. In its schools the so-called Voroshilov marksmen, Voroshilov pilots and so on receive their instruction. The Osoaviakhim is now projecting a scheme for the establishment of 431 Clubs to teach the young how to fly. In 1935 a naval squadron of Osoaviakhim pilots was formed in the Baltic. Similar squadrons are to be formed in the Far East, on the Black Sea and on the other coasts of the U.S.S.R. The Red Army provides the aircraft for the training of the young airmen. The latest report of the Osoaviakhim states that up to the present over a million young persons have passed a test in parachuting, while an equal number passed a motor-driving test, and nearly half a million passed a test in the care of Army horses. The membership of Osoaviakhim already exceeds 13 millions, and will continue to grow. There can be no question as to the value of the services which this Association renders to the Red Army, not merely because of the military training which it gives, but also because of the help it will be able to give the Red Army in the event of mobilisation in virtue of its organisation and the training of its members.

The development of the Red Army in the years 1935-36 has not been confined to the increase in the number of effectives. Considerable progress has also been made with the provision of war material, which has been feverishly pushed forward. Marshal Tukhachevsky was able to note at the end of January 1935 that since 1933

- the number of machine guns in the Rifle and Cavalry Divisions had increased by more than 100 per cent,
- the number of machine guns for the Air forces and tanks had increased by more than 700 per cent,
- the number of tanks had increased by more than 450 per cent,
- the number of anti-tank guns had increased by more than 950 per cent,
- the number of heavy artillery pieces had increased by more than 100 per cent.

At the annual Session in 1936 of the Central Executive Committee he was in a position to announce that "We are now in a position, as and when the Government desires, to put into the field at any given point an armed force ready for battle, and fully armed and equipped. The preparedness of the Red Army is greater than that of any other Army."

The following points should be noted in this connection.

In addition to the increase in the stocks of war material in the years 1935-36 there was a marked improvement in the country's capacity for the production of war material. In particular, a great part of the artillery was brought up to modern standards by the improvement of gun materials, projectiles, explosives, detonators and so on. The Signals Corps have greatly developed their wireless equipment. The number of wireless stations has been increased by 1750 per cent. In the matter of arms the Red Army has made great progress, though there are no doubt a number of shortcomings still to be made good. At the beginning of 1936 the New York American wrote (January 12th 1936) that the Red Army was the greatest war machine at present in the world. Between 1932 and the end of 1935 the following improvements were introduced according to Russian official sources. As a result of the increase in the number of effectives the number of Rifle Divisions has been raised by 22 and the number of Cavalry Divisions by 3, with the addition of 758 light and 25 heavy batteries. In 1932 the number of light machine guns was 13,000 and the number of heavy machine guns 10,000; at the end of 1935 there were 20,000 light and 12,000 heavy machine guns—an increase of 7,000 and 2,000 respectively. Three years ago there were 2,400 light guns and 600 heavy guns: at the end of 1935 the numbers were 4,500 and 700—an increase of 2,100 and 100 respectively. The increase in the numbers of tanks and armoured cars is also very striking. In 1932 there were only 350: at the end of 1935 there were 3,500, some of them extra-heavy types, representing an increase of 3,150. In 1932 Russia had only one mechanised brigade: at the end of 1935 she had 10 mechanised Divisions. Further efforts have since been made to increase the stocks of armaments. The position in regard to armaments as at the end of 1936 is probably as follows:

Light machine guns, not less than 25,000,
Heavy machine guns, not less than 14,000,
Anti-tank guns, not less than 1,600,
Light guns, not less than 7,500,
Heavy guns, not less than 1,200,
Modern tanks, not less than 6,000.

The motorisation and mechanisation of all arms has been proceeding systematically for years past.

Increased attention has latterly been directed towards the development and reinforcement of mechanised formations and tank troops. In addition to a number of mechanised Rifle Divisions, there are now a quantity of mechanised brigades and strong mechanised Cavalry formations. All reconnaissance sections, anti-aircraft, Corps and Command artillery, Pioneer and Signals formations are now motorised. The increase in the case of the Tank Corps is fantastic. The Grand Manœuvres of the Red Army in the autumn of 1935 and 1936 drew the attention of the whole military world. Vast masses of new formations of a novel character were concentrated in a relatively confined space in order to enable the modern ideas of the leaders of the Red Army to be practically tested. It was the day of the machine. Machine guns, guns, small tanks—landed by parachute from heavy aircraft behind the enemy's front!—and heavy armoured tanks were thrown into action by the hundred, affording practical illustration of the belief of the Commander-in-Chief of the Red Army and People's Commissary of National Defence, Marshal Voroshilov, that the war of the future will be a war of machines placed at the soldier's disposal and employed by him skilfully and effectively with an eye to victory. The technical military Press of the Soviet Union deals exhaustively with the problems of the organisation, direction and use of armoured tanks, which are brigaded in some cases in the Red Army in mixed formations. A great part is played in these speculations by "distant operation groups", "distant support groups of Infantry" and "close support groups of Infantry". There is no question as to the great improvement in the equipment of the Tank Corps, which in the case of a number of types is reflected in the doubling of the speed of the tanks. The monthly output is said to have been brought up to some 200 tanks (light, medium and heavy). The most modern types receive special attention. A large number of tanks able to swim have recently been built: a Soviet paper published a picture (at the beginning of this year) of the crossing of a lake by one of these units in close formation in line ahead! The North American fast Christie tank has also been acquired in large numbers: it can move up to 160 km. per hour on wheels or caterpillars as required. With the marked increase in the number of tanks, there has been a concomitant increase of attention to the problem of training the tank troops. Ruthless offensive tactics are taught as the first requisite. Budenny's Cavalry army of 1920 has been transformed into the armoured army of Voroshilov of 1935. The 10,000 odd armoured vehicles (including 6,000 modern tanks), the 150,000 odd motor tractors and the 100,000 and more Army motor vehicles place the Red Army ahead of all other armies of the world in the matter of motorisation. In his own words Voroshilov has broken up the old arms and made tank leaders out of cavalry officers and airmen out of infantry officers.

The development of the Soviet Air arm has kept pace with that of the tanks in every respect. The organisation has been much improved, and the training has been systematically developed. The Air arm of the U.S.S.R. is designed to carry the offensive beyond the Soviet frontiers far into the territory of the victim of the offensive, and to land destructive, sabotage and propaganda units behind the enemy front, before the enemy is able to defend himself. These units are combined in the Parachute formations, the so-called Minjar troops. Marshal Tukhachevsky has been at pains to foster the development of this formation. In the discussion of the Army Estimates for the current year he put the number of trained parachutist troops at 60,000. Their training rests mainly with the Osoaviakhim. The New York American announced in January 1936 that since 1932 the Air arm of the U.S.S.R. had increased the number of aircraft from 1,700 to 4,300, including 1,500 bombers with a useful load capacity of 8 tons and a range of 1,250 miles. The personnel of the Red Air Force, it added, had been expanded during the previous 3 years from 12,000 to 40,000 men. The total number of aircraft of all types, to judge by the number of existing formations, must now be 6,000. This figure represents the establishment of aircraft, assuming all formations to have their full budgetary number of first line aircraft. It is by no means certain that all formations are up to establishment however: there are in all probability a good number of shortages of strength. The whole of the new material produced by the Soviet aircraft industry in the immediate future will probably be used, not for the establishment of new formations, but to fill up shortages in existing formations and to create a material reserve. But even so the fact remains that the Air arm of the U.S.S.R. is at present in numbers ahead of every other State. That it is proposed to increase this advantage is apparent from Tukhachevsky's utterances at the 1936 Party Congress, when he said: "When once we can begin serial production, as we shall be able to do by 1937 at latest, there will be no overtaking us. We shall then be in possession of many times as many aircraft as we have now." The Soviet air armament is served at present by 74 industrial establishments, of which 28 are for the construction of aircraft, 14 for the construction of motors and 32 for the construction of accessories and equipment. In 1929 there were only 26 such establishments in all: in 1932 there were 54: and in 1934 there were 62. The problem of the supply of sufficient staff to man all these aircraft has been solved, in spite of the rapid growth of the numbers of planes, by the aid of the Osoaviakhim. For years past the Osoaviakhim with its 1,500 gliding and flying schools has been training large numbers of young Bolsheviks to become pilots and mechanics. The Chairman of the Air Committee of the French Chamber, Bousoutrot, after a visit of inspection in company with other members of the Committee to Soviet Russia, expressed the opinion that the Red Air arm was amply supplied with aircraft, trained personnel and above all airports. The Reporter of the Air Committee, Hymanns, added that every Soviet city had an aerodrome for training airmen and another for training parachutists in addition to a military aerodrome. The aircraft, he said, were built and fitted on American lines, so that with serial production a very large output was possible. The well known French aircraft builder Louis Bréguet told a representative of l'Intransigent at the end of August last that he had been in a position in the course of his enquiries in the Soviet aircraft and motor works to convince himself of the truth of what he was told by the Managements of the works—namely, that the five biggest motor works and the four principal aircraft works were capable of producing 5,000 aircraft a year! According to Russian official statistics the production of aircraft in the year 1936 was already at the end of August some 92 per cent higher than the total production for the year in 1935. In the near future therefore the Red Air arm should be as powerful as those of all the other countries of Europe put together.

In pursuance of the Soviet Government's Decree of August 10th 1936 lowering the age of conscription, the necessary steps have been taken, especially in Western Russia, to house the million odd recruits who were called up in the autumn of 1936. As there was not sufficient barrack accommodation available, huge barrack camps have been erected in the neighbourhood of a number of places. According to the information available the greater part of the new troops called up in the autumn of 1936 are being quartered in districts to the West of Moscow—that is to say, in the Western frontier zone of the U.S.S.R., where a number of new aerodromes have also been erected. Other indications point plainly to the conclusion that the Government at the present time regards the West as more important than the East. Work has proceeded energetically during the last two years on the development of the field fortifications which run along the whole of the Western frontier from Lake Ladoga to the Black Sea. Groups of the population not regarded as politically reliable have been transported on a large scale from the Finnish, Estonian, Latvian and Polish frontier districts to other parts of Russia. The disposition of the troops in the Western districts of the U.S.S.R. had already been considerably strengthened by the establishment of new formations and new garrisons before the publication of the Decree of August 10th 1936. The operation capacity of the Red Army has been greatly improved by the construction of communications and the deliberate adoption of a policy of gradually eliminating the worst shortcomings of the communications system. Three great double-tracked railways running parallel in the direction of the Western frontier have been built. The road system is being increased and improved by the labour of tens of thousands of political prisoners. A beginning has just been made with the construction of two autostrades from Moscow to Kiev and from Moscow to Minsk. Minsk is less than 100 km. from the Polish frontier. The Moscow—Minsk autostrade will also touch the city of Smolensk, which is a point of military importance for the North-West front of the U.S.S.R. The Polish paper Kurjer Polski comments: "The direction of the road towards our frontiers and the rate at which it is being built are sufficiently clear evidence of the military objects of its construction. Poland cannot but be interested in the matter." The Polish military organ Polska Zbrojna published further details of Soviet preparations on the Finnish frontier, such as the - Development of Leningrad as a land fortress and naval base,

- Development of Kronstadt as a naval fortress,
- Development of the island of Kotlin as a submarine base,
- Erection of an underground Air Force base near Fort Gorki opposite Kronstadt,
- Erection of 12 air bases on the Northern littoral of the U.S.S.R.,
- Erection of Army air ports in Petrosavodsk, Kem, Uchtua, Pääjarvi, Kandalak, and Murmansk,
- Construction of five new highroads from Leningrad to the Finnish frontier,
- Development of the parallel railway lines Leningrad—Alexandrovsk and Vologda—Archangelsk,
- Construction of new railway lines between Parandova, the Northern shore of Lake Vyg, Uchtua, Petrosavodsk, Lake Onega, and Repola.

A fundamental change has been made in the areas of certain military districts.

The very sparsely populated area North-East of Leningrad (roughly, the area East of the line from Vologda to the White Sea) has been split off from the Leningrad military district and made into a North Russia Military Commissariat.

The former military district of the Ukraine has been divided into two independent military districts, one in the West with the name of Kiev Military District, the other in the East with the name Charkow Military District.

The former military district of the Volga has been shorn of its Northern area, which is now to be known as the Ural Military District with Svendlovsk as its Headquarters.

The former military district of Siberia is now divided into three independent parts. The westernmost of these parts, extending as far as the 96th degree of longitude, retains the name of Siberia Military District. Next to it comes the Trans-Baikal Military District with Headquarters in Chita: its Eastern border runs East from Strjetensk and then West of the Amur Railway in a big curve to Kolymsk on the Arctic. The third part is the area of the Army of the Far East.

A pamphlet published in the middle of 1936 by the Japanese War Ministry, in which a comparison is made of the strengths of the Japanese and Soviet Armies, gives amongst other things the following particulars.

When Japan began to follow out her present policy in Manchukuo, there were only 4 Infantry Divisions and 2 Cavalry Divisions in garrison in the Soviet-Manchurian frontier region, making a total of about 55,000 men. Today in the same area there are not less than 15 Infantry and 3 Cavalry Divisions, representing a concentration of more than 260,000 men. In addition the U.S.S.R. has over 900 aircraft, 800 tanks and 500 armoured cars on the frontier of Manchukuo. There are 100 heavy bombing aeroplanes in station at Vladivostok. Since 1932 the U.S.S.R. has sunk over 1½ milliards of roubles in the construction of fortified works along the Manchurian frontier. These works consist of small forts 50 to 100 metres long in groups of three or four. There are in all some 6,000 of them. Strategically they are not intended for defence; but they play a very important role as a base of operations in an offensive war. The strength of the Japanese forces in Manchukuo is only one-sixth of that of the Russians on the other side of the border. When it is realised that the U.S.S.R. is maintaining in the Far East alone an Army as strong as the whole standing Army of Japan (250,000 men altogether, organised in 17 Divisions, and 1,000 aircraft), and that Moscow is proposing to strengthen and develop her military position in the Far East to a still greater extent, it will be appreciated that all these preparations cannot be directed against any other than Japan.

The above particulars may be supplemented from the following information published by the technical paper France militaire in September 1936. According to this organ the Soviet army in the Far East is in three main groups, viz. the Baikal-Mongolian Army with 85,000 men and 350 bombing aircraft, the Amur group with 32,000 men and 150 bombing aircraft, and the Vladivostok Army with 40,000 men and 250 bombing aircraft. The three Army Groups dispose in addition of strong bodies of special troops, fortress artillery, Frontier Defence formations and naval detachments. France militaire also states that the Soviet fortifications on the Manchurian frontier have an average depth of 6 kilometres. The separate forts are connected with one another. They are strongest and most highly developed along the Amur River. They are all built underground. Behind this 6 kilometre zone further special defensive works and underground garages for tanks and armoured cars have been constructed. The fortifications of Vladivostok, which date from before the war, have been replaced by modern works.

In order to carry out this gigantic scheme of armaments, the military expenditure of the U.S.S.R. has been repeatedly and extensively increased during the last two years. The Defence estimates for 1935 proved insufficient, in spite of the very large amount (6½ milliards of roubles), to finance the armaments expenditure projected. The actual expenditure was in fact 8.2 milliards of roubles, i.e. 1.4 milliards or 26 per cent more than the estimates. For the year 1936 the estimates were 14.8 milliards; 21 per cent of the entire Budget for the year was thus allocated to armaments. As the Army Estimates have hitherto been largely exceeded in each year, it is presumable that the same will be the case for 1936. All these figures, it should be borne in mind, represent only the amounts of the actual Army Estimates in the Budget for each year, as officially published by the Soviet Government. They accordingly constitute only a part of the total expenditure on armaments, as they do not include the vast sums expended every year on the development of the heavy industries, the chemical industry and communications. The primary and principal object of these forms of expenditure is the creation of a modern armament-producing industry and a system of transport designed for military purposes. The Soviet armaments industry is now probably already in a position to supply the needs of the Red Army.

The armaments budget for 1937 shows a further increase of 5.3 milliards of roubles as compared with 1936, bringing the total expenditure up to 20.1 milliards. To this must be added the budget of the newly created People's Commissariat for the Armaments Industry totalling 2.3 milliards. In two years therefore the expenditure on armaments has been more than trebled by the U.S.S.R.

But even this accelerated measure of rearmament of the year 1936 is not enough for the Soviet Government. On the last day of the Eighth Congress of the U.S.S.R. in Moscow at the beginning of December 1936 Stalin gave particulars of the Soviet armaments programme, the completion of which (as the Daily Express wrote) will give the U.S.S.R. a combination of land, sea and air forces representing the most powerful fighting machine the world has ever seen.

It appears from the report in the Daily Express that the plans for this new vast programme of armaments were decided on at a three-day session of the U.S.S.R. Council of Defence, at which the War Minister Voroshilov, his deputy Tukhachevsky, the Chief of the General Staff Jegorov, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Far East Blücher, and the Cavalry Commander-in-Chief Budenny were present.

The whole Plan is divided into five main sections dealing (according to the Daily Express correspondent) with the following subjects:

1. Creation of a line of fortifications 2,000 miles long on the Western and Eastern frontiers of the U.S.S.R. against Germany on the West and Japan on the East, similar to the Maginot Line in France.
2. Increase of the standing army to 3 million men within two years, i.e. increase of the present strength of effectives by a round 100 per cent.
3. Trebling of the Soviet Air forces within the same period. Training of another 50,000 pilots within one year.
4. Establishment of a special People's Commissariat for War Industry under the personal control of the War Minister Voroshilov.
5. Further transference of the armaments industries into the interior of Russia as a measure of defence against enemy attacks from the air.

Work on the new line of fortifications is to begin at once. On the Western frontier of the U.S.S.R. alone 300,000 workers will be set to work as soon as the actual construction of the fortifications is begun.

"The Soviet Union—an armed camp!" Such is the headline with which the Berner Bund of January 12th heads an interesting article by a Special Correspondent on the Russian armaments. The Berner Bund appends the following comments:

"What, it may well be asked, are these feverish armaments, carried through at the expense of the unfortunate Soviet subjects who have already been bled white, leading up to? The measure of the Soviet Union's purely defensive requirements has long since been exceeded; for the U.S.S.R. is strategically in a far more favourable position than any other Great Power in Europe, and does not even need an army with the peace-time strength of the French Army. Moscow's armaments can only therefore be regarded as purely offensive in character. Eastern Europe is well aware of the fact, though it may not always proclaim its knowledge openly. But, one asks, how long will it be before Western Europe begins to realise that a black cloud is gathering in the East of our continent which one day may annihilate our two-thousand year old civilisation in a single catastrophic hailstorm?"

II. France's Army Organisation

Recognition of these considerations has not however penetrated unfortunately to all quarters, and least of all to France. The Quai d'Orsay has been at pains of late to deny that the Pact with Soviet Russia has anything in the nature of a "Super-valuation of values": but it has not for one moment disowned the Pact. Authoritative personages have explicitly asserted the same standpoint without intermission right up to the present time. In August 1936, for example, the Reporter for the Army Estimates, M. Archimbaud, summed up the whole debate in the Chamber and Senate on the pros and cons of the Pact in the following terms: "It is our duty to uphold our alliance with Russia. We shall be told, Russia is a Soviet State. That has nothing to do with the matter. A country chooses for itself the system which suits it. The Soviets offer us the support of their armies, and we should do wrong to reject their offer." Premier Leon Blum, speaking to the National Council of the French Social Democrat Party on November 8th 1936, also asserted that the Pact signed by Laval retained its full value. The Foreign Minister Delbos made a statement to the same effect in the French Chamber on December 4th.

It would be a mistake to suppose that the attitude of the two last-named French statesmen in the matter of the maintenance of the Soviet Pact is governed by considerations of the maintenance of the Front populaire bloc, for which the support—or, at any rate, the tolerance—of the French Communists is essential. The line which the present French Government follows is only in accordance with the general line of foreign policy in France since 1919, which seeks salvation solely in collective alliances and unremitting rearmament directed against Germany. Through all speeches of responsible French Ministers there runs like a red line the note of certain fixed principles; and those principles may be formulated as follows: "Our country's interests are identical with the interests of peace. If France is to speak with authority, she must be respected. If she is to be respected, she must be strong; and strong she is, and her armaments are the source of her strength. A weak France would be a temptation, an easy prey, and so a danger to peace."

This is the famous "continuité" of French policy, from which no French Government, whatever its colour, has ever diverged. The idea has never been better defined than in an article which appeared in the Temps of January 30th 1936, when the Laval Government was succeeded by that of M. Flandin. The Temps took the opportunity to make the point that, apart from nuances of detail, Flandin's policy could not possibly differ from that of his predecessor, the policy (namely) of collective security. That policy, the Temps continued, was based on two principles—loyalty to the League of Nations as the guardian of the Peace Treaties and the closest cooperation with Great Britain. From these two fundamental principles the Temps deduced a number of others, such as the need for careful consideration of any new international commitments going beyond the framework of the Covenant in all their consequences, however remote, the need of all Members of the League to put themselves in a position to meet the obligations devolving on them in virtue of their membership, and in particular the need for Great Britain to increase her armaments in order to be in a position, as in 1914, to land an Expeditionary Force on the Continent at the earliest possible date.

That policy is also the policy of the Delbos-Blum Government, as appears plainly from the Government declaration of June 23rd 1936, in which it was announced that the military strength of France had never been stronger than it was today. The declaration recognised the sincerity of the Führer and Chancellor's desire for peace, based on his experiences as a soldier at the front. It did not linger over accomplished facts, and disclaimed unprofitable polemics over the occupation of the Rhineland. But, having said so much, it proceeded to develop on broad lines the traditional programme of French foreign policy, the policy of alliances with military clauses, now called "regional Pacts"—but their "regional" character is at once vitiated by provisions making accession open to outside interested parties as well as neighbours. One such outside interested party is Russia; and of Russia the Blum Government declaration was at pains to assert that France counted on the aid of her powerful friends in the U.S.S.R. The declaration included a reference in the traditional pactomaniac sense to the value of the Pact system, not only in Eastern and South-Eastern Europe and in the Danubian basin, but also in the Mediterranean! Of which Pact system the only fruits to date are the demonstration of the impracticability of any such system at all: as to which, see Foreign Minister Delbos' statement in the French Chamber on August 2nd 1936.

It is too little realised to what an extent France was rearming at a time when there was not the slightest pretext for so doing in the shape of any breach by Germany of the disarmament provisions of the Versailles Treaty. In the years 1931-1934—that is to say, at a time when satisfactory results could still be anticipated from the Disarmament Conference—France expended 61,821,000,000 francs according to her Army Estimates alone, as notified by her to the League of Nations and published by the latter in its Armaments Year Book. The actual expenditure on the French Defence Forces was very much higher, as much of the expenditure was covered by other Estimates. On a conservative calculation of the total amounts expended by France on rearmament during the period of the Disarmament Conference, we arrive at a total which justifies the statement that the purely defensive requirements of the country were greatly exceeded. The former "Généralissime" Weygand admitted as much in an article on "L'état militaire de la France" in the Revue des deux mondes of October 15th 1936, in which he attacked the prevailing view that France needs an "army of defence". From the military standpoint, he argued, such a view is nonsensical and dangerous. What France needs is an army inspired with the offensive spirit without which no army can exist.

The high quality of the warlike spirit, i.e. of the training, of the officers and men of the French Army was shown in the World War. The French officer and the French soldier are well known for their glowing patriotism, their readiness to sacrifice themselves, their stubbornness and tenacity. The selection and training of the higher commanders and of the General Staff officers has always been good. In addition to the long established military schools like Saint-Cyr, the Ecole Polytechnique, the Ecole Supérieure de Guerre, the Centre des Hautes Etudes Militaires and the training courses for officers of all arms, a new military academy, the Collège des Hautes Etudes de Défense Nationale, was founded in the autumn of 1936. The courses at this academy, which are attended by 10 officers or officials of the Army, 5 officers of the Air Force, and 5 officers of the Navy, together with one higher official from the different Ministries—making a total of not more than 30 at a time—last for four months. According to statements made by the War Minister Daladier on November 4th 1936 to the Army Committee of the Chamber, it is proposed to increase the French corps of officers, which at present numbers in the case of the Army some 32,000, and to facilitate the promotion of non-commissioned officers to be officers. The numbers of the professional soldiers are also to be increased from 144,000 to 160,000. The reason for these increases was stated by M. Daladier to lie in the fact that the new fortifications require standing garrisons. To facilitate and improve the training of the men, compulsory pre-military training from the age of 18 is to be introduced in the schools and through the Sport organisations. Conscripts are to receive some months' training in a Training Camp before they are actually called to the colours. Greater attention is also to be paid to the training of reservists. In place of the present single period of training for reservists of 3 weeks, there are in future to be two trainings of 14 days each. The material of war, so M. Daladier explained, changes every day; and the reservist must be familiarised with the new material. He added that there could be no question for the present of reducing the two years' service. The two years represented a minimum which was not open to discussion.

Since the World War France, after a transitional 3½ year period in 1928, introduced one-year service. But by 1930 the conviction prevailed that in the so-called "lean years" (i.e. the years 1936-1940, when the falling-off in the birth rate during the War means a shortage of recruits) it was not possible to keep the Army up to peace strength. This view found backing in the spectre of German rearmament. At first in the years 1933-1935 France sought a remedy for this state of things by increasing the number of coloured troops in France, transferring troops for the purpose from North Africa in sufficient number to form two complete new Divisions. The number of long service men and specialists was also increased by facilities in connection with the conditions of re-appointment and improvement of prospects. A considerable increase of the Garde républicaine mobile was also put through, and more extensive use was made of the power to retain men with the colours after the legal period of service. When all these expedients failed to meet the needs of the situation, an Order was issued on April 1st 1935 increasing the period of active service from one to two years until 1939 in the first instance, with a transition period of 1½ years for the recruits called up in April 1935: the previous practice of two conscriptions in the year was at the same time abandoned, and replaced by a single conscription in the autumn of each year. In addition, in all fortification areas and in a number of other recruiting areas in Northern France the recruits were called up for the first time in the autumn of 1935 one month before the time, in order to bridge over the interval when all the recruits in the depots are untrained. In conjunction with the introduction of the two-year period of service, steps were taken to make the conscription more rigorous for all recruits in the home country as well as in the oversea possessions and in foreign countries, and to increase still further the numbers of coloured troops in France. Facilities and favourable conditions were also offered to volunteers prepared to join the colours before the legal period of service, as a means of keeping up the peace strength. The efforts made were not without result. From 547,000 men in 1934 the peace strength rose in 1935 to the neighbourhood of 575,000 men. The effect of the two-year service, the increase in the numbers of long service men and specialists and the various other measures was to raise the effective strength of the Army in 1936 to not less than 652,000 men without the Air Force of some 42,000 men, and the 47,000 men of the Gendarmerie and Garde républicaine mobile.

This numerical increase in the effective strength was followed by a far-reaching reorganisation and strengthening of the Army cadres.

Since 1935 no less than 12 Fortress Infantry regiments, 7 Alpine Fortress battalions and a number of Fortress Artillery formations have been created in the fortified areas. The organisation of the staffs of the Fortification Commands and of the troops garrisoning the fortresses has been tightened up and adjusted more closely to requirements. The fortifications themselves, which as a result of the unparalleled expenditure of the preceding years had already been developed into the most powerful girdle of fortresses that the world had ever seen, unique alike in strength and in extent, were still further strengthened.* Although the so-called Maginot Line from Basle to beyond Longuyon facing the German frontier has frequently been characterised, even by French observers, as a defensive barrier without a gap, work is proceeding continuously to strengthen it by the introduction of new fortified works in the main shock terrain and by the development of the ground in front. The work has been specially energetic in this sector since the transference of troops to the frontier on March 7th 1936. In all parts of the fortified front not completely immune from attack by tanks obstacles have been erected over a continuous depth of several kilometres in the shape of row upon row of deeply planted or cemented rails. The gap which was left free until the Saar Plebiscite between Wittingen an der Saar and St. Avold was fortified in the year 1936. On the Belgian frontier work proceeded at feverish speed on the fortifications round Maubeuge and Valenciennes. According to the remarks of M. Daladier before the Army Committee of the Chamber on November 4th 1936 it is proposed, in consequence of the announcement of Belgium's future neutrality policy by the King of the Belgians, to extend the French girdle of fortifications along the Belgian frontier as far as the English Channel, and to accelerate the completion of the works involved. A number of strategically important points are to be strengthened by block-houses. At the same time dams are to be erected in order to enable wide tracts of country to be inundated at short notice. For these new fortifications a sum of 500 million francs is to be appropriated in the first instance. At the same time the French frontier with Switzerland is to be fortified by a long chain of forts in the French Jura and in the so-called Huningues area. M. Daladier was at pains to observe in this connection that there were difficulties in the way of the fortification of these areas owing to the existence of certain neutral zones under existing treaties, e.g. in the neighbourhood of Basle, so that it would not be possible to push the line of fortifications right up to the frontier. The treaties to which he alluded are those containing the so-called "Huningues clause" which was taken over in the Treaty of Vienna of 1815 from the Peace Treaty of Paris of 1914. The clause is to the following effect:

"Inasmuch as the fortifications of Huningues have constituted a standing source of anxiety to the city of Basle, and in order to afford the Swiss Confederation a new proof of their confidence and good will, the High Contracting Parties" (France, Prussia, Austria, England, and Russia) "are agreed to cause the fortifications of Huningues to be dismantled. On the same grounds the French Government undertakes not to re-erect the said fortifications at any time or for whatever reason, or to replace them by other fortifications, within a distance of three miles from the city of Basle."

In this connection it must however be added that, according to reports which have appeared in the Press, France began to take measures of defence in this zone immediately after the announcement of the German resumption of equality in matters of Defence and the re-occupation of the Rhineland by German troops. The preparations for these measures are stated to date back to 1933. Two large permanent camps have been established in the first instance, according to the reports in question, in the Haardt and in the Alsatian Jura, and these have been occupied since the German re-occupation of the Rhineland by French Chasseurs and Moroccan riflemen in succession. These troops—their strength is stated to have amounted to two regiments—have been employed on the erection of dug-outs, tank traps and concreted gun positions. The artillery positions already prepared between Oltingen and Kemps are to be guarded and protected by barbed wire fences. There is no information as to the erection of block-houses or forts in extension of the Maginot Line in this direction. But, even if the obligations of the Treaty of Vienna of 1815 are upheld and observed by France, the demilitarisation of the three-mile zone at Huningues should not constitute any obstacle to defence of the French frontier in this region in view of the technical developments—especially in respect of the range of gun-fire—of the last 121 years.

Since 1935 there has further been a marked strengthening of the Infantry and Cavalry Divisions and Army troops in the frontier districts. Four Divisions (the 1st, 14th, 15th, and 43rd Infantry Divisions) have been brought nearly up to war strength. The Artillery regiments have been increased: three coloured Infantry regiments have been moved to Belfort, Châlons, and St. Dié; and further coloured battalions have been moved to the frontier of the Saar. Three coloured Infantry regiments were transferred for the purpose from North Africa to France; and one coloured Infantry regiment was formed, and the 4th North African Division was reformed, in Epinal, the Divisional Artillery regiment attaching to it being established expressly for the purpose. The armoured car battalions and "dragons portés" belonging to the light mechanised (formerly 4th Cavalry) Division were brought up to establishment.

Of the total number of 28 Infantry Divisions (many of them mechanised), 3 Cavalry Divisions (till recently 4), 2 light mechanised Divisions (till recently 1), 2 independent brigades of Spahis, and 3 Cavalry groups of 11 regiments in all in the home country, no less than 7 Infantry Divisions, one light mechanised Division and one Cavalry Division are posted in the immediate vicinity of the German frontier. They are reinforced by the formations in three "régions fortifiées" and certain separate "secteurs fortifiés," the strength of which is considerably over that of 3 Infantry Divisions, as well as by powerful Air Forces and formations on the most extensive scale of the general Army Reserve. An interesting light is thrown on the position in this connection by the answer which was given by the War Minister, as reported in the technical periodical France militaire on October 8th 1936, in reply to a number of enquiries by politicians in regard to the transfer of officers to the unpopular posts on the German frontier. The War Minister stated on that occasion that over 60 per cent of the Infantry officers in the home country were required for service in these posts! He declined accordingly to relieve officers who had served in the front line in the war from duty in these districts, or to introduce a rota of officers for service there. We shall be erring on the low side rather than the high side if we put the peace establishment of the other ranks of the so-called "troupes de couverture"—which are intended (as above stated) for what are openly admitted in France to be offensive, and not defensive, operations—at 160,000 men.

The troops in the interior of the country are also being reorganised and reinforced on a far-reaching scale. In connection with the reorganisation of the Cavalry Divisions in 1935 one Cavalry regiment was transferred from the Paris military district to Strasbourg, and another Cavalry regiment in Lorraine was reinforced and distributed over a number of posts nearer to the German frontier. In the autumn of 1936 there was a further reorganisation of the French Cavalry, in the course of which a number of Cavalry units were disbanded; but the net result, owing to the creation or reinforcement of other Cavalry units, was to strengthen the Cavalry forces as a whole in very considerable measure, particularly in the case of the mechanised formations.

In certain Artillery regiments the number of Sections was increased; and 7 workers' Sections were established for the Artillery regiments, and 16 for the Tank regiments. In the Train 9 new squadron formations were established out of existing units, and 2 new squadrons were formed. Lastly, the Garde républicaine mobile was reinforced by the addition of three new "legions" i.e. regimental formations; and further increases are projected, so as to bring its total numbers up to 27,000 men in 1937.

The principle underlying all these recent processes of rearmament is the mechanisation of the Army. Mechanisation is the keynote of the policy of the French High Command. The new French armaments programme, for which the War Minister Daladier, in agreement with the General Staff, obtained the approval of a Cabinet Council at the beginning of September 1936, provides for further mechanisation of all arms and the Infantry in particular. In all new Infantry Divisions the artillery (including heavy guns) is to be mechanised completely on very modern lines with noiseless eight-cylinder motors with pneumatic tyres, while the transport of the Infantry is to be entirely by motor lorry. Another new feature is the introduction of a 2.5 cm. Hotchkiss armoured defence gun in all Infantry regiments and also in the Cavalry. A beginning has been made with the mechanisation of this gun by what are called "chenillettes," viz. armoured caterpillar munition waggons: the greater part of the Infantry units have been equipped with these. At the parade in Paris on July 14th 1936 each Infantry regiment had some 12 of these new guns with it. The machine gun companies of the Infantry regiments have also been equipped with trench mortars and Infantry guns. Armoured Divisions as such do not form part of the French organisation. The tank troops, whose equipment is continually being expanded and improved, are attached in part to the Divisions and military districts for training purposes. They consist at present of in all 27 tank battalions with not less than 4,500 tanks. The two light mechanised Divisions, to which reference has already been made, also have armoured cars which are equipped with heavy machine guns and in some cases light guns and are more or less capable of movement across country. According to Press reports it was further decided in September 1936 to proceed with the creation of a definitely aggressive force in the shape of an "armée de choc." The nucleus of the armée de choc is to be the Divisions already motorised, and it is to consist exclusively of long service men. The Artillery has also been again reorganised, a large number of Artillery regiments being mechanised: about one half of the Corps artillery units are now mechanised. The Army artillery has long since been mechanised in its entirety by the introduction of motor traction for the guns in carriages capable of movement across country.

These far-reaching measures of mechanisation, taken in conjunction with the introduction of the two-year period of service, the increased use of coloured troops in the home country, the multiplication and modernisation of arms and equipment, and the reinforcement of the frontier garrisons and more intensive training of reservists have immeasurably increased the striking power of the French Army in recent years. The present effective strength is 652,000 men without the Air forces, Gendarmerie or Garde républicaine mobile, and their armament consists of some 16,000 light and 18,500 heavy machine guns, and some 1,650 light, 350 anti-aircraft, and 1,300 heavy guns (without counting the quantities of armaments in forts and depots, coastal defences and Air defence posts), together with the 4,500 tanks to which reference has already been made; and these figures gain in significance when it is remembered that some 14 per cent of the total French population have already seen service. France in case of war should be able to draw on more than 4.6 million trained white reservists and at least 1.5 million trained coloured reservists.

Over and above these forces France has her powerful Air Force, the rearmament of which and its development as an independent arm have made notable progress. The increasing speed and growing strength of the armament of the French bombing aircraft have gone pari passu with the development of the one-seater fighting planes, which now attain maximum speeds of close on 500 km. an hour. By contrast with the defence armament of the bombers, the aircraft gun of the one-seater fighter planes is assuming increasing importance. A large number of the one-seater fighters are armed with one to 2 aircraft guns in addition to 2 to 3 machine guns. The planes with more than one seat are said even to have 2 to 4 fixed guns built into the plane with one moveable machine gun on a special carriage. French fighting plane types with more than one seat include, in addition to the well-known Amiot 143 and Potez 54 patterns, the newly developed Amiot 144 and Bréguet 460 which attain maximum speeds of 350 to 390 km. an hour. Of the reconnaissance planes, the Mureaux 117 is amongst others conspicuous with its "ceiling" of over 10,000 metres altitude. The heavy bombers Farman 221 and 222 are also said to develop a speed of 325 km. an hour and to have a range of 2,000 km. even with a load of 2,000 kg. of bombs! The wireless connection between plane and plane and between the planes and the ground and vice versa is also said to have made great progress in the past year. The whole training of the Air arm is being radically reorganised at the present time, and is being centralised in Salon de Provence and in Istres. The personnel of the Air Force at present consists of not less than 2,700 officers and 39,000 non-commissioned officers and men. In addition, the Naval Air Force has a personnel of some 6,000 men. Altogether the French forces in the air comprise some 3,500 pilots and 2800 observers and machine gunners.

At the head of the Air arm is the Minister for Air, who is also President of the Supreme Air Council (Conseil supérieur de l'Air). This consultative body is composed of the higher Commanders of the Air Force, and its views are taken in connection with every decision of importance. The Minister as Supreme Head of the Air Force and of the Air Council has under him the Chief of the General Staff of the Air Force and the three Inspectors for the independent Air Forces, Instruction, Reconnaissance squadrons and Oversea staffs, and since the spring of 1936 the Inspector of the Air Defence organisation. The Naval Air Force and the active Air Defence organisation of the Navy are under the Minister of Marine.

France is divided into 4 Air Districts. North Africa forms a 5th Air District. In each Air District there are a number of Air Brigades or Half-Brigades. The latter comprise bomber, fighter, and reconnaissance squadrons according to the duties they have to perform, together with a number of flights and airship battalions. The independent Air Force consists of bomber and fighter squadrons of the formations in the Air Districts. All other formations belong to the so-called Aviation de coopération.

The number of first line war-planes (bombers, fighters, and reconnaissance planes) is at present some 3,000. To these must be added some 2,000 serviceable second line planes. There are also 5 anti-aircraft regiments of 6 Sections each for Air Defence purposes: most of these regiments consist of 2 batteries of 7.5 cm. anti-aircraft guns on self-propelled carriages, trailers or semi-fixed emplacements. Some Sections are composed of mechanised anti-aircraft machine gun companies with 13.2 mm. Hotchkiss machine guns. The Home Air Defence has a quantity of batteries, some of them in emplacements, around Paris, in the industrial centres and in the frontier and coastal fortifications.

An extra-budgetary Armaments credit of 3.5 milliards of francs was placed at the Air Minister's disposal in the years 1934 to 1936 for the re-armament of the French Air arm. It has been used for the complete modernisation of standard materials, for the accumulation of reserves of munitions and the preparation of the ground organisation for the event of war. Of this credit, 1.8 milliards were allocated to the year 1936. The regular Air Estimates for that year amounted to 900 million francs. In the next four years 1937-1940, in addition to the regular Air Estimates (the amount of which has still to be fixed), four extraordinary annual appropriations of 550 million francs each are projected for the renewal of aircraft material. On October 27th 1936 the Cabinet further approved a new Air armaments programme to cost 5 milliards, under which the number of first line aircraft hitherto contemplated is to be increased by 50 per cent, and the increase speeded up, so as to place in the field 1,500 faster and more powerful aeroplanes of the most modern type available. The personnel is also to be increased by 1,000 officers and 10,000 men.

Within the framework of the rearmament of the French Air arm it is proposed, according to a semi-official announcement on November 6th 1936, to create an Air Infantry. Its units are to be composed of light Fusilier detachments, who are to be put into action in war-time behind the enemy's lines. There are to be two groups of this Air Infantry, who are to be stationed at Rheims and in Algiers. Each of the two groups will consist in the first instance of a company of Fusiliers and a transport squadron. They are to be landed by parachute or by direct landing on the ground behind the enemy's lines. It is proposed in time to develop these companies into battalions, and later into regiments, following the Soviet Russian example.

The increased expenditure on the expansion of the Air arm and the total Defence expenditure of the last few years, so far as known from the figures published officially, show that the French Government is determined, with all the resources at its disposal and without regard to the financial effect on the country, still further to increase the striking power of the Army and the national defence forces in a marked degree. When, for example, it was found that the armaments expenditure for 1935 could not be met out of the resources of the Ordinary Budget—the Defence expenditure on the Army alone totalled 12.3 milliards of francs—a special credit of 1.4 milliards was appropriated by the procedure of an Emergency Decree. In the year 1936 again—the budget year is identical with the calendar year—the sum of 15.6 milliards, which is shown as the figure for the Defence expenditure in the Ordinary Budget, is no indication of the actual expenditure incurred for this object, since special credits were continually applied for and accorded for particular purposes (generally not clearly indicated) to an extent far greater than in any previous years. In addition to these special credits, the 1936 Budget was saddled with heavy supplementary expenditure in connection with the extensive transport of troops to the Eastern frontier, the intensified expansion of the fortress girdle, the creation of new establishments of troops, the acceleration of the process of mechanisation, the doubling of the soldiers' pay and simultaneous all-round increase in commissariat charges, and the big increase in the wages of all workers in State establishments. To cover all this expenditure, special credits to a total of 8.5 milliards have been voted and made available over and above the Ordinary Budget expenditure on Defence. At a meeting of the Army Committee of the Chamber on November 4th 1936 the French War Minister further announced that in 1937 no less than 19.5 milliards of francs would be devoted to expenditure on armaments, viz. 14 milliards on current requirements, 5 milliards on the reinforcement of war stocks, and 0.5 milliards on the new fortifications on the Belgian frontier. At the beginning of the current year it was further reported in an English paper that the French armaments budget for 1937 would amount to as much as 24½ milliards of francs, of which 14 milliards were to be allocated to the Army, 5 milliards to the Air arm, and 5 milliards to the Navy.

The French preparedness for war is also being intensified by the transference of the armaments industry from the frontier districts in the East and the surroundings of Paris to the West and South of France: further progress has been made with this process. Again, the number of depots of supplies and stocks, which the increasing mechanisation of the Army renders necessary, has been steadily increasing throughout the country. Efforts are further being made to increase the stocks of fuel well beyond current requirements with an eye to the eventuality of war. In the middle of July 1936 the Bill for the Nationalisation of the Armaments Industry, which had been foreshadowed in the initial Governmental statement to the Chamber and Senate by the Blum Cabinet was approved by the Chamber by an overwhelming majority and promulgated as the Law of August 11th 1936. This Act gives the Government powers to nationalise by decree, in whole or in part, all private factories which produce arms, munitions, tanks, aeroplanes, or warships. Undertakings which are not yet nationalised are made subject to specially strict measures of control. Up to now three arms factories have been nationalised; and the President of the Republic has issued a Decree concerning "the supervision of private armaments firms and the trade in war material." The Decree is of a drastic character—as is also the Law on the Nationalisation of the Armaments Industry—as the following summary of its contents will make clear.

Article 1. Purpose of the supervision introduced by the Law of August 11th 1936 concerning the Nationalisation of the Armaments Industry is:

1. to supervise the production and purchase of war material,
2. to obtain information as to the processes of manufacture employed, and to follow the movement in the volume of production,
3. to supervise the execution of the provisions of the Law,
4. to ascertain the amount of profits earned by the undertakings, and to supervise the expenditure on entertainment and similar purposes and advertisement.

Article 2. No undertaking may produce war material without Government permission.

Article 3. The inspecting authorities in application of the above provisions will inspect all concerns which are so equipped as to make it possible for them to produce war material. Machinery and plant suitable for the purpose is to be removed.

Article 4. To obtain permission to produce war material, the entrepreneur must be of French nationality. Companies must be directed by French nationals, and the majority of the shares must be in French hands.

Article 5. Undertakings accorded permission to produce war material must notify the Government authorities of all orders received, and many not execute the same without special permission for the purpose.

Article 6. The inspecting authorities have access to the premises of undertakings which have permission to produce war material. The latter must afford access to any plant they are required to show.

Article 7. Undertakings with permission to produce war material must furnish schedules of the orders received and the position in regard to their execution at dates to be specified by the inspecting authorities.

Article 8. In order to enable profits to be ascertained, undertakings subject to supervision must keep books showing the costs of production. Expenditure on entertainment and similar objects and on advertisement must be shown separately.

Article 9. War material may not be imported or exported without Government permission.

Article 10. Firms engaging in the import or export of war material must have special Government permission, which is subject to revocation at any moment. Their profits and their expenditure on entertainment and similar objects and advertisements will be subject to supervision.

Article 11.

Article 12.

Article 13. To facilitate the execution of current regulations in regard to expropriation in the case of discoveries having an important bearing on National Defence, undertakings subject to supervision are required to inform the Government authorities of all discoveries and improvements.

Article 14. Permission to produce war material may be withdrawn in the event of offences against the above provisions.

Article 15.

On October 17th 1936 the French Air Minister further ordered the nationalisation of all factories and works of any importance in connection with military aircraft. For the construction of aircraft there are in future to be four companies. Each of these four new State companies for the manufacture of aircraft will be entrusted with the production of material for a particular district. At the sitting of the Army Committee of the Chamber on November 4th 1936, to which reference has already been made, the War Minister Daladier was insistent on the fact that strikes and occupations of works ("stay-in" strikes), such as have frequently taken place during the recent period of internal political tension, will under no circumstances be tolerated in the State armaments factories. Any delay in the production of armaments, he said, is a crime against the national security. France is called upon to make great sacrifices in the cause of National Defence, and cannot tolerate any delay in the process of national preparation. Amongst other measures, he added, the Brandt works, hitherto engaged mainly in the production of trench guns and armoured defence guns, have been transformed into a research institute; and a Bill is in preparation to create a nucleus of engineers and technicians (corps de maitrise) for the armaments industry.

France therefore is exerting every effort to push forward with the process of rearmament and, in the words of the resolution adopted by the Army Committee of the Chamber on November 13th 1936, "to strengthen the national defences to the utmost."

III. Moscow's road to Prague

The armaments of Czecho-Slovakia

"The Pact of Mutual Assistance of May 16th 1935, which followed close on the heels of the Franco-Russian Pact of May 2nd, may be relatively cautious in its wording; but its purpose is plain enough for any who have eyes to see. It is the complement of the Franco-Russian Alliance, without which the latter is without practical value. The mighty Bolshevik State is enabled by it to thrust itself some hundreds of kilometres further into the heart of Europe. Czecho-Slovakia, taking (as ever) her policy from France, has assumed the risk of making herself the spring-board of the Soviet Union in Europe, the area for the concentration of her Allies' military forces, and the practice-ground for the penetration of the moral values of Bolshevism."

The preceding sentences, taken from the Frankfurter Zeitung of June 26th 1935, are a pertinent description of the significance of the Alliance between Moscow and Prague.

The political aim of Czecho-Slovakia, a State made up of the most heterogeneous fragments of the former Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy, is the maintenance of the national frontiers as determined in the Peace Treaties after the conclusion of the World War. Czecho-Slovakia's efforts for their maintenance are in her eyes threatened by the fact that Germany and Hungary are her neighbours. Her argument as given to the world is always based on military considerations, though the facts are against her; for neither of the two countries named have ever made even the slightest attempt in the course of the 18 years for which the frontiers of Czecho-Slovakia have existed to menace them by the adoption of military dispositions—unnatural as the line of these frontiers undoubtedly is. The real reason for the sense of insecurity of the Czecho-Slovak State is to be found in the fact that the frontier-line was drawn in defiance of geographical and national affinities. The large minorities—there are 3.5 million Sudete Germans, 750,000 Hungarians, 462,000 Ruthenes and 75,000 Poles as compared with 8.7 million Czechs and Slovaks—are the best proof that this is so, while the fact that with a total length of nearly 1,000 kilometres the State has only an average width of 200 kilometres speaks for itself. For the maintenance therefore of her national frontiers to which (as stated) Czecho-Slovakia looks as her political aim, the only resort is thought to be a policy of extreme and one-sided military defence measures. This attitude on the part of Czecho-Slovakia has from the first been determined, and still is determined, by the powerful political and military influence of France: Czecho-Slovakia is the strongest base of French military policy on the Eastern frontier of Germany.

A Secret Treaty between the representatives of France and Czecho-Slovakia for mutual military support and political cooperation between the two countries was concluded directly after the War in 1918. It was directed primarily against Germany, since it was provided that it was to be operative "in the event of the peace of Central Europe being endangered by Germany, or the Articles of the Versailles Treaty not being observed, or disturbances taking place within Germany, or steps being taken by Germany to rearm." Special stipulations were also included for military cooperation in the event of union of Austria with Germany. In 1921 the Secret Treaty was extended by the inclusion of Czecho-Slovakia in the Franco-Polish Military Alliance, the point of which was also directed against Germany. In 1924 Czecho-Slovakia further concluded a Treaty of Friendship and Alliance with France; and the Guarantee Pact of Locarno of 1925 also served to cement the relations between the two countries. At the same time, in order to have a backing on the South against Hungary, who had never ceased to uphold her demand for revision of the forcible provisions of the Treaty of Trianon, Czecho-Slovakia combined with Roumania and Yugoslavia in the Little Entente: she had already concluded a treaty with Yugoslavia four years before in 1920—21 for military cooperation in the event of Hungarian aggression. Furthermore, she extended her relations with Poland, with whom she had had an understanding since 1921 for the observance of "mutual benevolent neutrality", by the conclusion in 1925 of special Agreements with a view to common action against Germany in the event of German aggression. Disputes with Poland, which have been increasingly frequent in recent years, and above all the example set by France, led Czecho-Slovakia finally in May 1935 to conclude the Military Alliance with the U.S.S.R., under which she becomes the field of concentration for the Soviet military forces—a fact which no assertions to the contrary on the Czecho-Slovak side can alter.

Czecho-Slovakia is a particularly striking example of the close and direct connection between the foreign and the military policy of a country. Following the example of France and the U.S.S.R., Czecho-Slovakia has engaged in recent years in a policy of rearmament, which is supposed to safeguard and ensure the peace of Europe but in reality serves only, as the example of France and the U.S.S.R. shows, to create new political tension which is bound to endanger peace. In the first Army order issued after Masaryk's retirement by the newly elected President of the Republic, Dr. Beneš, in his capacity as Commander-in-Chief of the Czecho-Slovak Defence forces, it is stated that "all the necessary steps are being taken to keep pace with the chief countries of Europe and to finish the work and complete the preparations devolving on us at the earliest possible date". The sense of the above remarks of the President of the Republic was underlined by the Minister for National Defence by the unmistakeable addition of the words "Let us see to it that we are prepared!" Colonel Moravec of the Czecho-Slovak General Staff in his book "War possibilities and the Campaign in Abyssinia" which appeared at the end of 1925 was even more explicit. He wrote:

"Future wars will begin, without declaration of war, by the invasion of motorised units. Czecho-Slovakia has therefore to take the necessary preparatory action in order to make the frontiers impassable for mechanised arms, and to train and equip her peace forces for fighting with mechanised formations. A wall of fortresses must be erected on the frontier on the lines of the French girdle of fortresses on the Franco-German frontier: the number of aerodromes must be increased: the airsheds must be camouflaged; and centres of importance must be evacuated so as to leave no objective for the initial attack from the air. Czecho-Slovakia is the strong point thrust forward into the foreground of the line of battle of the Little Entente, and as such is also the link between the U.S.S.R. and France. The garrison of this fortress must be under arms within a few hours of the outbreak of war, and must be able to hold out until help is at hand from the Soviet Ally".

The special importance which Colonel Moravec attaches to the armament and training of mechanised units receives every consideration in the armament of the Czecho-Slovak Army. No small progress has been made in the course of the last two years in this connection. Until the last two years the Czecho-Slovak Army had only one battalion of armoured cars: it has now an establishment of 3 armoured car regiments and one battalion of motor vehicles, while the number of tanks has been brought up to about 200. The mechanisation of the Artillery has also made progress. Of 16 light artillery regiments, one more has been mechanised, so that there are now 4 mechanised light artillery regiments in all in reserve. Part of the heavy artillery is also in process of being mechanised. The extra-heavy Artillery and the anti-aircraft artillery are already mechanised. A number of machine gun companies are to follow suit. Latterly, following the French example, there is a movement in favour of completely mechanised Divisions, of which there have hitherto been none in the Czecho-Slovak Army. As a beginning, large formations are to be motorised in the near future, civilian cars being used extensively for the purpose. Legislative action to encourage the production of civilian motor vehicles is promised with this object. The newspaper Ceske Slovo published some remarkable comments by leading personages in the political and economic world at the beginning of 1936 on the coming motorisation of Czecho-Slovakia. The Premier Dr. Hodža complained of the slow progress made in this direction, and asserted that the motor vehicles at present available were too old to be of much use for the purposes of national defence. He urged accordingly the need for motorisation of the country on a grand scale, and announced the impending introduction of a law to develop motor traffic. Representatives of the military element also urged the national duty of increasing the numbers of motor vehicles, and in particular motor lorries, in the interest of national defence.

The second demand of the General Staff officer already quoted (Colonel Moravec) for the erection of a "wall of fortresses on the frontier on the lines of the French girdle of fortresses on the Franco-German frontier" has also met with an enthusiastic response in Czecho-Slovakia. No modern fortifications being available, a beginning has been made with the protection of the most important points in the country by barriers. These barrier fortifications are said to be needed because it "is not possible to cover all needs by attack: there are cases where defence is indicated". A sufficiently clear admission that the armaments of Czecho-Slovakia are not intended merely for defence, but are on the contrary designed in at least equal measure for attack! From the observations of the Minister for National Defence it may be gathered that it is intended to fortify the most important lines of entry into the country, especially on the Northern frontier against Germany, by fortress constructions. Hungarian Press reports state that the construction of these fortresses—i.e. of the Czech "Maginot line"—has already begun at Grulich on the border of the County of Glatz. The line is to stretch from this point South-West via Schildberg-Zwittau-Policka, and then over the Bohemian-Moravian plateau as far as Iglau, and East over the Altvater Mountains and the Hutschin district via Troppau-Ostrau as far as Teschen. In addition to these fortifications, which are known as the second line of defence, there is to be a first line of defence running parallel to the Erzgebirge and the Riesengebirge from the neighbourhood of Pardubitz North-West via Gitschin to Turnau, where it turns South-West via Melnik-Kladno to Pilsen. The valley of the Waag is intended to serve as a third base, so that the ridge of the Lesser Carpathians will bear the brunt of the defence.

Great strategic importance also attaches to the development of the road and railway system of Czecho-Slovakia, work on which has recently been speeded up. The Minister for National Defence said in this connection: "The chief requirement is the acceleration of the work proceeding for the improvement of the system of communications in certain parts of Slovakia and the construction of communications between Moravia and Slovakia. The Army Administration is particularly concerned to create long distance road communications, which are in the economic as well as in the military interest of the country. Up to the present only a few beginnings have been made with the expansion of the road system." It will be gathered from the above remarks that the chief problems in the case of the road system are thought to consist in the creation of passages across the Western Carpathians and the development of road communications in Slovakia. Similar considerations govern the problem of railway development. The Ministry of National Defence drew up a joint plan with the Railway Ministry in 1935 for the "extension of the railway system by the construction of new main lines in accordance with economic and defence requirements". It was specifically stated in this connection that "the Army Administration was specially interested in the quickest possible completion of the whole plan for the extension of the railway system", particularly in the matter of the double-tracking of existing railways as well as in the building of new lines. In the summer of 1936 the new Slovak line Cervena Skala-Margecany had already been opened to traffic. It forms a second connection from West to East in central Slovakia in addition to the former main line from Sillein (Zsolna) to Kaschau (Košice). Other lines, on which work has already been begun, will afford improved communication between the valleys of the March and the Waag and between Bohemia and Moravia.

In this connection attention must be drawn to the fact that, according to an announcement made by the Roumanian Finance Minister Antonescu in August 1936, 95 millions of the Kč. 200,000,000 loan which Roumania recently obtained from Czecho-Slovakia is to be used for the development of the railway connections between the two countries. As there is already a good direct railway connection between Prague and Bucharest through Slovakia via Kaschau, it is assumed in political circles in Bucharest that the 95 millions will be used, not for the development of existing rail connections, but for the construction of a new line from the Czecho-Roumanian frontier to the Roumano-Soviet frontier straight across the Bukovina. The French paper L'Œuvre was able to report in the middle of July 1936 that the Roumanian Cabinet had decided to give Czecho-Slovakia permission to build a short railway of the kind indicated through the Bukovina to link up the Czecho-Slovak railway system with that of the U.S.S.R. L'Œuvre described this concession as a symptom of Soviet penetration into the basin of the Danube, and as a reply to the Austro-German Treaty of July 11th 1936.

But this is not the only field in which Czecho-Slovakia is endeavouring to establish as close connections as possible with the Soviet Union. The importance of Czecho-Slovakia as a point d'appui for the Air forces of the Red Army in any future war is best shown by the feverish activity displayed by Czecho-Slovakia in the development of modern aerodromes and the reorganisation and expansion of her military Air arm. The character of the Czecho-Slovakian Air arm is out and out offensive. Construction centres on bombing and fighting types as the main arm. The existing stocks of aircraft in the possession of Czecho-Slovakia are as follows:

Number of companies	Number of planes
12 short distance reconnaissance	(about) 180
6 long distance reconnaissance	" 60
12 fighter	" 145
8 heavy fighter	" 120
8 day bomber	" 80
9 night bomber	" 55
and
1 defence flight	" 10
<hr/>
making a total of 1st line planes	(about) 650
Add second line planes	" 720
and 1 Gendarmerie Aircraft Section	" 80
Total present aircraft	about 1,450 planes

The personnel of the Air arm amounts to some 10,000 men. The number of air regiments was increased during 1936 from 6 to 7. Two new air regiments are to be formed. The bomber regiments constitute a separate brigade. In war they and the greater part of the fighter formations are to be placed at the disposal of the Supreme Command for offensive operations, while the reconnaissance formations are assigned to the separate Army Commands. The Air arm is under the direct orders of the Minister of Air Defence, whereas the Air Defence force consisting principally of anti-aircraft artillery does not form part of the Air arm and is under the provincial Commands in Prague, Brünn, Pressburg and Kaschau. The Air Defences have at present 4 anti-aircraft regiments of 3 Sections each (each Section consisting of 2 batteries), as well as 4 searchlight batteries and a number of emplaced batteries for the protection of industries against air attack. For tactical purposes the country is divided into four Air Defence districts, each a separate Command, viz. Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia and Western Slovakia. In addition to the existing schools for pilots, a number of centres were founded last year for the training of young airmen, the object being (as in the case of the Masaryk Air League, an organisation founded in 1935 under Government control) to stimulate the interest of the young in the possibilities of the air. Since the beginning of 1935 civilian flying has also been brought into the service of the preparation for war. The construction of airports is being vigorously pushed forward. By the spring of 1936 the number of airports already totalled 33. Since then 23 airports have been planned and in part constructed in the area East of the Moldau and South of the Elbe alone, i.e. in the area bounded by the Bohemian and Moravian frontier ranges. The existing depots of petrol have been increased by the construction of new crude oil depots at Pressburg (Bratislava), Kralup, Prague, Olmütz (Olomouc) and elsewhere. All these constructional operations go far beyond the limits of the national requirements, and are explicable only in the light of the close military cooperation of Czecho-Slovakia with France and Soviet Russia. How close that cooperation has become in the course of the past year may be gathered from the following statement of facts.

The French General Staff instructed General Schweisguth to intimate to Prague that France would welcome the introduction of U.S.S.R. officers as instructors for the technical branches of the Air arm. Accordingly in January 1936 a body of 24 Soviet officers were sent to Czecho-Slovakia, followed by another detachment of 48 officers in May. They have been employed mainly in connection with the Air arm, but also in technical establishments and for instructional purposes. A Joint Supreme Command for the air forces of France, the U.S.S.R. and Czecho-Slovakia stationed in the last named country in case of war is to be established with a Frenchman as the holder of the post. At the instance of the Soviet Air Commission, 36 new aerodromes are to be constructed in Czecho-Slovakia for use on mobilisation. They will have only one runway to begin with. In March 1936 a Commissary came specially from Moscow to propose to Czecho-Slovakia that certain cadres of the Soviet Air Force should be moved to Czecho-Slovakia at once. A Soviet company has erected large camps in Slovakia with spare parts for aircraft. Not less than 50 motors are to be always available in each camp. There is an air services three times a week over the line Kiev-Uzhhorod Nitra: it is used almost exclusively by the military and for diplomatic bags. The former Soviet Military Attaché Surik spent three weeks in company with Major Porman and the Czecho-Slovak Major Linai visiting the aerodromes under construction at Uzhhorod Nitra, Rachod, Kaschau (Košice), Sillein (Zsolna), and Munkacs (Mukačevo); work on these aerodromes began in the summer of 1936. In Munkacs there are already two sheds, each 2,480 metres square, and one shed 4,280 metres square which is nearly finished. Similar sheds are being erected in the other aerodromes. Roumania has also allowed Soviet war aircraft to use the airport at Czernowitz (Cernăuți). The U.S.S.R. proposes in the event of war to send not less than the following numbers of aircraft to the support of Czecho-Slovakia in the air: 1 squadron of 30 reconnaissance planes, 3 squadrons each of 30 bombing planes, 1 special formation of 9 heavy bombers and 3 squadrons comprising a total of 324 fighting planes. The above particulars are taken from foreign sources: it may be added that since the beginning of 1936 military and civilian deputations from the U.S.S.R. have been noticeably active in Czecho-Slovakia.

Prague has issued denials of all the above assertions, in particular those with regard to the erection of Soviet aircraft bases on Czecho-Slovak soil. The unfortunate thing is that on the Soviet side there is no such reticence! A Russian paper Na Strana actually published a map on February 8th 1936 in which it was unkind enough to show "New air bases in Czecho-Slovakia". The bases marked on the map were Munkacs (Mukačevo), Ungvár (Uzhhorod), Kaschau (Košice), Pressburg (Bratislava), Olmütz (Olomouc), Brünn (Brno), Iglau (Iglava), Pardubitz (Pardubice), Reichenberg (Liberec), Prague, Budweis (České Budejovice), Pilsen (Plzen), Karlsbad (Karlove Vary) and Eger (Cheb). Points d'appui also under construction are shown in Rahov, Pistyan, Weinern and Trenčín.

Czecho-Slovakia has also been busy developing her Army on very extensive lines. The two-year period of active service, which was first introduced in December 1934, was carried into practical effect for the first time in 1935: the previous period of service had been 14 months only. The main reason put forward for the introduction of the two-year service was the desire to have a larger standing army permanently with the colours so as (amongst other things) to facilitate mobilisation. The effective strength of the Army, including the Gendarmerie which is organised on purely military lines, was thus increased from 137,000 to 202,000 men. The former cadre units with the exception of one Infantry battalion and one Artillery Section have been strengthened to form Infantry Divisions. The peace strengths of the former active Army units have also been considerably increased, while there is a complete change in the military area organisation as a result of the provisional appointment of 7 Corps Commanders. Of the new Army Corps, 2 are in Bohemia, 2 in Moravia, 2 in Western Slovakia, and one in Eastern Slovakia. The number of professional officers, which is at present over 10,000, is to be increased. In 1935 one horsed Artillery Section, 2 Telegraph battalions and one Motor battalion were added to the establishment in addition to the 3 armoured car regiments of which mention has already been made: the Minister for National Defence further took occasion in the Defence Committee of the House of Deputies to announce his intention of raising new Cavalry regiments in Slovakia as a part of the extremely comprehensive armament programme for 1936. The technical armament of the Army is to be strengthened by an increase in the number of tanks and Air Defence machine guns in the case of the Infantry and by the equipment of the Cavalry with these heavy Infantry arms. In addition, the anti-aircraft artillery is to be expanded, and the Artillery is to be armed with the new 8 cm. field gun M 30.

The present Czecho-Slovak Army is made up of:

- 7 Army Corps (the Corps Commands date from the end of 1935, until which time there were no Army Corps),
- 12 Infantry Divisions of 2 Infantry brigades each, composed of 4 Infantry regiments each,
- 2 Mountain brigades,
- 4 Cavalry brigades.

It is announced that certain Divisions will be mechanised.

Increased attention is being paid to the training of the troops. Soviet officers are frequently employed in this connection. A military display on a scale which for a small country like Czecho-Slovakia is enormous took place in 1935, when all 12 Infantry Divisions and all 4 Cavalry brigades took part in the manoeuvres with a view to their instruction. The Corps organisation was also given its first trial on this occasion. The 1936 Autumn Manoeuvres were the largest that have ever taken place in Czecho-Slovakia. Considerably over 100,000 men of all arms took part in them. The object of the manoeuvres, as officially announced, was to test the results of the year's training by the practical co-operation of the Army, the semi-military forces and the civilian population. In order to make the manoeuvres as like war as possible, the Railways, the Posts, the Civil Service and the whole population of Eastern Bohemia, the theatre of manoeuvre, were brought into the scheme of operations. The Divisions had already been organised in 3 Infantry regiments (in lieu of the former 4 Infantry regiments) in the 1935 manoeuvres. The new formation will probably be retained in case of war, when it is proposed to constitute a field army twice the strength of the peace army. The field army is to be composed of some 32 Divisions of Infantry, each consisting of 3 Infantry regiments, 2 Mountain Divisions, 4 Cavalry brigades and strong Army troops such as heavy, medium and light mechanised Artillery, 3 armoured car regiments, anti-aircraft artillery, Pioneer and Signals formations and so on with an armament of some 9,000 light and 3,500 heavy machine guns, and 800 light guns, 200 anti-aircraft guns and 450 heavy guns. As replacement and garrison troops have to be added to the numbers of the (duplicated) active forces and the large Army troop units and Supply formations, it may be assumed that the initial war strength of the Army of operations will be from 700,000 to 800,000 men. The total number of trained reserves is put by the Czecho-Slovak Press at 2,700,000 men.

Nothing is so illustrative of the immense efforts made by Czecho-Slovakia in connection with armaments as the extraordinary increase of the Army Estimates in the 1936-37 Budget. The official expenditure therein stated shows an increase from Kč. 1,595 millions in 1935-36 to Kč. 2,015 millions in 1936-37, i.e. an increase of some 25 per cent! But the figure Kč. 2,015 millions has to be increased by other expenditure, which appears in the budgets of other Ministries but is none the less devoted exclusively to the needs of the Army and the national defence. The Kč. 290 millions of expenditure on the Gendarmerie must also be reckoned in with the expenditure on the Army in view of the military character of the Czecho-Slovak Gendarmerie. The total expenditure on the Army and national defence thus attains a figure which cannot be much under 3 milliards of Czech crowns! That total represents some 35 per cent of the entire Czecho-Slovak Budget for 1936-37, as compared with a proportion of 25 per cent in the preceding year.

To finance the process of rearmament at even more rapid rates, a Law was brought in by the Government in the spring of 1936 for the issue of an internal National Defence Loan of unlimited amount, redeemable in 50 years with taxation facilities for subscribers. The Explanatory Statement attached to the Law stated that the present political situation was such as to call for a powerful modernised national defence force, and such a force called for exceptional outlay which could not be met out of normal budgetary resources. The Chamber and Senate passed the Law on May 27th and 29th respectively. The subscriptions to the Loan brought in a total of Kč. 2,568,000,000. This amount has to be added to the Kč. 2,015,000,000 of the Ordinary Budget for the current year and the Armaments Fund (of Kč. 315,000,000 annually till 1947) which was voted on a previous occasion, if a correct picture of the gigantic armaments expenditure of Czecho-Slovakia is to be obtained.

A comparative statement of the separate items of expenditure shows the points at which the chief increases are to be found:

	(in millions of Czech crowns)
Air	58.2	58.2	87.4
Engineers	4.4	6.3	8.3
Telegraph and Telephone . .	6.9	10.9	37.1
Mechanisation	25.1	35.3	80.2
Artillery armament	1.8	2.2	23.3

The Czecho-Slovak Law concerning the Defence of the State of May 15th 1936 represents a legislative achievement which, in substance and scope, is unparalleled in the past history of States. It covers every conceivable potentiality in connection with the totalitarian mobilisation of the nation and State for purposes of defence. The first three measures in execution of the Law concerning the Defence of the State were issued on June 22nd. The first of these declares 140 Districts to be Frontier Districts, in which the military authorities are given extraordinarily extended powers. In Bohemia there are 55 such Frontier Districts, in Moravia and Silesia 22, in Slovakia 51, and in Carpathian Ruthenia 12. From the nationalist standpoint the measure is directed principally against the German and Hungarian minorities. Economic activities are restricted right and left in the Frontier Districts. Without the approval of the military authorities, for example, it is forbidden to erect public buildings, to build roads or streets, to manufacture arms or munitions, to establish metallurgical or chemical factories or to construct water power or electrical works. The whole of the Forest Administration is placed under military control. The second executive measure places the whole of the trade in arms with foreign countries under the supervision of the military authorities. The third executive measure regulates the taking over by the military of patents and permits of military importance.

The Ministry of National Defence is further empowered to declare particular cities and places fortified places, in which case the Army receives extended powers within a radius of 10 kilometres.

Lastly by an Emergency Decree of November 1th 1936 the Government created a "State Defence Guard", which must be regarded as a permanently available frontier defence formation of a military character, inasmuch as it is organised and trained on military lines and its members are subject to military law. Its special duty is to protect the inviolability of the national frontiers—by which is meant the permanent occupation and guard of the frontier fortifications erected, or to be erected, on the frontiers under the Law concerning the Defence of the State. This is tantamount to the creation of a special military formation for the frontier districts, the strength of which is still undetermined, over and above the active Army and the Gendarmerie.

When the King of Roumania paid his visit to the Czecho-Slovak President at the end of October 1936, His Majesty according to a report published by the French paper L'Oeuvre said that it was no part of the Roumanian Government's intentions to restrict the defence potentialities at the disposal of Czecho-Slovakia or, for that matter, the Little Entente in the event of an aggression coming under the provisions of the Czecho-Slovak Military Agreement with the Soviet Union. At the same time, he added, the Roumanian Government was not anxious to see Czecho-Slovakia become the scene of an intrusion of the Red Army into Central Europe, or the focus of Soviet propaganda in the heart of Europe: any such development would threaten to disturb the peaceful basis of the Little Entente. So much for the King of Roumania. But a very different view is taken by the General Staff Colonel Moravec in his study of war, to which reference is made above. Colonel Moravec writes:

"The stronger morale is based on progress, and progress is found in the States with democratic or Bolshevik Constitutions—that is to say, in the States which are under Soviet or French leadership. The weaker morale is found in the States with Fascist dictatorships—that is to say, Germany, Italy and Japan. Czecho-Slovakia has taken her place with the progressive bloc, in whose keeping her future is safe, the bloc (that is) of the satisfied States who are the guarantee of the world and peace in presence of the land-hungry, unruly, war-loving peoples."

IV. The introduction of two-year military service in Germany

In an interview which he gave to a representative of the Figaro on the occasions of the diplomats' meeting in Paris which followed on the Funeral ceremonies in London, the Czecho-Slovak Premier, Dr. Hodža, denied that the Pacts of Mutual Assistance had any hostile character, and insisted that they left the door open for others to come in. But he added in a pregnant sentence that "Germany will cease to constitute a permanent menace on the day she finds herself faced with a strong wall both on the East and on the West."

It would be difficult to find a more pertinent description of the sense and object of these Pacts.

What is happening in Soviet Russia will in any case be of the first order of importance in view of the political combinations—i. e. the deliberately anti-German system of Pacts—with which recent developments in Russia are bound up. But the significance of these developments is enhanced by the accompanying military phenomena which presuppose the existence of understandings of a very intimate nature indeed.

It is common knowledge that the Pacts of Mutual Assistance are based on previously prepared plans of the General Staffs concerned. The Press in the countries concerned has not failed to give the necessary publicity by beating the war-drums to the visits for study or manoeuvres of French, Czecho-Slovak and Soviet officers and officials between Paris, Prague and Moscow, Moscow, Prague and Paris, Prague and Paris, Prague and Moscow, and so on.

No one was entitled to object when Germany proceeded to draw the moral of the political aspects of the new Alliance, and to shake off the burden of the disadvantage at which she was placed in the demilitarised zone, which events had rendered no longer tolerable either in the political or in the military sense.

But the Soviet Government's Decree of August 11th 1936, which startled the world just after the meeting of the Locarno Powers which was supposed to be aimed at a general relief of tension, could not pass unnoticed by the German Government, since its effect was to bring the Russian peace-time Army up to nearly four times the strength of the German peace-time Army. Hence the Law of August 24th 1936 introducing the two-year period of military service.

The situation of the previous year was repeated. In the spring of 1935 Germany, having for years deferred all attempts to bring her armaments up to the level of those of other Powers, did not take her decision on March 16th to introduce compulsory military service until she had found that all her offers of general and comprehensive disarmament were in vain. In the same way on the present occasion the decision to increase the period of military service was not taken until corresponding action had taken place on the part of other Powers.

When France introduced two-year service in 1935, General de Cugnac said: "The two-year military service is not merely necessary for our security. It may save us a war. If France does not have the courage to impose a longer period of service on her sons, she will create the impression that she is of those peoples who have not sufficient energy to defend themselves. By resort in all calm to the two-year period France is giving expression to her will not to admit any enemy to her territory. The possessor of fortresses, of war material, of powerful armies gives outward and visible signs of his determination to be master in his own house and to ward off attack from whatever quarter it may come. That is the best way, the only possible way, of making clear to others that invasion will not pay."

These observations of the well-known French military writer appear to us the best justification of the German action, which once again has done away with conditions of one-sided military superiority that could not fail to give rise to grave anxieties both from the standpoint of German security and from the standpoint of the European situation as a whole.

Moscow's penetration into the Danubian and Balkan area

I. The attitude of Roumania

The introduction of the Soviet Union into the field of European politics, and into Central and South-Eastern Europe in particular, has naturally not been without its effect on the other countries in this part of the world, especially the two other partners of the Little Entente—namely, Roumania and Jugoslavia. Here again the action taken by Belgium has not been without influence. It has strengthened the latent opposition both in Roumania and in Jugoslavia to closer relations, or even to any relations at all, with the Soviet Union.

A glance at the map is sufficient to show that there is one gap in the Paris-Moscow-Prague system of Pacts; and the gap is Roumania. So long as Poland will not take a hand—and of a change in Polish policy there is at present not a sign—and the bridge between the Dniester and the short Czecho-Slovak—Roumanian frontier strip is not assured, the Pacts system is (so to say) somewhat in the air. To bring this "stratospheric system of agreements", as it has often been called, down to Roumanian earth was, and still is, the aim of the diplomacy of the three Powers. There was a possibility in the time of the former Roumanian Foreign Minister Titulescu, whose sudden throwing overboard from the Tatarescu Cabinet at the end of August 1936 came as a general surprise, that these efforts would be successful. In December 1935 Titulescu had described the Russian friendship as a geographical necessity for the defence of the Dniester frontier. But these geographical references touched the weak spot in the policy of Russo-Roumanian rapprochement—namely, the still unsolved problem of Bessarabia, the Roumanian sovereignty of which Russia persistently refuses to recognise: and without an explicit guarantee of Roumanian territory, including Bessarabia, even Titulescu appears to have been unwilling to conclude a Pact of Mutual Assistance on the Prague model, as appears from a statement which he made in July 1936 to a representative of the Roumanian paper Universul. But he took occasion at the same time to refer back to the statement he had made in 1935, and added that a "political rapprochement with the U.S.S.R., which is already allied with the Allies of Roumania, is the best means of making existing relations with our Allies effective." It would appear however that Titulescu's great skill in the handling of foreign policy failed him when he came up against the crucial problem—the problem (it may be) of the destiny of the Roumanian race—of the maintenance of the independence and security of the Roumanian State in presence of the expansive efforts of the Bolshevik colossus. The unconditional alignment of Roumania with the policy of Paris was bound to be questioned when Paris allied herself with Roumania's traditional adversary, and Prague hastened to follow suit and join the Alliance. At any rate Titulescu fell in face of the opposition of the King, the Premier Tatarescu and the General Staff.

But, before he fell, he was able nevertheless to bind his country more closely to the countries of the Pacts system. At the beginning of April 1936 an Agreement was signed in Bucharest between Roumania, the U.S.S.R. and Czecho-Slovakia with regard to air traffic between Moscow and Prague, under which the Roumanian aerodromes at Jassy and Cluj (Klausenburg) were thrown open to use by Soviet aircraft. The military significance of such an Agreement is sufficiently obvious. It enabled the U.S.S.R. to camouflage the transfer of aircraft in peace-time from the Ukraine to Czecho-Slovakia, where (as already stated in connection with the armaments of the last-named) aerodromes have already been built, or are under construction, for the purpose. That this assumption is not without substance is shown by the fact that, according to a Press statement in Bucharest in August 1936, representatives of the Air Forces of Roumania, Czecho-Slovakia, France and the Soviet Union were to meet at a Conference to arrange for uniform air action in the future. In the middle of July 1936 the Ceuvre announced that the Roumanian Cabinet had given its assent to the construction of a railway connection by Czecho-Slovakia through the Bukovina to the Soviet railway system in the Ukraine. There are no economic, traffic or trade grounds for the construction of the line; and the Czecho-Slovak and Soviet Press accordingly gave prominence to the high strategic value of such a connection between the two countries. The Roumanian Legation in Berlin in the meanwhile issued a denial of the existence of any such proposal! The proposal is to build a double-tracked line from Czernowitz to Mohilev, which represents the shortest way between Czecho-Slovakia and the U.S.S.R. without passing over Polish territory. The proposed "Red Express", as was pointed out by a Hungarian General Staff officer, Colonel Nyiry (retd.), in the Hungarian papers Nemzeti Ujsag and Uj Nemzedek at the end of August 1936, opens a way into the heart of Europe and constitutes the greatest possible danger to peace. The purpose of the proposed line can only be to facilitate the influx of Soviet troops into Central Europe.

It goes without saying that the transference of Roumania's foreign policy to the hands of the former Finance Minister Antonescu does not represent any change in the matter of the opposition to Hungary's revisionist claims. On this subject both King Carol and Antonescu have taken every opportunity in the last three months to restate their standpoint in respect of the inviolability of the Roumano-Hungarian frontier. Antonescu went so far as to repeat Titulescu's formula that "Revision means War". "There is no question therefore of any loosening of the links represented by the Alliance with France of June 10th 1926, the Alliance with Czecho-Slovakia of April 23rd 1921, the Alliance with Yugoslavia of June 7th 1920, and the Statute of Organisation of the Little Entente of February 16th 1933. The change is rather in the direction of a fuller appreciation of the true interests of the country, a certain divergence in the approach to current problems and a greater freedom of action. The results are apparent in the resumption of the connection with Warsaw, the strands of which Titulescu had severed, and the attempts to rehabilitate the Roumanian-Polish Treaty of March 26th 1926, which in its original form was directed against the U.S.S.R. Perhaps it may be said that there is now a disposition to replace the Moscow orientation which Paris and Prague would like to see by a judicious attitude on the lines of Poland and Yugoslavia of the cross-bench order.

The above observations point the moral of the decisive importance of Roumania for France and her Allies in the accomplishment of their political and military aims. The importance, which would in any case attach to a country whose geographical position makes it the bridge between the Soviet Union and Czecho-Slovakia, is intensified by the circumstance that so far as numbers go Roumania is the strongest military Power in the Balkans. To maintain and strengthen the national integrity is "the country's highest task", as the King and Premier were at pains on more than one occasion to point out after the introduction of the Defence Estimates for 1935-36 with a total of no less than $6\frac{1}{2}$ milliards of lei or 28.5 per cent of the total Budget. The Defence Estimates for 1936-37 show an increase to $7\frac{1}{2}$ milliards or about 33 per cent of the Ordinary Budget. They include appropriations of 2.6 milliards for new armaments and 1.3 milliard for the Air Force. But these sums were not sufficient for the completion of the rearmament programme; and an Economic Agreement was accordingly concluded with France in March 1936 for the delivery of French armament to Roumania to a value of 1.2 milliards of French francs. In return, Roumania has agreed according to the Parunka Vremie to cede her petroleum royalties to France for a period of twelve years. At the beginning of August 1936 Roumania concluded a new Agreement for the delivery of tanks with the Skoda Works in Czecho-Slovakia, the Czecho-Slovak Government at the same time according Roumania a credit of KČ. 200,000,000 in connection with the last Czecho-Slovak Armaments Loan. Negotiations are also proceeding at the present time between the Roumanian Government and the Skoda Works for the erection of a new explosives factory in Roumania with a view to closer cooperation between the armament industries of the two countries. A further Czecho-Slovak credit for Roumania of KČ. 500,000,000 was concluded, according to The Times, on January 20th 1937: it is to be used for war material to be obtained from Czecho-Slovak firms, as well as for the development of railways and roads on Roumanian territory which connect up with Czecho-Slovak railways and roads. Reference in this connection must further be made to the Roumanian Premier's recent announcement that the new Government proposes to devote itself with all its energy to the strengthening of the Defence forces, and that a new credit of 5 milliards of lei will be required for the purpose.

The reorganisation and modernisation of the Roumanian Army have made considerable progress recently as a result of the large armament credits and contracts for the delivery of war material. The Army, which is constitutionally a standing army based on compulsory service and organised on a territorial basis, has a peace strength of some 225,000 men, and is organised in peace in 7 Army Corps with 21 Infantry Divisions, 2 mountain rifle Divisions, 1 Guards Division, 4 Cavalry Divisions, and one corps of Gendarmerie and another of Frontier Defence guards. In war it should be able to put in the field an initial concentration of some 40 Divisions, viz. 35 Infantry and 5 Cavalry Divisions. In addition to the field army of the strength stated, Roumania can draw on some 1.5 million reinforcement troops for lines of communication and home service as well as for the replacement of gaps in the front line. The three youngest years of recruits can be called up by the War Minister without consulting Parliament. The aircraft at present comprise some 200 fighter planes, 230 reconnaissance planes and 50 bombers, i.e. in all 480 first line aircraft with some 800 second line aircraft. The anti-aircraft defences comprise 2 anti-aircraft regiments, while 2 searchlight companies and 8 anti-aircraft machine gun Sections are in process of formation. The reorganisation of the Artillery is already complete in its main lines. The peace-time Artillery consists of 323 batteries of light field guns and howitzers, 42 batteries of heavy guns and 16 batteries of anti-aircraft guns. The artillery armament consists of 1811 light and 168 heavy guns. A striking feature in the armament of the Artillery is the extensive experimental introduction of new gun types. In the Infantry, for example, the 40 and 47 mm. anti-tank defence guns of the Skoda Works and the double-barrelled 70/37 mm. gun of the same Works have been introduced. The Skoda 75 mm. mountain gun is at present under trial for the mountain Artillery. The Divisional Artillery is to have the Skoda 75 mm. field gun, 1928 model, and the new 105 mm. Schneider howitzer. The 150 mm. Skoda gun with a range of 23,650 metres and the 220 mm. mortar with a range of 15,000 metres have been introduced in the heavy Artillery. The anti-aircraft Artillery is armed with the 37 mm. Hotchkiss and the 76.5 mm. anti-aircraft gun from the Skoda Works. On the other hand the armament of the Infantry and the number of tanks are not up to modern standards. The peace cadres of the Divisions are only in part up to strength. Only 228 Infantry battalions are up to their full peace strength: they have some 4,000 light and 1,000 heavy machine guns. The Tank Corps consists at present of one regiment with a total of 90 tanks including second-line tanks. The rearmament of the Roumanian Army will therefore in all probability take the form in the near future of filling up gaps in the case of the several arms and bringing the stocks of arms and equipment up to standard.

II. The attitude of Yugoslavia

In contra-distinction to France, Czecho-Slovakia and Roumania, all of whom resumed diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union on June 9th 1934, Yugoslavia has not to date recognised the Moscow Government, and is accordingly opposed to any sort of connection with Communism. In view of her opposition to an Austrian restoration and the return of the Hapsburgs, Yugoslavia's attitude in the matter of her Alliances with France (November 11th 1927), Czecho-Slovakia (August 14th 1920) and Roumania (June 7th 1921) and her membership of the Little Entente is governed by the same considerations which condition the attitude of Roumania. But under the active individual governance of the country by the late King Alexander, who fell a victim to the assassin on October 9th 1935 in Marseilles, and the vigorous and energetic administration of Stojadinović, a distinct relief from the unconditional vassalage to France was induced. The course of the conflict in Abyssinia strengthened this tendency; and it was still further strengthened by the absence of any response to the protest which Belgrade and the other Powers of the Little Entente addressed to Paris on the occasion of the introduction of compulsory military service in Austria.

The first stage in this development is to be found in the Treaty of Friendship concluded between Yugoslavia and Poland in 1926, which has been followed, particularly of late, by a marked rapprochement between the two countries. At the end of May 1936, for example, important Agreements were concluded between the Foreign Ministers of the two countries, Colonel Beck and M. Stojadinović; and the striking observation was let fall in this connection that the two States would "never allow others, without us and without our cooperation on terms of equality, to decide as to our destiny." That reaction to the efforts of those who seek to direct and influence the natural course of development of peoples by reference to abstract doctrines or arbitrary political projects is altogether intelligible. It is the States of medium size which have the worst experiences in this connection. More than once they have had occasion to observe how frequently obligations incurred as a means of self-protection lose value as time goes on and assume the aspect of bonds of dependence, which conflict with the free development of national interests and may even obstruct such development altogether. It is only natural therefore to find an increasing recognition of the desire to revert to more reasonable methods of international cooperation. Recent visits of Roumanian, Turkish and Bulgarian statesmen to Belgrade should be interpreted in the light of these considerations. They are evidence no less of the political activity of Yugoslavia.

The policy of Balkan emancipation in pursuance of the murdered King Alexander's dying words "Keep watch over Yugoslavia!" has led, in addition to the closer relations with Poland and their corollary (since the fall of Titulescu) in the shape of increased friendliness with Roumania, to the preparation of better relations with Hungary, and at the end of December and beginning of January a reconciliation with Bulgaria. This last was the work primarily of King Boris and the late King Alexander and his successor the Prince Regent Paul. Pending publication of the text of the Agreement, it would be superfluous to discuss it in detail. But, inasmuch as it could never have been concluded under the provisions of the Statute of Organisation of the Little Entente and Balkan League of November 9th 1934—the members of the Balkan League are Yugoslavia, Roumania, Greece and Turkey—without the consent of all the parties to the two bodies in question, it is obvious that there was no side-stepping on the part of Yugoslavia, but that the object was to pave the way to a general understanding in the Balkans on the principle of the old saying "The Balkans for the Balkan peoples." The Agreement has since been signed (January 24th 1937).

The aspirations towards a general understanding in the Balkans were the basis of the Turkish efforts which led up to the Treaties with Bulgaria on October 18th 1925 and March 6th 1929 and, above all, the Treaty with Greece of October 30th 1930. Bulgarian opposition prevented the realisation of these aspirations for the time being; but the "eternal enmity" between Turkey and Greece was successfully converted into "eternal friendship."

The consent of Roumania and Greece to the new Agreement between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, having regard to the continued opposition of the former to the Bulgarian claims to the Dobrudja and of the latter to the Bulgarian demand for access to the Aegean, is clear evidence of the fact that Jugoslavian aspirations, if not yet realised, are well on the way to fruition. Much will depend on whether it is found possible in the middle of February, when the Permanent Council of the Little Entente and of the Balkan League meets, to reconcile the interests of the two bodies with those of Bulgaria or—as Belgrade and Ankara would like—to induce the Bulgarian Government to join the Balkan League.

A further problem of great importance for the Belgrade Government is the problem of Yugoslavia's relations with Rome. These are over-shadowed by the antagonism of the two countries in regard to the command of the Adriatic, Mussolini's "amarissimo mare" (his "most bitter sea"), and by Mussolini's encirclement policy embodied in the Treaties with Hungary, Austria and Albania. The tension between the two countries reached its highest point in the course of the Sanctions War against Italy, when Yugoslavia declared her readiness in the Mediterranean Agreement with England to accept the military consequences in the event of sanctions leading to conflict in the Mediterranean.

Two more recent developments appear however to justify hopes of "Peace in the Adriatic." The first of these is the new Italo-Yugoslav Commercial Agreement, which came into force on October 1st 1936 putting an end to the last vestiges of the unhappy sanctions era. The second is the Speech of the Duce at Milan, in which he said that the atmosphere as between Italy and Yugoslavia had greatly improved of late, and that the moral, political and economic conditions were now such as to afford a sufficient basis for the establishment of genuinely friendly relations between the two countries.

The Yugoslav Army ranks as the best in South Eastern Europe. The spirit of the Serbian soldiers especially is excellent, and the consolidation of the Army as a unitary body is increasingly noticeable. The peace strength is at present 148,000 men, including the Frontier Defence Force which is under the War Ministry with a strength of some 9,000 men and the Gendarmerie of some 20,000 men, which is under the Ministry of the Interior for purposes of administration and disposition but under the War Ministry for purposes of training, discipline and reinforcement. The effective strength of the Army is considerably increased in summer by calling up reservists. The peace-time Army is organised in 5 Armies, each of which consists of 3 Infantry Divisions, one medium Artillery regiment and draft units. In addition there is a Guards Division composed of one Infantry regiment, one Cavalry brigade and one Field Artillery regiment, and 2 Cavalry Divisions. Each Infantry Division is composed of 3 to 4 Infantry regiments, 2 Field Artillery regiments and draft units. In all there are 58 Infantry regiments, viz. one Guard regiment, 56 line regiments and one Fortress Infantry regiment, with 158 battalions including 2 cyclist battalions. An Infantry regiment consists of 2 to 4 battalions and one Infantry gun Section: a battalion has 3 to one rifle companies and one machine gun company. A Cavalry Division consists of 2 brigades, each of 2 regiments, one cyclist battalion and one mounted Section. Altogether there are 40 squadrons including machine squadrons. The artillery of the peace-time Army is composed at present of 148 light, 45 heavy and 16 anti-aircraft batteries with a total of 832 light and 180 heavy guns. There are 46 companies with some 120 tanks and one gas battalion. There are some 43 land and 9 naval flights of aircraft with a total of about 830 first and second line aircraft.

The development of the Army has been impeded to no small extent by the financial difficulties with which Yugoslavia has had to contend ever since the formation of the Yugoslav State at the end of the war, and that, in spite of the fact that for years past 20 per cent and more of the total annual Budget—a very high percentage for a country like Yugoslavia—has gone towards the Defence expenditure. The Defence Estimates for 1936-37 amount to 2,309 milliard dinars as compared with 1,999 milliards in 1935-36. To this total there must be added a sum of 687 million dinars for non-recurrent expenditure on armaments. The increase in the Defence expenditure for the current year is therefore 997 million dinars. The increase is to be devoted mainly to covering the weak spot in the Army, namely the armament, especially of the Infantry, armoured troops and Air arm which is by no means up to modern standards and requires to be improved and completed. It was not therefore merely on financial grounds that modern technical weapons had to be dispensed with almost entirely at last year's manoeuvres. This year there are to be no manoeuvres, in order to enable the modernisation of the Army to be speeded up and the military situation pro tanto improved. Yugoslavia has been compelled in the past to rely to excess on the support of her Allies owing to the inadequacy of her own armaments production. The development of the native armaments industry is accordingly receiving increased attention. The copper works at Bor and the iron works at Zenica are to be expanded for the purpose. A recent decision of the Cabinet provides for the construction of 3,000 km. of new railways; and this very large extension of the existing railway system is based in no small measure on strategic considerations.

In time of war Yugoslavia can already command the services of 2.5 million trained troops, which will enable her to double her peace-time Army at the outset, provided there is no shortage of stocks of arms with which to equip the reservists. There are in addition formations of irregulars (the so-called "Sokols") which will be available in large numbers in the event of war: vigorous efforts are being made in connection with the training and military efficiency of these bodies.

III. The arming of Turkey

The Turkish defence forces which, unlike the armaments of the other States that suffered defeat in the World War, were not subjected to any restrictions in principle by the Treaty of Lausanne, have been built up in the course of the last twelve years by the energetic President of the Turkish Republic, Mustapha Kemal Pasha, in execution of the Law of January 14th 1924 concerning the Constitution of the Defence Force into a notable factor in the establishment of the authority of the Turkish State. What has been achieved in this direction could only have been achieved on the basis of a close internal concentration of the strength of the Turkish people by raising their morale and cultivating the national spirit. A long period of peace made possible the deliberate and consistent completion of this process of national revival; and Turkish foreign policy during the period made possible the maintenance of peace. A series of Treaties and Agreements with European and Asiatic peoples enabled Turkey to eliminate elements of danger which still subsisted as a legacy of the past in Asia Minor, in the Balkans and in the Mediterranean. Reference need only be made at this juncture to the following items in the list of treaties and Agreements so concluded.

A factor of decisive moment for the new-born Turkish Republic in its struggle against the Western Powers and Greece was the Treaty of Neutrality concluded with the U.S.S.R. in 1921. This Treaty embodied the revulsion, which was a feature of Moscow's policy at this time, against the imperialistic designs of Czarist Russia on Constantinople and the Straits. It was supplemented at a later date by a Naval Agreement and a Treaty of Alliance. The military character of the Turco-Soviet friendship was vividly illustrated by the participation of the Russian Marshals Voroshilov and Budenny in the decennial celebrations of the Turkish Republic. Since that time Turkey has taken a great part of her war material from the Soviet Union. But Turkey aspired also to rank as a European Power, and to play an active part in the political shaping of South-Eastern Europe. The conclusion under her auspices of the Balkan Pact in February 1934 was the fruit of these aspirations. The Pact is a Treaty of Security between Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia and Roumania for the maintenance of the status quo in the Balkans. Its intimate connection with the Statute of the Little Entente has also exercised a favourable influence on the relations of Turkey with France. Turkey has further been successful in the creation of a notable political standing for herself in the Mediterranean by constituting herself the centre of a group of small States bordering on the Aegean who aim at independence and freedom from the interference of the Great Powers. In the course of the Italian war in Abyssinia England approached this group of countries with a view to the conclusion of Naval Agreements as a backing for the English policy in the Mediterranean at the time; and Turkey took good political advantage of the occasion to free herself of the last vestiges of the restrictions imposed on her sovereignty in respect of the Straits — a legacy of the World War which had always been galling to Turkish national feeling. Under the new Straits Convention of Montreux of June 22nd 1936, which is concluded for a period of 20 years in the first instance, Turkey resumes military and political sovereignty over the Dardanelles, and with it the right, which was withheld from her in the Treaty of Lausanne, of re-fortifying the Straits. It is noticeable however in this connection that the Soviet disclaimer of former Czarist Russian policy in regard to the Straits, which figured in the Turco-Soviet Neutrality Treaty of December 17th 1925, was to a certain extent renewed in the Convention of Montreux, Article 16 of which was so worded — at the instance of the U.S.S.R. — as to limit the general prohibition of the passage of warships and auxiliary vessels of belligerent States through the Straits by a provision allowing passage in future in cases coming under Article 23 (contingencies arising in connection with League of Nations obligations), and cases arising under Pacts and Agreements concluded by Turkey within the limits of the Covenant of the League, even to warships and auxiliary vessels of belligerents.

On July 20th 1936, after the signature of the Montreux Convention, the zone of the Straits was again occupied by Turkish troops. The fortification of the Dardanelles has since been pushed forward vigorously. Chanak Kaleh is to be the Headquarters of a General officer's Command, and will be the site of the biggest Turkish wireless station. A strip of land 19 km. wide on both shores of the Dardanelles has already been declared a military zone. Aircraft may not fly over it except along specified routes fixed by the Government; and it may only be inhabited by Turkish nationals. The islands of Imbros and Tenedos are again being garrisoned. Another result of the recovery of Turkish sovereignty in the Dardanelles will probably be the building of a strategic railway connection with Gallipoli. No change has so far been made in the matter of the demilitarisation of the Turco-Greco-Bulgarian frontier zone. But in the meantime Turkey is making vigorous efforts in connection with the armament and development of her Defence forces.

The peace-time Army of Turkey, which is based on compulsory military service, has an establishment of 20,000 officers and 178,000 men; but only 140,000 are kept with the colours on grounds of economy. There is in addition a very well trained Gendarmerie of 40,000 men, organised on military lines, which is available in support of the Army in war or on mobilisation, and Frontier troops to the number of 10,000 in 17 battalions. The war strength may be put at 1,300,000 men. The Defence expenditure for the period 1935-36 amounted to 57 million £ Turkish. The Army is at present organised only in cadres which it will take some years to bring up to strength. The whole of the forces are divided into 4 Army Inspections and 10 Army Corps. Each Army Corps contains 2 Infantry Divisions of 3 regiments each (9 battalions) and one Field Artillery regiment of 6 to 9 batteries. To these must be added Corps troops consisting of one Cavalry and one Field Artillery regiment, one Pioneer battalion, 1 Signals Section and one Motor battalion. Outside the corps formation there are 5 Cavalry Divisions (of 3 regiments each, consisting of 4 Cavalry squadrons and one machine gun squadron and one Horse Artillery Section), 3 separate mountain brigades (of 2 mountain Infantry regiments each with mountain artillery), and Railway troops, anti-aircraft troops with modern mechanised searchlight equipment, Pioneer and Armoured car troops. The last named have at present only a nucleus of light Soviet tanks. The number is to be brought up to 150 to 200 tanks. Great attention is paid to mechanisation. The provision of material is difficult for the reason that most of it has to come from foreign countries, as Turkey has up to the present had only a few powder and cartridge factories and one factory for the repair of mines and guns. The Air Force is being expanded at an accelerated rate under a Three Years Plan laid down by the Supreme Council of National Defence. There are at present some 440 aircraft, mostly French. The financing of the Air arm, which was previously left mainly to the Turkish Air League, was taken over to an increased extent by the State in 1936, when the Ordinary Budget was raised from 0.9 to 4.5 million £ Turkish for the purpose. The Grand National Council voted a further £4,000,000 sterling in June 1936 for National Defence purposes, including in the first place the strengthening of the Air arm and the anti-gas defences, and the improvement of the Sivas-Erzurum railway and the road from Trebizond to the Persian frontier. Orders were placed in Poland in the summer of 1936 for 40 P.Z. L. 24 aeroplanes with French Gnome-Rhône H.P. 1,000 motors. These one-seater fighter planes are to have special motors and armament more powerful than those of the machines of the same type in use in the Polish Air Force. They will be fitted with two 2 cm. Oerlikon guns. The Turkish airmen receive part of their training in Moscow in gliding and the use of the parachute. The Air Defences are also being pushed of late. A gas mask factory has been erected in this connection at Angora. The network of communications has also been improved and extended in recent years on strategic grounds, and the Turkish Army will have increased powers of movement and a well ordered system of reinforcement and supply lines in consequence, which will greatly enhance its striking power. The upshot is that, in spite of the incomplete state of her armaments, Turkey is already a far more formidable opponent in the event of attack than she was at the time of the World War.

IV. Greece's defence force

The purpose of the Greek Army is to afford military backing to the peace policy which Greece has pursued for many years past. The geographical conformation of Greece, the difficulties of which have not been eased by the large increase of territory of the last few decades, forces the country to follow a foreign and strategic policy of neutrality. Common frontiers with Albania, Jugoslavia, Bulgaria and Turkey make Greece a Balkan State. But on the other hand her extended coast-line, behind which there is in many parts only the narrowest of hinterlands, and the possession of a large number of islands, large and small, make her also a Mediterranean Power. The Balkan Pact of 1934 guaranteed the inviolability of the frontiers of Greece. It is moreover certain in the light of the last Session of the Balkan League of May 1936 that the only obligation incumbent on Greece to take military action under the Balkan Pact is in the event of an attack by Bulgaria alone on one of her neighbours—a contingency which, in view of the military weakness of Bulgaria, may be ruled out as a practical possibility. In any other eventuality—for example, the case of Jugoslavia and Roumania being involved in a conflict in Central Europe, or the case of Bulgaria and Albania being in alliance with an extra-Balkan Power in a war—Greece is only bound to observe neutrality. As a Mediterranean Power also, Greece aims at the cultivation of good relations with Italy, England and Turkey, similar to the relations she has established with the Balkan Powers on the mainland. With Turkey, whose Balkan activities in the past have frequently been the occasion of political differences and even warlike complications, Greece is connected since the conclusion of the Alliance of October 1930 by ties of sincere mutual friendship. The relations of Greece and England are traditionally friendly, and have been strengthened still further by the restoration of the Monarchy, as was clearly shown by the Agreements concluded between the two countries on the occasion of the sanctions taken by the League of Nations against Italy. There can be no question that in the event of war Greece will always be prepared to offer the British Navy points d'appui, as she did in 1935 when the tension in the Mediterranean in connection with the Abyssinian conflict became acute. While there are no serious difficulties in the way of an understanding on Mediterranean issues between Greece on the one hand and England or Turkey on the other, relations with Italy are considerably more complicated. The Italo-Greek Pact of Friendship of 1928 has not yielded any practical fruits. The occupation of Corfu by the Italians, the alliance between Italy and Albania, and above all the powerful Italian fortifications on the twelve islands of the Dodecanese, situated as they are in the very middle of the Greek archipelago to which Greece has for years past laid claim, are obstacles in the way of an understanding between the two States.

As a bulwark to the policy of neutrality it was resolved at an extraordinary meeting in February 1935 of the Chiefs of the General Staffs of the Army, Navy and Air forces, with the War Minister in the Chair, to fortify the land frontiers in accordance with the most modern methods of military fortification. The Government provided the Army Command with the necessary funds for the purpose in the shape of 1 to 1.5 milliards of drachmae. The Chief of the General Staff of the Army, commenting on this decision, said: "The aims of Greece are wholly peaceful; but we are compelled to protect the inviolability of our native land. Although Greece has taken no step up to now which might give rise to misunderstanding, our neighbours do not appear to have the same intentions as we have. We are therefore compelled to protect our frontiers. In close accord with the Government, the General Staff of the Army, Navy and Air Force have set up a Committee of expert officers which will at once proceed to work out plans. The work of fortification will begin immediately." Some months later the Government decided to push forward energetically with the reorganisation of the whole of the Defence forces. The step was needed, as the Army and Navy had suffered considerably in cohesion and striking power as a result of the internal political differences of which they had frequently been the focal points. Since the restoration of the Monarchy the Defence forces have been purged to a considerable extent of party politics, and the ground cleared to enable them in future to confine themselves to their purely military duties.

Defence expenditure has steadily increased since 1932-33: in 1935-36 it totalled 2,444.7 million drachmae.

The Greek Army is based on compulsory military service. It has a peace strength at the present time of some 85,000 men. It is organised in 2 Army Inspections with 4 Army Corps of 3 Divisions each, of which two are directly under the War Minister, one separate Infantry regiment, the Evzone Guards in Athens, 2 Cavalry brigades and the Air Force Command. In all there are 24 Infantry regiments, 4 separate Infantry and mountain rifle battalions, 7 Frontier Defence battalions, 4 Cavalry regiments, 6 mountain Artillery regiments and one separate Artillery Section, 2 light and 2 heavy Artillery regiments, 2 Pioneer regiments, one Telegraph and one Railway regiment, one Pontoon battalion, 4 Motor Sections and one separate Motor company. The war strength of the Army may probably be put at 600,000 men. There are likely however to be difficulties under present conditions in arming and equipping an army of this strength; and concentration is rendered difficult by the backward development of the railway system. Mobilisation is organised on the French system; and the training of the Army, which has been for a number of years past in the hands of a French Military Mission, is also mainly on French lines. The armament and equipment of the Greek Army is not yet uniform. The number of armoured cars and tanks is not known: nor is information available as to the extent to which the individual arms have been mechanised. The armament and equipment of the Army is held up by great difficulties owing to the financial position and the absence of an adequate Greek armaments industry. The same is true of the construction and expansion of the Air Force. Of the two Army Air Divisions (with Headquarters in Athens and Thessalonica respectively) and one Naval Air Division, which are projected, only a part of the 1st Army Air Division with Headquarters at Athens) and a part of the Naval Air Division have been formed: they have between them some 150 aircraft mainly of French and English manufacture.

The Supreme Command of the Army has hitherto been in the hands of the War Minister in peace-time. It is not known whether any change has been made in this, as in other similar respects, since the restoration of the Monarchy. The War Minister has under him the Chief of the General Staff, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army of operations in war-time, the Inspector of Army Training, the Inspectors of Arms and Supplies, the Sanitary and Veterinary Services, and the Army Inspectors who are in charge of the supervision and review of the Army Corps in respect of their training and preparation for mobilisation and concentration. There is also a National Defence Council with the Premier as Chairman, which is responsible for the co-operation of all Ministries in case of war, and a Supreme War Council under the War Minister which deals with questions of organisation and equipment. The Supreme War Council also reports on all preparatory action in connection with armaments with a view to war and all questions connected with fortifications and general aspects of National Defence.

V. Bulgaria's enforced disarmament

The Peace Treaty of Neuilly forbade Bulgaria to maintain a standing army on a basis of compulsory military service as before the World War. For the defence of her frontiers she was permitted only to have a voluntary army with a strength of 20,000 men including officers and non-commissioned officers. In addition she was allowed a Frontier Defence Force and a Gendarmerie, both of which are under the orders of the War Ministry. The Frontier Defence Force may not exceed 3,000 men, and the number of their machine guns may not be above 45. The strength of the Gendarmerie was fixed at 6,800 men, of whom however only 6,300 might be armed with rifles. The military disarmament thus imposed on Bulgaria as one of the conquered States of the World War by the conquerors has been pregnant with consequences in so far as her recovery after the war was concerned. The experience of past years has shown that owing to her military weakness Bulgaria is not even able to guarantee her internal security. The people and the country have been exposed to severe Communistic unrest and disturbances. Frequent changes of Government and perils to internal peace and order have done Bulgaria infinite harm. As a means of combating disruptive Bolshevik tendencies in her midst, Bulgaria introduced compulsory labour—she was the first country in Europe to do so—with a view to education in patriotic principles and the cultivation of a national spirit in her young people. So long as she is deprived of the right freely to decide as to the constitution of her own Defence forces, compulsory labour serves to a certain extent to take the place of compulsory military service.

Having regard to her internal difficulties, Bulgaria has been at pains in recent years to keep clear of any commitments in the field of foreign policy and, in particular, to avoid military commitments of any kind which might impede the progress of internal recovery. Bulgaria did not join the Balkan League concluded in 1934 between Turkey, Roumania, Greece and Jugoslavia*) in view of her efforts for revision of the Treaty of Neuilly. On the other hand she has endeavoured to obtain from the conquering States some relief from the provisions of the Treaty of Neuilly which bear so heavily on her people. Italy, who has so often pressed for revision of the Peace Treaties, has supported Bulgaria in her representations in this matter.

Although the Treaty of Neuilly has not yet been set aside and replaced by a treaty more favourable to Bulgaria, certain concessions have nevertheless been made which go to mitigate its incidence. Bulgaria has thus been enabled to develop her Army in a manner more consistent with political conditions. It now consists of 4 Army Corps composed of 10 Infantry Divisions and one light Division and one mountain brigade in course of formation. There are also Corps troops which are at present composed of 3 Cavalry brigades of 3 regiments each and one horsed Artillery Section, some heavy Artillery regiments and Engineer regiments. Army troops comprise one Signals and one Railway regiment, one cyclist and one motor battalion, 2 tank companies and one Air regiment of 3 groups, one training group and one Naval Aircraft Section. There are at present some 70 to 80 aircraft, made up of 3 fighter flights, 3 reconnaissance flights and one bomber flight. The peace-time Army, consisting at present of 108 battalions, 30 to 40 squadrons, and 78 light and 24 heavy batteries, has an average strength in the winter months of 20,000 to 40,000 men, and in the summer months of 60,000 to 80,000 men. In war-time Bulgaria should have some 150,000 trained troops at her disposal, with a reservoir of some 200,000 untrained men to draw on.

VI. Albania

Albania has been an independent Kingdom since September 1928. The Italian Treaty with Albania of 1926, which was expanded in the following year into an offensive and defensive alliance, was the prelude to the Italian Protectorate over Albania which took shape in the Treaty of 1936. The extent of Italian influence in Albania is shown by the fact that the Head of the King's Military Cabinet is an Italian General. The Albanian Army is in other respects also subject to powerful Italian influence. Albanian officers frequently receive training in the Italian Army.

The Army, Frontier Defence, Gendarmerie and Navy are under the National Defence Command. The Army is based on compulsory military service with 1½ years' active service. It has a peace strength of some 9,000 men. It is organised (including the battalion of the Royal Guard) in 3 reinforced Infantry regiments with a total of 204 machine guns, 22 mountain and other batteries with a total of 64 guns, 9 companies of Engineers (including 4 Pioneer companies), 4 Signals detachments, one Pontoon company and one Tank company with 8 tanks. According to statements in the English Press the Tank company is about to be expanded into a Section. It is also intended to form 3 Divisions in war out of the 3 reinforced Infantry regiments: there are at present 40,000 trained men to draw on for the purpose.

The Frontier Defence force of some 1,350 men consists of 4 battalions with a total of 14 companies. The Gendarmerie of 3,234 men is scattered about the country in small detachments. It is organised in 10 District Commands.

VII. Hungary's military insecurity

Since the ratification of the Pact of Mutual Assistance on May 16th 1935 between Czecho-Slovakia and the U.S.S.R. there has been a remarkable revulsion of opinion on the part of public opinion in Hungary, as in other countries, in the view taken of the Communist problem. Until the signature of this Pact the Communist problem, so far as it directly affected Hungary, had been regarded purely as a matter of internal politics; and the general feeling was that, since the complete repression of the Communist supremacy of Bela Kun, there was no longer any serious danger of Bolshevism. This is no longer the position. Communism in the military-imperialist form is now a matter of foreign politics, and has assumed the dimensions of a direct menace to Hungary. Count István Bethlen, the former Premier, was the first to draw his countrymen's attention to the changed situation. In an article appearing at the turn of the year 1935-36, which attracted much notice, he pointed out that the Pact must involve a complete reshuffle of international values in Central Europe. Count Bethlen's warning found a ready response on the part of numerous leading politicians in Hungary. The full measure of the danger then became apparent, as details became known in regard to the increasing development of Czecho-Slovak "air nests" in the neighbouring districts of Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia.

The Treaty of Trianon of June 4th 1920 created a stump-Hungary, shorn of two-thirds of its historic possessions and crippled in the military sense. The main gains resulting from the cessions of territory which were imposed on Hungary went to the three Succession States, as they are called, Roumania, Yugoslavia and Czecho-Slovakia. But the Hungarian nation has never down to this day accepted the settlement which the Trianon Treaty imposed. The ultimate object of all Hungarian foreign policy without distinction of persons is, and will remain, the revision of the Treaty. To prevent such revision, and further to forestall a restoration of the Hapsburgs, Roumania, Yugoslavia and Czecho-Slovakia joined together in 1920-21 to form the Little Entente. The political isolation to which Hungary was thus condemned continued until 1927, when Hungary sought and found escape in the shape of a Treaty of Friendship with Italy, who supported the revisionist claims of Hungary, as did certain circles in England. In the years that followed—and especially after 1933, when the then Honved Minister Gyula Gömbös was entrusted by the Regent, Admiral Horthy, with the additional portfolio of Prime Minister—the maimed and mutilated Hungary of the Treaty of Trianon became an increasingly powerful factor in European politics. Avoiding the numerous rocks with which the foreign policy of Hungary is beset, particularly in the Danubian basin, Gömbös was able to steer a course which powerfully contributed to raise the prestige of his country and to make its friendship an object of more than one country's political attentions notwithstanding its initial handicaps of almost complete military defencelessness and a weak economic position. The Rome Protocols concluded between Italy, Hungary and Austria in 1934, which were tantamount to a political and military alliance, and the friendship with National Socialist Germany materially assisted the recovery of Hungary which the last few years have witnessed. The premature death of Gömbös in October 1936 deprived Hungary of one of those statesmen who have never ceased from the moment of the collapse in 1918 to inspire the Hungarian people with that spirit which must always be the primary prerequisite of any moral and political revival—the spirit of national self-respect. The world today looks to Hungary as to a people united in its resolve to spare no effort in its endeavours to reassert its right to political and military equality.

Under the provisions of the Treaty of Trianon the Hungarian Defence force (Honved) is no longer based on compulsory military service: it is a mercenary army of which the Regent is the Commander-in-Chief. The effective Command is in the hands of the Honved Minister, assisted by the Chief Commandant and his subordinate Inspectors. Hungary is forbidden to form a General Staff or to make reparations for mobilisation. The Army, which has an aggregate strength of 35,000 men, is organised in 7 Infantry brigades of 42 battalions in all, each with 3 rifle companies and one machine gun company, and 2 independent Cavalry brigades of 23 squadrons in all, including 8 machine gun squadrons. There are also 26 light batteries, including 2 anti-aircraft batteries, with 105 light guns in all, 20 Pioneer companies and 7 Signal companies. The Air Force which is under the Supreme Command of the Air Department in the Honved Ministry, is this year to be organised in 2 reconnaissance squadrons, 4 fighting squadrons and 4 battle squadrons. The battle formations constitute the 1st Air Brigade in Budapest. The number of aircraft at the end of 1936 was stated to be 270 first line planes.

Hungary has neither fortresses nor medium or heavy artillery, armoured cars or tanks, to enable her to defend herself in case of attack. In view of the political tension in Europe and the intensified armaments of her neighbours, Hungary's security is seriously endangered; and her insecurity is notably enhanced by the Military Pact concluded between the U.S.S.R. and Czecho-Slovakia, and by the efforts which are being made to secure the use of Roumania as a passage for the transit of Soviet troops to Central Europe. These developments more than justify Hungary in her demand for the suspension of the disarmament limitations of the Treaty of Trianon, and in her claim for military equality, to enable her to prevent a repetition of the Communist experiment already made on her soil with its sequel in the shape of the invasion of foreign troops in 1919.

VIII. The new Austrian defence force

The Treaty of Saint Germain, which (like the Treaty of Versailles) was enforced by threats of violence on the part of the conquerors in the World War in September 1919, deprived Austria of the principal territories of the former Dual Monarchy, and at the same time forbade her to maintain an army on a basis of compulsory service and compelled her to introduce a professional army. The strength of the latter was not to exceed 1,500 officers, 30,000 men, 90 light guns, 60 trench mortars and 450 machine guns; but as a result of the economic and financial difficulties of the country this strength was not in practice attained until the autumn of 1933, when internal political developments provided an occasion for the expansion of the Army. The critical position in Austria in 1922 had already compelled the Government to apply to the League of Nations for assistance: Austria had been a member of the League since the end of 1920. The so-called Geneva protocols of October 4th 1922 in regard to the financial reconstruction of Austria gave her the financial aid which she required; but she was forced in return to submit to political and economic conditions which, taken in conjunction with the League of Nations Loan accorded to her by the Lausanne Protocol of July 1932, constituted a grave menace to her independence. Austrian foreign policy in the succeeding period was accordingly directed towards the cultivation of good relations with the neighbouring countries as a means of countering the political and economic isolation to which she was condemned.

It was not until the conclusion of the Triple Entente with Italy and Hungary in March 1934 that Austria obtained a modicum of support in the field of foreign policy. A special Annex to the so-called Rome Protocols embodied an Italian guarantee of the political independence and territorial inviolability of Austria. But the whole political status of Austria remained nevertheless in suspense, partly as a result of the growing differences with National Socialist Germany (which were not brought to an end until the German-Austrian Agreement was concluded with the friendly co-operation of Italy on July 11th 1936), but mainly as a result of the growing insecurity in Austria herself and the continually increasing political tension between the other States of Europe. In presence of this situation with the menace which it involved to the continued existence of the Austrian State, the Federal Government of Austria decided on May 2nd 1936 to send a Memorandum to the Powers announcing the introduction of compulsory military service in Austria. In a comprehensive accompanying statement the Government justified its action, on the grounds of the educative effects of the measure, on which (it explained) its decision was primarily based; but, with a view to the eventuality of the measure being attacked on the ground of the provisions of the Treaty of Saint Germain, it went on to put forward the following additional considerations.

"1. The Treaty of Saint Germain imposes upon Austria a number of forcible measures of a military character, but at the same time explicitly promises in the introduction to Part V that the almost complete unilateral disarmament and demilitarisation of Austria will be followed by action for the limitation of military armaments on the part of the other signatories of the Treaty.... The Federal Government must point out that Austria has fulfilled all her obligations without exception, whereas in all the other States concerned the tendency has been to an alarming extent in the very opposite direction.

"2. Recognition of the facts as described, which do not conform either to the letter or to the spirit of the Treaty of Saint Germain, by the other parties to the Treaty is clearly implicit both in the declaration of the Five Great Powers of December 11th 1932 and in the published statement of the results of the Conference of Stresa (Point 6), as also in the fact that in the proposals submitted to the Disarmament Conference by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald Austria was assigned a peace strength for her Army of 50,000 men.

"3. While it is true that in the official texts to which paragraph 2 above relates the proposed concessions to Austria in the matter of military equality are made conditional on the conclusion of Pacts of Security, it must be pointed out that Austria has always been, and still is, the first to welcome and support any proposals for the establishment of a system of treaties affording an effective guarantee of Central European security, as does for instance the proposal embodied in the recent Rome Protocol of January 7th 1935. It is plainly not Austria's fault if these efforts have not up to now made much progress, and are in fact in danger of coming to nothing.

"In this connection the Federal Government feels bound once more to give expression to its conviction, freely arrived at without legal quibbling or antagonism in relation to any other State, that lasting peace in Europe is inconceivable except on the basis of complete and unqualified elimination of every sort of discrimination between the former conquerors and the former conquered, and the rejection root and branch of all measures of force which go counter to the natural rights of peoples and as such are derogatory to the national sentiment of those on whom they are imposed. Such measures can only be regarded as a legacy of the unhappy state of mind engendered by the late War.

"4. While the military clauses of the Treaty of Saint Germain are accompanied by certain undertakings to be fulfilled by the other parties to the Treaty, the obligation imposed on Austria to maintain her independence is explicit, and is not conditional on the fulfilment of any corresponding obligations by the other parties to the Treaty. It is Austria's firm intention to fulfil her obligation in this respect. It is therefore a demonstration of Austria's desire conscientiously to observe these essential provisions of the Treaty of Saint Germain, which are at the same time elements of the existing European order, when in presence of the grave dangers with which the international situation is beset she is concerned to do everything in her power to maintain her independence in relation to all parties."

In conclusion it is added that the Law imposing compulsory military service is an exercise of Austria's sovereign rights.

A month before the publication of the Memorandum to the Powers on the introduction of compulsory military service, an Act amending the Federal Constitution which was necessary for the enforcement of the measure indicated in the Memorandum had become law on April 1st 1936: this was the Act concerning "Compulsory Universal Service for Public Purposes". Under its provisions all Austrian citizens of the male sex from the beginning of their 18th to the end of their 42nd year may be called up "for service for limited periods with or without arms for public purposes." The Act purposely avoids the use of the expression "military service" in deference to the provisions of the Treaty of Saint Germain; but it may be regarded as tantamount to the re-introduction of compulsory military service. Finally on June 1st 1935 the new organisation of the Federal Army in its expanded form came into force.

As at present reorganised, the Austrian Army has an establishment of 44,000 men forming 7 Infantry Divisions (in lieu of the former 6 mixed brigades), one "mobile Division," a Mountain brigade and Army troops consisting of one independent Artillery regiment with one horsed light section and 2 mechanised heavy sections, one Bridging battalion, one Army Pioneer section, one Army Telegraph section and 2 Air regiments: it is proposed to form a third Air regiment. The aircraft at the disposal of the Air Force have hitherto consisted mainly of reconnaissance, fighting and school planes. The Air arm is in short only in process of formation; and the same is true of the anti-aircraft arm, which at present consists only of one 8 cm. anti-aircraft battery and one anti-aircraft machine gun company.

The Divisions, as ultimately organised, are to consist of:

- 3 Infantry regiments of 3 battalions each,
- 1 light Artillery regiment of 3 sections, each of 3 batteries of 4 guns,
- 1 reconnaissance section composed of mobile troops,
- 1 Pioneer battalion,
- 1 Telegraph battalion,
- 1 Air Defence section, and the requisite Supply units.

The "mobile Division" is composed of one mechanised Jäger brigade of 4 mechanised Jäger battalions, one brigade of 2 regiments of dragoons, one armoured car battalion and one mechanised Telegraph battalion. Mechanised field batteries will be attached to the mobile Division as required.

A good deal was done in the course of last year to improve the hitherto highly inadequate armament and equipment. The Infantry was given the light 8 mm. machine gun M 30, the 9 mm. machine pistol M 34, the light 8 cm. trench mortar M 33, and the 4.7 cm. Infantry gun M 35 for anti-tank defence. The Artillery has once more the 15 cm. howitzer as its medium gun. Special attention is being paid to the motorised units. The six-wheeled cross-country 1½ ton fast lorry and the heavy tractors for the medium Artillery guns all come from Austrian factories. The single armoured car battalion at present in existence has 2 companies of light two-men tanks and one company of quite new eight-wheeled heavy road armoured cars which can move readily across country. Each regiment of the Infantry is to be given one motorised machine gun company and one company of 9 Infantry guns.

The Austrian Federal Army at present comprises the following troops:

Infantry.

- 1 Guard battalion,
- 17 Infantry regiments (Nos. 1 to 15, Tyrolean Jäger regiment, Tyrolean Rifle regiment),
- 5 independent battalions (Field Jäger battalion No. 2, Alpine Jäger battalions Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5),
- 4 motorised Jäger battalions.

Armoured unit.

- 1 battalion.

Artillery.

- 1 independent Artillery regiment,
- 6 light Artillery regiments (A 7th light Artillery regiment is in process of formation).

Cavalry.

- 2 dragoon regiments.

Air Force.

- 2 Air regiments with ground organisation,
- 1 anti-aircraft machine gun company,
- 1 anti-aircraft battery.

Pioneers.

- 7 battalions,
- 1 Bridging battalion,
- 1 Army Pioneer section.

Telegraph.

- 8 Telegraph battalions,
- 1 Army Telegraph section,
- 8 independent Telegraph platoons.

Motor units.

- 7 Divisional motor sections.

The above troops are distributed between the following Divisional Commands:

1 Division with Headquarters at Vienna,	Vienna,
2 Division	" Vienna,
3 Division	" St. Pölten,
4 Division	" Linz,
5 Division	" Graz,
6 Division	" Innsbruck,
7 Division	" Klagenfurt,
Mobile Division	" Vienna.

The higher Command of the Army, as hitherto exercised, has been modified by the re-establishment of the position of Chief of the General Staff for the armed forces as from April 1st 1936. Apart from this measure there is no change in the supreme Command, which rests as before with the Federal President. The effective command is in the hands of the Federal Minister for National Defence; and the National Defence Ministry is the highest central Army authority.

The Treaty of Saint Germain laid down that the war organisation and war strength of the Austrian Federal Army were not to vary from the peace organisation and peace strength. Provision has now been made, under the new Law concerning compulsory Federal Service for Public Purposes, for economic measures in the event of war. Apart from this provision, Austria has no special laws for the defence of the country or economic preparation for war.

The completion of the new Army organisation, under which the Army is to have a peace strength of 50,000 men, will entail considerable increases in the strength of the cadres; and these increases can only be effected by degrees as budgetary resources or credits are available. The Army Estimates for the budget year 1936-37 amounted to 126.43 million Schillings (which represents 6.6 per cent of the total budget expenditure). This was the highest Army vote since 1918; but it is nothing like enough to cover the new expenditure which is proposed. The legislature has accordingly already indicated its assent to the provision of larger credits for the Army in the 1937-38 Budget. In addition, a Federal Law enacted by the Federal Government imposes a contribution in the nature of a capital levy on the Provinces and the City of Vienna by deduction from their shares in the credits for joint Federal expenditure for the year 1937 to the tune of about 14,000,000 Schillings.

To further the development of the Air arm, the National Defence Minister addressed an appeal to the population at the end of September 1936 to make a voluntary contribution. "Austrians!" so the closing word of the Appeal ran, "The Army turns to you for aid. It asks for a demonstration of your confidence and a sacrifice. It does so, because the sacrifice is not for the benefit of private or particular interests of any kind, but in the interest of the defence capacity of our Fatherland."

The Federal Government took a further decision in connection with the reconstruction of the Defence forces when it promulgated a Law on October 10th 1936 disbanding the numerous Austrian defence associations then in existence. Their place is to be taken by the new Front Militia. A new Law of October 14th 1936 concerning this "Militia of the Fatherland's Front" says that the function of the Front Militia is to enrol volunteers capable of defence service in independent formations. Men still liable for service may also be included. The administration of the Front Militia is attached to the Ministry of National Defence. The Front Militia may be called up in case of war or for training purposes by its General Commandant in agreement with the Minister for National Defence.

"Chains, which we had wrathfully borne, are snapped!" Such was the heading of the public notices announcing the introduction of compulsory military service. By this step Austria has laid the foundations for the reconstruction of her Defence forces and made it possible to prepare for the eventual establishment of a dependable system of national defence.

The Arming of Poland and the Baltic border states

Poland

Poland has learnt from past history that her national security must be based on her Army, and can be so based without constituting a threat to others. A new military type has come into being in Poland, whose development dates back to the Rifle Associations and Legions of the World War and culminates in the Polish Army of the present day. The credit for the successful accomplishment of this vast process of development rests first and foremost with the late Marshal Piłsudski, whose death took place the year before last. To the end of his life Piłsudski remained War Minister and Commander-in-Chief of the Army to the neglect of all other openings for the exercise of power, in order to preside personally over the educational period. The Polish Army of today is in the fullest sense therefore his creation. Piłsudski's successor in the supreme command of the Army, Inspector-General Rydz-Smigly—who is today, after the President of the Republic, the most powerful personage in Poland in the political, as well as in the military, hierarchy—takes his stand on the Piłsudski tradition in just the same measure as the Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck. To say which is to say that Poland relies primarily on her own resources: that is to say, the policy which she follows as a great Power is conditioned solely by considerations of Polish interests. While Marshal Piłsudski was alive, alliances and security pacts were concluded to ease the path of peaceful development. But in recent years the position has been changing and always to Poland's disadvantage. The limited capacity of Poland in respect of the production of armaments made it impossible for her to keep pace with the military armaments of her neighbours, while political developments in Europe—and the activities of the Soviet Union in particular—involved her in dangers for which she was not responsible. On the one hand Czecho-Slovakia concluded her alliance with the U.S.S.R. under which she became the base of operations for the Red Army. On the other hand Poland's alliance with Roumania lost value as a result of the complaisance shown by the former Roumanian Foreign Minister Titulescu in his relations with the U.S.S.R. The Chiefs of the General Staffs of the Baltic States were holding military conversations in Moscow. It was no adequate answer to the problems posed by the situation that the Polish Premier's Order of July 15th 1936 made the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, General Rydz-Smigly, the second personage in Poland after the President of the Republic, so that he became the superior officer of all civilian officials including the Premier himself! The semi-official comment issued at the time of the Order revealed the underlying grounds for the decision to confer these full powers on General Rydz-Smigly. The special situation in which the Polish nation is placed, so the comment ran, and the special geographical and historical circumstances by which the destiny of Poland is governed, make it essential for the Supreme Commander of the Army to be given a place in the political framework of the State of such a special kind as will enable him to concentrate the whole of the defence of the nation and subordinate all other problems to this. Only a month before the issue of the Order the Express Poranny pointed out, in connection with the Government's applying for an Enabling Act, that "the problem of the strengthening of the national defences is the problem on which the realities of Poland's position turn."

The foundation of Poland's power is her Army; and in presence of the continuous increase of international tension Poland's chief concern was bound under the circumstances to be the problem of how to strengthen her military position. It is true, the former War Minister General Składkowski, in the discussion of the 1935-36 Budget in the Budget Committee of the Diet, was able to say that the Polish Infantry was the best armed infantry in the world. It was all armed, he explained, with a new Mauser rifle, with the Model 25 carbine, the Browning heavy machine gun Model 30 and the grenade-thrower Model 30. The equipment of the Pioneer and Signals formations, he added, was being modernised, and new Vickers tanks with 6.3 cm. guns were being introduced. Poland had now an armaments industry of her own, capable not only of supplying the standing Army but also of arming the extra-military formations and associations with modern weapons. But the result of all these measures has been to swell the Army's budget to such an extent that since 1932 it has not been less than 768 million zloty or 35.7 per cent of the total Budget of the country. The 1936-37 Army Estimates are also put at the same figure (768 million zloty); but the amount is not sufficient to supply the current demands or to provide for renewals of out-of-date material. The Government accordingly has established a special "National Defence Fund" and appealed to the sacrifice of the population. All contributions received pass into this Fund; and according to reports published in the Press they already represent considerable sums. In addition, in a number of factories the workers have resolved to work unpaid overtime in order to provide the Army with aircraft, machine guns, tanks etc. But the voluntary contributions are not sufficient to provide the Army with all that it requires; and new resources had to be found for the purpose. Accordingly in the course of General Rydz-Smigly's visit to Paris an Agreement was signed on September 6th 1936, under which Poland is given by France a credit of 2.6 milliards of francs spread over 5 years, to be used partly for the purchase of war material in France, partly for the erection of armament factories in Poland and as a second instalment of the Railway Loan for the construction of the line from Eastern Upper Silesia to Gdynia. Provision was also made for permanent cooperation between the General Staffs of the two countries. It has still to be seen whether the expectation expressed in the Echo de Paris (No. 20,779 of September 7th 1936) will be realised, and the rearmament of the Polish Army with French aid will give new life to the Franco-Polish Pact of Mutual Assistance of 1921. A change in the Polish attitude to Soviet Russia, of which Paris also has hopes, is not probable under present circumstances for reasons alike of internal and external policy, since the inclusion of Poland in the ranks of the "Popular Front" Powers would mean the sacrifice of Poland's independence.

Constitutionally the Polish Army is a standing army based on compulsory military service and organised on a territorial footing. It has at present a peace strength of 272,000 men, to which must be added a special formation of about 32,000 men for the defence of the Eastern frontier. There is also a militarised State Police force of some 29,000 men, and a further 140,000 young persons undergoing military training. The Army in peace-time is organised in 30 Infantry Divisions, one Cavalry Division and 12 brigades, 324 light (including 4 mechanised) and 112 heavy (including 11 mechanised) batteries, 28 anti-aircraft batteries and one anti-aircraft machine gun group. There are further 63 Pioneer and Railway companies, 90 Signals companies and 8 armoured battalions with some 600 tanks. Latterly the number of armoured battalions has been increased by two to 10; but it is not known to what extent tanks are available for the new battalions. No notable changes have been announced in the organisation of the peace-time Army at the date of publication of this number. The Army Air Force is composed of 2 groups (Air Group I with Headquarters at Warsaw and Air Group II with Headquarters at Cracow). Each group has 3 regiments. The total strength of first line aircraft is about 660. The Naval Air Force in Putzig and Pinsk has some 110 front-line aircraft. With second line planes the total number of Army and Navy aircraft is about 1550. In war-time it may be assumed that all the peace-time formations will be mobilised, and at the same time form nuclei for the creation of Reserve and Reinforcement units. Air Force, heavy Artillery and armoured units will in all probability be used as Army troops. The probable war strength of Poland including the peace-time Army is 3.6 million men. This would give a field army of not less than 60 Divisions with corresponding Cavalry, L. of C., home and replacement units. The Polish Army is further armed with some 7,000 light and 4,100 heavy machine guns, and 1,350 light and 422 heavy guns.

The following notable changes have recently been made in connection with the higher command of the Polish Army. On May 13th 1936, as a sequel to the entry into force of the new Constitution of 1935 and as a further step in the process of reorganisation made necessary by the death of Marshal Piłsudski, an Order was issued by the President of the Republic dealing with the organisation of the Supreme Command and the position of the Inspector General of the Army in particular. Under this Order the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in peace-time: but the actual command is in practice exercised, subject to his supervision, by the Inspector General of the Army and the Minister of War. The President issues fundamental regulations in regard to the organisation of the Army, e. g. in regard to the duties and rights of the soldiers, and promotes and retires the officers. The Inspector General is in peace the Head of the whole system of National Defence. He is responsible amongst other things for the working out of plans of operations and mobilisation schemes. He supervises the training of the Army in conjunction with the War Minister as the Army's Head. The former Council of National Defence, now to be known as "Defence Council of the Republic," has still the President of the Republic as its Chairman: the President may be represented by the Inspector General of the Army. The members of the Council are still the War Minister, the Foreign Minister, the Minister of the Interior, the Finance Minister and the Minister of Commerce and the Chief of the General Staff. In war the Inspector General is Commander-in-Chief. The most important feature of the new Order, according to the French technical periodical France militaire, is the extension of the powers of the Inspector General, whose position is made permanent and independent of Cabinet changes. The present holder of the position, General Rydz-Smigly, has further been given a dominant position in the State by his appointment on July 15th 1936 to rank after the President of the Republic in Poland. The circumstance that on November 11th 1936 he was also given the rank of Marshal—on the day, that is, which Poland celebrates as that of the restoration of Poland's independence as a nation—lends to his new appointment a political tinge which outweighs the military significance of the occasion: up to now the only Marshals of Poland have been Piłsudski and Foch.

On July 9th 1936 the creation of a post of Inspector of Air and Anti-Gas Defence was announced. The new post, which was created at the instance of the War Minister by the President of the Republic in agreement with the Inspector General of the Army, is under the latter's command. All organisations, whether of a military or civilian character, which are in any way connected with Air or anti-gas defence are subject to the new Inspection.

It may be noted in connection with the organisation of the land defences of Poland that an Order of the President of the Republic in September 1936 declared the Hela peninsula which projects into the sea in front of the port of Danzig to be a fortified area in its entirety. The new fortified zone includes a three mile strip of the littoral on each side of the peninsula in addition to the peninsular area itself. This Order is part of the Polish maritime rearmament programme, and is closely connected with the proposed development of the Gdynia ship-building yards, which are to be completed by 1941.

The introduction of the so-called "substitution for military service" system is expected in the near future. The idea is to exact a form of Labour Service for the purposes of national defence and the more urgent communal needs. So far as details are available in regard to the regulations to be issued for the purpose, all persons liable to military service, who are not called up for active service on grounds e.g. of health, will in future be required to give 30 days' unpaid labour, viz. six days a year for five years. The obligation is binding with certain exceptions, which are commonly allowed even in the Army itself, on all fit male persons. It is also stated that in future all Polish students will in future be compelled to undergo six-week courses with the Voluntary Labour Service organisation recently taken over by the War Ministry and placed under military direction.

In the light of current European developments special significance attaches to the so-called Baltic border States because of their geographical position. The Baltic littoral has for ages served as a historic route for the passage of armies from East to West and from West to East; and for centuries it has been the point of division between the conflicting interests of great Powers. Today the Baltic States are primarily interesting in the military and political sense for the reason that they block the way into Europe for the Soviets, for whom there is no more convenient route than that which leads along the Baltic coast. The Baltic railway system is relatively well developed, and admits of the rapid concentration of large numbers of troops at a number of different points of invasion. The Baltic countries also afford a favourable theatre for the movement of motorised units, whether on land or in the air; for the approaches by the air are short, and there are a fair number of roads in good order on the ground. Even if the transport of troops by land should not prove feasible with the speed which future wars are likely to postulate, vigorous activity in the air, with the Baltic countries as the point of departure, is a possibility which cannot fail to strike the eye. In addition it has to be borne in mind that the Baltic Fleet of Russia has recently been developed on an extensive scale—in particular, by the provision of aircraft-carrier vessels of the most modern type. A very peculiar importance therefore attaches to the Baltic countries from the standpoint of Soviet strategy. The Baltic States are the terrain on which the Soviet forces will deploy.

Considerations of this special geographical and politico-military situation have found their reflection in Estonia and Latvia in the movement in favour of the maintenance of strict neutrality. Since November 1st 1923 the two countries have been associated in a defensive alliance which has had its fruits in the shape of a wide measure of agreement on military issues and foreign policy. But it was not until September 12th 1934 that it was found possible, after long and difficult negotiations at Geneva, to conclude an agreement with Lithuania (initialled at Riga on August 29th 1934) in regard to "Understanding and Cooperation of the three Baltic States." This is the so-called Baltic Pact. It provides for close cooperation in foreign politics between the three parties by means of periodical meetings of the Foreign Ministers, mutual information in regard to negotiations with foreign countries and united action in relation to other States; but it does not touch the so-called "specific" questions, i.e. the special problems of the foreign policy of the several States. Lithuania alone has such special problems still to solve—the problems, that is to say, which are associated with Vilna and Memel; and the effect of the Pact is that the other two parties are not prepared to allow these problems to be raised, so far as they are concerned, lest they should be forced thereby to take decisions of a difficult and possibly far-reaching character, as a result of which they may eventually find themselves a football in the conflict of the great Powers.

But here again the growing sense of the danger of military alliances and mutual assistance obligations, the new strength of Germany, the renewal of Polish efforts to induce the border States to cooperate on unified lines of policy and, on the other hand, the efforts of Moscow to include the Baltic countries in the Pact system, and the simultaneous collapse of the Geneva system of collective security—in a word, the numerous and rapid political changes in Europe and the growth of political tension have brought the border States face to face with grave problems of the maintenance of their security, and have led them seriously to consider their present situation and future prospects. The numerous Conferences of the last two years are ample proof of the difficulties experienced.

The Moscow system of Pacts, with which the border States are associated under the Pact of Non-aggression of 1932 and the London Protocols of July 4th 1933, has begun since the Franco-Russo-Czecho-Slovak Mutual Assistance Treaties to assume a different aspect in their eyes. Since that date moreover Soviet attempts at interference in the Baltic area have been more marked. Up till now they had observed the limits of military and diplomatic courtesy; but their failure to evoke any favourable response led the Party Secretary of the Leningrad Executive Committee and Chief Commissary of the Communist Party for North-Western Russia, Shdanov, to make a speech at the Eighth Russian Soviet Congress (to which allusion has already been made) on November 29th 1936, in which he gave expression to open threats to the address of Finland, Estonia and Latvia. These tiny countries, he exclaimed, are the seat of great adventurers who would like to place their soil at the disposal of the Fascist great Powers as a basis of operations. These tiny countries should beware, lest the Soviet Union opens wide the window which has been given back to them and, with the help of the Red Army and under the command of proletarian leaders, takes a look to see what is up.

The echo aroused by these words (in spite of all efforts subsequently made to water down their significance) in Riga, Reval and Helsingfors was naturally very great. Latvia and Estonia are less disposed than ever to take a hand at the short end of the Soviet lever, and so endanger the political bridge by which they are connected across the seas with the unmistakeably anti-Soviet Finland, which now (as ever) constitutes a barrier from the Arctic to the Gulf of Finland shutting off the Scandinavian peninsula from the Soviet State.

It is intelligible therefore that the Commanders-in-Chief of the three countries should be concerned to establish military defence forces which, however small in numbers, are strong in arms and equipment.

Estonia

In spite of the smallness of her population of barely 1.1 million, Estonia disposes under her compulsory military service system of a standing army which now numbers 14,000 men together with some 100 military aircraft and a Frontier Defence Force organised on military lines of 1,200 men. The probable war strength of the Estonian Defence forces may be put in the neighbourhood of 150,000 men. Some 25 per cent of the total budget of the country (17.6 million krooni in the year 1936-37) is earmarked annually for Defence expenditure. More than two years ago, at the end of 1934, General Laidoner said in a broadcast speech: "If a people will not defend itself, if it has not the courage to do so, it is lost: it cannot retain its independence. If we all concentrate our strength, we need not fear that we shall succumb. Our chief source of strength is the knowledge which we have that there is no reason why future generations of our people should be weaker than those who fought in the War of Liberation in 1919-20 and gave Estonia her independence as a State." On a subsequent occasion General Laidoner argued that even a small country like Estonia ought to foster belief in the duty of self-defence as the key-stone of its policy. At the celebrations of the Polish National Festival in Reval on May 3rd 1935 General Laidoner made a special point of the close connections between the two countries Poland and Estonia, and urged the claims of their common task as wardens of the peace between Eastern and Western Europe. Never, he said, would the two countries stand by and allow foreign troops to march through their territory. The Polish and Estonian forces stood side by side in defence of that resolve. The period of military service, which had been cut down in previous years in the Estonian Army on grounds of economy, was again lengthened on January 1st 1935. Since that date it has been 11 months in the case of the Infantry, Artillery, Armoured Trains and Pioneers, 12 months in the case of the Cavalry, Tank Regiments and Signals, and 15 months in the case of the Wireless operators.

Latvia

Latvia has a standing Army with compulsory military service. With a population of 1.92 million, Latvia maintains an Army with a peace strength of 23,500 men, including an Air Force of 550 men with some 130 aircraft. In addition there is a Frontier Defence Force organised on military lines of 1,200 men. In case of war the total number of trained reservists, including those who had their training in the former Russian Army, should amount to some 200,000 men. Under the amendments to the Military Service Law approved by the Latvian Cabinet at the beginning of January 1937, recruits with physical malformations and weak health are also required to do military service even where they are excused from active service with the colours. The Defence expenditure 1936-37 was 32.5 million lats.

Lithuania

Lithuania has continuously increased her expenditure on armaments in recent years. In 1935 it was some 66 million lits, in 1936 some 75 million lits, and the Estimates for 1937 are for 81 million lits. This increased expenditure has not been used merely for the expansion and improvement of arms and equipment, but also for increase of the effectives. The number of Infantry regiments has been raised by two to 9; and one special Infantry formation has also been instituted consisting of 2 independent companies, each with a heavy machine-gun Section. Each of the existing 3 Infantry Divisions has had a squadron of Divisional Cavalry attached to it. The Cavalry Brigade has been reconstituted as a separate formation. A beginning has been made with the establishment of a new 4th Division; and it is significant to note that its Headquarters are in the Memel district. On January 1st 1935 a new Law concerning the Army Command came into force. Under this Act, the President of the Republic remains the Supreme Head of all the armed forces of the country. He is assisted by a Council of National Defence composed of the Ministries chiefly concerned, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and the Head of the Military Supply Department. A feature of special importance is the creation of the post of Commander-in-Chief by separating the two posts of Head of the Army Command and Chief of the General Staff, which had previously been united in the person of the Head of the General Staff. A further feature of importance is the establishment of an Army Arms Department, and the creation of a Council of War consisting of the Commander-in-Chief, the Chief of the General Staff, the Head of the Military Supply Department and the garrison Commanders. It is also noticeable that the Law brings the Head of the Riflemen's Association under the Commander-in-Chief. Moreover the Riflemen's Association, which has 55,000 members and is the largest and most important para-military organisation, has been converted by a Law of June 11th 1935 into an organisation under the Ministry of National Defence, directly subject to the Commander-in-Chief. Its members have since been organised in military formations (companies, squadrons, batteries etc.) and subjected to strict military discipline. Under the new Statutes the Riflemen's Association is intended to form a national military body, and its object is to be the strengthening of the national powers of resistance and of the forces of national defence. The Head of the Association is a high officer on the active list, appointed by the President of the Republic. The Commanders in war are also the Heads of Districts throughout the country.

The Lithuanian Government further passed a new Military Service Act on June 10th 1936, which was published on July 8th.

All Lithuanian male nationals are liable under this Act to military service. Persons whose position prevents their serving for health or other reasons (which are specified in detail in the Act) are compelled to pay a so-called War Tax for 15 years. Persons failing to do their military service forfeit their civic rights, in addition to other penalties provided by the Act, and are ineligible for the public service. The period of active service remains 1½ years under the new Act: but the War Minister is empowered to increase the period to 24 months or in certain cases to reduce it to 12 months. He is also empowered to call up women with special expert qualifications in time of war for special service under military discipline.

The peace strength of the Lithuanian Army is at present 30,000 men; the probable war strength is 200,000 men. The Air Force consists of one Air regiment of 6 flights with 90 first and 20 second line aircraft. Lithuania's defences are based politically on Soviet Russia. The 15th anniversary of the Lithuanian Pact of Non-Aggression with Soviet Russia was the occasion of very special celebrations in 1935. The Lithuanian Minister in Moscow referred on that occasion to "the boundless might of the U.S.S.R. as the main foundation of the peace of the world." The frequent interchange of visits between Soviet and Lithuanian military heads and the military discussions which take place between the two countries are sufficient evidence of the good understanding that prevails between the two States.

Finland

The peace strength of the Finnish Army (some 30,000 men) has not been increased in recent years. The Army is organised in 3 Infantry Divisions of 26 battalions (including 3 cyclist battalions), 2 Cavalry regiments of 10 squadrons (including 2 machine-gun squadrons), 19 light and 22 heavy batteries of Artillery (including coastal defence batteries), and 3 anti-aircraft batteries, 5 Pioneer companies, 8 Signals companies and one Tank company with some 16 tanks. The Air Force is auxiliary to the Army and Navy: it consists of 5 Army flights and 8 naval flights comprising some 120 first line aircraft altogether. A Government Order of May 1st 1936 reorganises the Frontier Defence Force on military lines: it corresponds to an independent brigade. Five Frontier Defence Districts, each with a Frontier Defence Detachment (corresponding to an independent battalion), have been formed in the Districts of Karelische Nase (Carelia Point), Salmi, Joensuu, Kainuu and Lappmarken respectively.

In case of war the National Defence Act provides for the immediate concentration of the standing Army on the frontier with only a slight stiffening of reservists. It is intended to serve as a screen for the formation of a territorial Army within the country, based mainly on the Riflemen's organisation, the strength of which is at present some 100,000 men, with provision for their training in peace time. The total war strength of the Finnish Army may be put at some 300,000 men.

The 1937 Budget Estimates show what for Finland is a remarkable increase of armaments expenditure under the Vote for the Ministry of National Defence. They include an appropriation of 16 million Finnish marks for the expansion of the Air arm in presence of the position on the Eastern frontier and the steadily increasing armament of the Soviet Union.

In the last few years the Baltic border States have embarked on a remarkable modernisation of their national defence organisation. In every case they have strengthened and renewed their material by the introduction of modern arms and mechanised units, particularly tanks and aircraft.

Position of the "Neutrals" in the play and counter-play of alliances and armaments

I. The Scandinavian states

At the close of the World War, when the League of Nations was set up to act as the warden of peace in Europe and throughout the world, the Scandinavian countries were eager to cooperate. For years they were active on behalf of the aims of the League, trusting in the hope of a genuine reconciliation of the peoples. Above all they were "the pioneers of Disarmament." But even the Scandinavian countries have been forced in recent years to recognise that, under the influence of the Powers by which it is controlled, the League has been increasingly untrue to its principles, and can no longer be regarded—particularly since the break-down of Disarmament—as a factor of security in the international situation. The effect has been steadily to intensify the demand for a policy of concentration of the Northern Powers, strict neutrality, and increased measures of national defence in presence of the uncertain international situation.

Sweden

Sweden was the first of the Northern countries to draw military deductions from the political developments of recent years. In the spring of 1935 the Journal de Genève observed that "Sweden in the course of 125 years' neutrality has displayed a confidence which at times may be thought to have been excessive. As a loyal member of the League of Nations Sweden enthusiastically followed its advice to disarm. The Defence Act of June 12th 1925 did not indeed alter the character of the Swedish defence organisation, based as it is on compulsory service with a short period of service: but, in order to create an independent Air Force within the very modest financial limits which the Swedish Parliament was prepared to approve for the purposes of National Defence, the Army and Navy were drastically cut down." One of the leading Swedish newspapers, the Stockholms Tidningen, reported some days later that the Swedish Army had been reduced under the Defence Act of June 12th 1925 from 12 Divisions, including 6 Reserve Divisions, to 4 Divisions, while the Reserves had been done away with altogether. The total strength of the Army thereafter amounted to some 35,000 men in the summer months, some 57,000 men in the autumn manoeuvres, and in winter only some 12,000 men, although Sweden has a population of 6.14 million inhabitants with a high standard of physical fitness and military capacity under modern conditions, and industries with notable natural resources in the shape of ores, water power and timber. The trend of political developments in Europe led Sweden in 1930 to appoint a Commission of 13 members, including 3 officers, to elaborate a plan for the reorganisation of the National Defence. The Commission reported in 1935 recommending the Government to strengthen the organisation of National Defence in consideration of the increased tension in the international situation and the changes in the strategic position of Sweden resulting from the development of the Air arm.

The reform of the Defence forces, which was announced in the King's Speech at the opening of the 1936 Session of the Swedish Parliament on January 11th, was approved by both Houses of Parliament in the middle of June 1936. The effect was to enable the Defence forces to modernise their entire organisation, to lay the foundations for the creation of a tank and armoured car formation, and considerably to expand the Air arm. The final figure for the whole of the Defence expenditure for the period 1936-37 was fixed at 148 million crowns, representing an increase of some 30 million crowns over the figure of the previous Budget. The total is made up of appropriations of 79.75 millions for the Army, 27.80 millions for the Air Force, 38.75 millions for the Navy and coastal defence artillery, and 1.70 millions of expenditure for all three Forces in common. The new Defence Budget for the period beginning July 1st 1936 will therefore be some 24 per cent higher than its predecessor. It includes provision for a marked acceleration of the process of strengthening and modernising the existing war material, which is to be completed within the next three budget years instead of in ten years as originally proposed. Of the 79.5 million crowns devoted to improvements in military and naval armament, 50 millions are to be made available in three instalments of 17, 17 and 16 millions respectively in the next three Budgets in order to bring the armed forces to a condition of war preparedness. The remainder of the programme is spread over the following years down to 1946. Each arm will in future have its own Head: hitherto only the Air Force had its own Head. There is now to be a Commander-in-Chief of the Army and another of the Navy. The period of service is to be raised from 140 to 175 days. The number of officers in the Army is to be increased from 1,686 to 2,112, and the number of N.C.O.s and men from 6,241 to 6,706. The peace organisation of the Army is to be as follows:

- 4 Divisions: 1 Division, Headquarters Kristianstad,
- 2 Division, Headquarters Östersund,
- 3 Division, Headquarters Skövde,
- 4 Division, Headquarters Stockholm.

Noorland units.
Gotland units.
Certain army troops.

It is not yet settled what troops will be allocated to the different Divisions in the peace-time Army.

In case of war, the Army is to consist of 6 Divisions, one Light Brigade and Army troops. Each Division will then be made up of 3 Infantry regiments, one Cavalry battalion, one Artillery regiment, one Divisional Signals company and one Pioneer battalion. The Light Brigade will consist in war-time of two regiments of Cavalry (the Body Cavalry regiment and the Skanska Cavalry regiment), one Cavalry battalion, one Artillery Section, one Signals and one Pioneer Company. The Army troops will include in war-time one tank unit, one Artillery unit, one Signals unit, one Pioneer unit and one Army Service unit, together with Intendance and Ordnance units.

The Air arm is being completely reorganised. It will in future constitute a separate arm of the Defence Forces. It is being brought up to the following strength (note that in Sweden a 'squadron' is called a 'flotilla' and a 'flight' a 'division'):

- 2 medium heavy bombing flotillas of 3 divisions each, each division consisting of 12 planes,
- 2 light bombing flotillas of 3 divisions each, each division consisting of 12 planes,
- 1 fighter flotilla of 3 divisions, each of 15 planes,
- 1 Army air flotilla of 3 divisions, each of 12 planes,
- 1 Navy air flotilla consisting of one torpedo and one long distance reconnaissance division, each of 12 planes, and
- 1 short distance reconnaissance division of 8 planes.

Further, the cruiser Gotland is equipped with 8 planes, 2 catapults and tow-sail. The effect is to increase the total number of front line war aircraft from 100 to 257 aircraft. The training school is transferred to Ljungbyhed, and is given the name of Air War School. A separate corps of air officers is in process of formation. The completion of this programme of reorganisation of the Air arm will take years. It is also proposed to strengthen the anti-aircraft resources considerably. There is at present one anti-aircraft regiment with 4 anti-aircraft batteries and one search-light battery.

Special significance attaches in the national defences of Sweden to the unrestricted possession of the island of Gotland. In the hand of a foreign Power, Gotland might not merely serve as a first-rate air and naval basis: its possession would give the enemy the command of Southern Sweden and the most important parts of the country from the military point of view. For this reason the island has always constituted a separate military district, and has a coastal artillery corps for its defence. In order successfully to meet an enemy invasion of Northern Sweden, the fortress of Boden at the point of intersection of the Bottensee-coastal railway and the "riksgränsbau" has been developed into the strongest fortified point in the North of Europe. Örebro and Boden together constitute a separate military district. A strategic railway running parallel to the Bottensee-coastal railway has also been in process of construction during the past year in the interior of Northern Sweden.

Sweden's determined initiative in the matter of the reform of her Defence Forces and the protection of her people is held up as a model in the patriotic Press of all the other Scandinavian countries. Newspaper articles have pointed out to the Governments of Norway and Denmark that only a "defence programme securely based on the will of the people can constitute a firm support for the foreign policy which Scandinavia wishes to pursue and the neutrality she wishes to uphold."

Denmark

Danish policy is based on retention of the Danish territorial acquisitions after the war in North Schleswig and defence of the passages from the Baltic to the North Sea, namely, the Öresund, the Greater and the Lesser Belt. The capital Copenhagen is exposed to attack from the air and from the sea as a result of its position at the entry to the Öresund and the weakness of its fortifications. Denmark's defences are nevertheless very slight, so that there is an earnest desire for mutual co-operation with the other Scandinavian States.

The Danish Army since 1932 has been a skeleton army. Military service is obligatory on all citizens: but of the 14,000 who annually become liable for service only some 8,500 are actually called up. The period of training is 150 days in the Infantry and Artillery, 365 days in the Cavalry, and 200 days in the Air arm. The law provides for two further periods of service of 25 days each.

For these periods it is usual to call up four years, so that there is commonly an army of 12,000 to 15,000 men available for the autumn manoeuvres. The peace strength of the Army is 32 Infantry battalions, 14 squadrons including 5 cyclist and 2 armoured squadrons, some 1,200 light and 290 heavy machine guns, and 96 light and 36 heavy guns. Tanks have not yet been introduced; but the mechanisation of the Army is proceeding. The country is divided into two Divisional districts; and this organisation holds good in war-time also, when there should be an army of 150,000 troops fit for field service. The Air Force is divided into the Seeland Air detachment and the Jutland Air detachment; the latter is in process of formation. There are at present 7 flights with 30 fighter aeroplanes, 20 reconnaissance planes and 10 bombing planes. The Balloon Park has two captive balloons and one dirigible with a low-power motor. Including second-line planes, there should be some 120 aircraft altogether for Army purposes. The Naval Air Force also has 3 naval air flights with some 30 planes. The anti-aircraft forces consist of 8 mechanised anti-aircraft batteries and a number of anti-aircraft machine gun companies. There is also a civilian "Air Defence" in the shape of the Rekyll Corps with guns of its own and a volunteer Air despatch-rider service under military direction.

Denmark is alive to the importance of a Defence Force capable of effective action, as was recently made clear by the utterances of the Danish Premier at the opening of the autumn Session of the Danish Parliament, in the course of which he took occasion to say that the frontiers of Denmark would be afforded protection by means of improvements in the Army and Navy, and that the Defence forces would be equipped in such a manner as to enable them to fulfil their duty of upholding Danish neutrality.

The Netherlands Premier's significant words can only be interpreted as meaning that the Netherlands, who are not at the moment a member of the Council of the League, reserve the right to review for themselves any unanimous decision of the Council as to the aggressor, before they come to a decision in regard to the passage of foreign troops over Dutch territory. The purpose of the Netherlands Premier in making such a declaration was no doubt to proclaim inside and outside his native country the sincere desire of the Netherlands for the maintenance of a policy of unconditional, independent neutrality.

In view however of the increasing international tension and the enhanced importance attaching in consequence to the first of the two questions above-mentioned, the Netherlands Army authorities were led in the course of 1935 to prepare a far-reaching project for speeding up the modernisation of the Netherlands defences.

The Speech from the Throne accordingly at the opening of the new Session of the States General in the autumn of 1935 referred to the question of Defence in the following terms: "In view of the changed international conditions, proposals will be laid before you for certain special measures in regard to the means of defence of the Kingdom." The proposals in question were not embodied in the Ordinary Budget for the year: but in November 1935 they were laid before the Chamber in the form of a "Bill concerning the Establishment of a special Defence Fund for the Modernisation and Strengthening of the National Defences in the course of the next four years." Of the total sum of 53.4 million guilders which was to be raised by loan, 31 millions were for the Army to modernise and increase the existing forces of Artillery, armoured cars, aircraft and anti-aircraft guns and to develop the frontier fortifications, while the balance of 22.4 millions was for the Navy.

In his remarks in the course of the debate on the Defence proposals in the Second Chamber in the middle of February 1936 the Netherlands Premier Dr. Colijn was at pains to explain that the military measures put forward by the Government were not directed against any country, but were intended solely to safeguard the Netherlands' security. The Netherlands Government did not suggest that anyone cherished a deliberate intention of encroaching on Netherlands sovereignty. In introducing their proposals the Government had merely taken into account the complete transformation of the international situation. Since the failure of the disarmament negotiations, they had seen one country after the other proceed to develop its own armaments. Only the Netherlands still remained unprotected on every side. The defence measures of other countries could not be left out of account: on the contrary, they were an occasion for intensified activity on the part of the Netherlands. The Government did not anticipate or expect direct attack by any great Power; but it was none the less desirable to bring the national defences up to such a degree of strength as would avail—as in the years 1914-1918—to convince any belligerent that he had nothing to gain from a violation of Dutch neutrality.

A few weeks later the Government stated in reply to a question in the First Chamber that no conversations had taken place between the Netherlands General Staff or any other General Staffs, and any statements to the contrary were false. The Government had no intention of deviating from its traditional policy of declining military conversations with the General Staffs of other countries, or of discarding the principle of neutrality in the strictest sense of the word. When Belgium later made her declaration of neutrality, the Netherlands, true to their own principles, gave it their unqualified approval.

For the proper understanding of the new expansion of the Netherlands defences, it is necessary to bear in mind that the Army under the Defence laws is a skeleton militia based on universal service organised (generally speaking) on a territorial footing. The active period of service is 5½ months and some 35 days repetition periods of training. In the case of the horsed artillery and Air Force active service is for 12 months and in the case of the Cavalry 15 months. The Army in the home country has hitherto been organised in 4 Divisions and one Light Brigade, the latter consisting of one cyclist regiment with three training companies, 2 Cavalry regiments consisting of 10 squadrons (two of them with machine gun sections) and one armoured car squadron, as well as one horsed artillery corps with two training batteries. Each of the four Divisions is divided into 2 brigades of 3 Infantry regiments, each with 2 training companies, and one light Artillery regiment with two horsed training batteries. The 4th Division has in addition one heavy artillery regiment of 2 motorised batteries and one field section. There are also available as Army troops one heavy artillery regiment, one anti-aircraft corps (each with two motorised training batteries), one regiment of engineers consisting of one battalion of Pioneers and one battalion of Railway troops, Signals and search-light formations, and a "Corps" of bridging and boat mine-laying units. The total strength of the peace-time army in the summer months is some 20,000 men. In the training exercises in September of each year the number rises to some 35,000 men, and sinks again in the winter to some 15,000 men. In war the Netherlands can put into the field more than 300,000 men odd. The Air arm in the home country consists of 24 flights with some 270 aircraft and an Air personnel of about 1,200 officers and men. The ground anti-aircraft defences consist of one anti-aircraft section of 2 batteries and emplaced anti-aircraft guns. The land fortifications have hitherto consisted of the "Fort Holland" as the principal centre of resistance. It comprises the new Holland waterway, the fortified point of Amsterdam, the fortified point of Hollandsch Diep and Volkerak and the fortifications at the mouth of the Meuse and the Haringvliet. The entry to the Ysselmeer is also protected by the Helder fort. The defensive strength of these fortified positions is supplemented by the possibility of inundating extensive areas.

The new military proposals contemplate the fortification of the Eastern parts of the country. A large number of blockhouses and casemates are to be constructed on the chief crossings of the Meuse, the Waal and the Yssel. So far as the development of the Army is concerned, the principal changes are in connection with the speeding up of mobilisation and the increase of war material. A sum of 10 millions is allocated for the purchase of anti-aircraft guns, and 4½ millions are to be used for the purchase of aircraft.

The Infantry are to be equipped with anti-tank and Infantry guns, and the process of mechanisation is to be carried further, which in view of the admirable condition of the Netherlands road system is likely to be repaying. In addition to the sums available out of the Defence Fund, the Ministry of National Defence submitted a Supplementary Estimate to the 1935 Budget in March 1936 for a further 300,000 guilders for the purchase of 12 armoured cars, to be stationed together at Herzogenbusch in the South of the country, as also for increased expenditure on the replacement of older types of motors and the strengthening of the Military Police force. There is also to be a special Frontier Defence Force for the continuous occupation of the newly erected casemates.

The Government proposals for the reorganisation and reinforcement of the Netherlands armed forces are still regarded by the majority of the Chamber and by leading personages in the country as inadequate. The Government are aware of this feeling, and recognise the necessity of further strengthening the national defences. They announced in the middle of November 1936 that they were making preparations for further action in the matter, but would hold such action up until after the Elections to the Chamber in 1937, i.e. for half a year or more. The new proposals are likely to include a not inconsiderable increase in the numbers annually called up, a lengthening of the period of service and the introduction of a third training for the reservists.

But all these measures of rearmament, like the references to foreign politics in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the new Session of the States General in September 1936, are no more than a confirmation of the traditional Dutch policy of cautious international cooperation without adherence to one Power more than another, the policy of neutrality with the single object of cultivating friendly relations with all countries and eschewing the formation of groups for the organisation of military predominance.

III. Switzerland*)

It was not until the year 1933 that Switzerland made a serious beginning with the execution of military reforms made necessary by the geographical situation of the country and long since indicated as essential alike by historians such as Prof. Carl Meyer, international lawyers such as Prof. Dietrich Schindler, and military leaders such as the late General Wille, Colonel of Division Bircher and others. In December 1933 a first extraordinary credit of 82 million Swiss francs was made available for the necessary rearming of the Army and the extension of the Aircraft resources of the country. The Law of September 28th 1934 improved the conditions of military training; and at the end of 1934 a further 6 million Swiss francs were made available out of the Labour Employment Fund for constructional work on fortifications. But these measures were not sufficient to ensure the proper defence of the country. Ever since 1919 the Swiss General Wille had been putting forward a list of measures designed to prevent a violation of the national frontiers. He placed them in the following order of importance. "Strengthen the striking power of our men by every possible means: provide with that object for a sufficient number of men on the frontier line: and, lastly, build fortifications. An offensive war will do more to protect our country than any mere defence. Those who want to attack us must be made to know that only very greatly superior numbers will be able to force us into purely defensive action." The proposal which was drawn up in 1934 for the reorganisation of the Army and the strengthening of its armaments showed that the Swiss Federal Council had drawn the moral from the failure of the League of Nations and the collapse of the Disarmament Conference, and were alive to the fact that the existing organisation of the Army was no longer adequate for the defence of Swiss neutrality. The international tension of the year 1935 completely convinced the Swiss Confederation that the surest means of upholding one's neutrality in the event of military complications between neighbours who are great Powers is a strong army. A „Neue Truppenordnung“ (New Army Regulations) had long been in preparation with the object of adapting the Swiss militia army to operative requirements by reorganisation, and increasing its striking power and power of resistance by modernising and strengthening its armament. For this purpose however the appropriations proposed were no longer adequate. A Defence Loan of 235,000,000 Swiss francs for the purpose of strengthening the national defences was approved by the Federal Assembly in June 1936. The message of the Federal Council to the Assembly on this occasion referred to the strained international situation, and proceeded:

*) The history of Switzerland's neutrality has been dealt with at length in No. 166/170 of this periodical, pp. 16 ff.

“It has been shown that the Treaties by which the victor Powers hoped to retain the position they had attained as a result of the outcome of the War and to keep the peace have not kept pace with the development of events. Switzerland has in more than one respect a key position in the centre of Europe. The localisation of any war that may break out appears to be out of the question in view of the obligations under the League of Nations and the numerous separate Agreements, so that the position of a State situated in the heart of Europe is every day more critical. Even if a conflict should break out in the Danubian basin or in the Balkans, our neighbours and the League will be involved by their sympathies in the matter—even, it may be, against their own will. Our military and political neutrality is admitted in principle; but it may very easily happen in connection with some issue that is on the border-line between the military and the economic—such as the question of sanctions—that difficulties will arise which will give an enemy the looked-for pretext for dragging Switzerland into the war on the ground that we have infringed our neutrality.”

In the early part of June 1936 the National Council approved the proposed Loan, and a few days later it received the assent of the Council of State. The Bill for the Strengthening of the Swiss National Defence thus passed into law.

The way in which the credit is distributed shows that the greater part is intended for the strengthening of the Air and Frontier defences. The appropriations for the different objects of expenditure are as follows:

	Swiss francs
Passive Air Defence	12.3 millions
Ground defence	48.2 „
Aircraft	55.3 „
	115.8 millions
Frontier Defence, new arms and munitions	21.0 millions
Fortification works	25.0 „
	46.0 millions
Light troops	14.1 millions
Artillery	26.0 „
Engineers	5.6 „
War bridging material	4.3 „
Sanitation service	0.8 „
Corps and Reserve material	8.0 „

The appeal to the readiness of the people to make sacrifices by subscribing to the Defence Loan yielded a total sum of 332 million Swiss francs. The Federal Council decided on October 23rd 1936 to take over the whole of the amount subscribed—i.e. to include the 97 millions by which the amount of the subscriptions exceeded the amount originally proposed for the Loan—and to pass it into a Fund for Special Purposes of National Defence, created for the purpose. The Neue Zürcher Zeitung remarked in this connection that the additional odd 100 millions were urgently required for increased expenditure on the development of the national defences. It is not anxiety as to the inflow of the millions in question, the writer added, which bulks largest in the minds of the responsible Army authorities: it is rather anxiety as to the magnitude of the military requirements which the feverish armaments of other countries have imposed on Switzerland. “It is an open secret,” he continued, “that the Defence Programme on which the 235 million credit is based was the bare minimum that the Army authorities could accept consistently with their consciences, and that the figures originally submitted by the Military Department were very much bigger. We are called upon today to strengthen our defence forces as soon as possible, in order in the near future to have an army at our disposal which will inspire respect in other countries, not merely by its determination to defend the national soil, but also by the material strength of its armament. If we are to deepen the impression in the minds of our neighbours of our readiness to defend ourselves, our first business is to strengthen our front line.

We are not therefore in a position to meet, for example, wishes that are expressed for heavy financial outlay on passive anti-air defences in the interior of the country, unless we have first made adequate provision for the military equipment of the fighting force. The Federal Council in its Message on the provision of new arms for the Infantry in November 1933 made no concealment of the fact that the amount for which it was asking was a bare minimum that would sooner or later have to be supplemented; and the Message accompanying the present Defence credits expressly states in a number of different passages that any considerable cuts can only be tolerated temporarily, and that new expenditure will be required to make good the consequences in the immediate future. For instance, it may be pointed out that the 235 million Programme does not yet make it possible to attempt the replacement of all the 12 cm. wheel belt guns, which are not up to modern requirements, by modern 10.5 cm. guns; and again, cuts have been made in connection with the motorisation of the heavy artillery which will have to be made good at an early date. The position is much the same in the case of the active Air Defence and the Frontier Defence: both have to be created from the beginning, and both will call for heavy expenditure accordingly.”

The above particulars give a picture of the difficulties which stand in the way of a thorough reform and rearmament of the Swiss Defence forces. But they also serve to show that the Swiss people is fully conscious of the urgent need for quick and comprehensive measures which will ensure the national defence of the country. The comprehensive measures of rearmament, which have now been made possible as a result of the big military credit made available, are closely connected with the „Neue Truppenordnung“, the purpose of which is the reorganisation of the Swiss Army as a whole. The Council of State and the National Council unanimously approved the Law, after it had been passed by the Federal Council, on September 30th and October 6th 1936 respectively. The „Neue Truppenordnung“ will now be prepared in 1937 and come into force on January 1st 1938.

The strategic considerations on which the new Constitution of the Swiss Army is based are formulated by Federal Councillor Minger, the Head of the Swiss Military Department, as follows. The object of Switzerland in a future war, he says, must be to cover the flank of all neighbouring States in such a way that they all realise there is no danger of surprises against which they have to guard on the part of Switzerland. The reorganisation of the Swiss Army, he explains, is to be based on this conception of its rôle as the protector of its neighbour's flanks, taken in conjunction with the defence of the national neutrality in the sense solely of frontier defence and refusal to allow the country to be used for the passage of foreign armies; and the same is true of the measures taken to strengthen the country's armaments.

The object of the new Constitution of the Army is therefore, apart from the strengthening of its striking power by more modern and more mobile armaments, to provide for:

1. reinforcement and reorganisation of the Frontier Defence in a manner taking into account the prospect of warlike operations at the present day being initiated without notice given,
2. speeding up of the process of mobilisation, and of
3. the preparedness of the Divisions for immediate operations.

The main demand of the military authorities, apart from their insistence on an adequate Frontier and Air Defence force, is for simplification and acceleration of the concentration after mobilisation. The method adopted is to recruit and mobilise the Divisions and brigades, each for itself, within the narrowest possible area immediately behind the frontiers. This arrangement makes the mobilisation and concentration independent to a large extent of the railways, the short distances involved in the concentration being covered by quick marches on foot. The essential difference between the new system of Army organisation and the old (dating from the year 1924) which is still in force lies, not so much in the fact that the present 6 heavy Divisions of 6 Infantry regiments each are to be replaced by 9 lighter Divisions of 3 Infantry regiments each, or that the present Divisional formations of 5 Mountain brigades are to be replaced by 4 independent Mountain brigade formations, as in the proposed division of the Army into three categories of troops for Frontier Defence, Cover and March purposes respectively.

The real new feature is the Frontier Defence troops. Their object is to protect the mobilisation and concentration of the cover troops and, with the aid of the powerful frontier barriers, to prevent surprise invasions by motorised columns. With this object they can be mobilised separately from the other troops, and be available for use within a few hours. Each Cover Division is to have a Frontier Defence brigade, which will be under its orders in peace as well as in war. In case of war the Frontier Defence troops—after fulfilling their function as brigades—will be attached to the Divisions for transference as needed to other parts of the front which may be threatened by the enemy. The Frontier Defence troops will be recruited from the "Elite" (Auszug), the Landwehr and the Landsturm of persons liable to military service who live in the neighbourhood of the frontiers: they will be separate from the Divisions. Their armament is to be highly mechanised: they will have automatic arms, infantry guns, anti-tank guns and their own artillery. Till this can be carried through, there are to be standing Frontier Defence companies. One such company was to be formed, according to Federal Councillor Minger, in 1936; and others will follow in 1937.

The rest of the Swiss Army, apart from the Frontier Defence troops, will be organised under the new system as follows:

- 3 Army Corps of 9 Divisions including 3 Mountain Divisions (viz. 3, 8 and 9 [Gotthard] Divisions),
- 4 Mountain brigades for Unterwallis (the lower Valais) including the garrison of the fortress of St. Maurice, Oberwallis (the upper Valais), Ticino (under the Gotthard Division), and Graubünden (Grisons) respectively,
- 3 light brigades to reinforce the frontier defence,
- 7 Artillery regiments independent of the Divisional artillery, 3 motor gun (12 cm.) regiments, 2 heavy 15 cm. and 2 light 12 cm. field howitzer regiments,
- 3 Air regiments with a total of 21 Air companies,
- 10-11 anti-aircraft regiments.

These formations will be divided into Cover and March troops. The purpose of the Cover troops is to protect the mobilisation and concentration of the mass of the Army. They will be recruited territorially like the Frontier Defence troops, so as to be available for use at the shortest notice. Cover troops in the West will be the 1 and 2 Divisions, in the North the 4, 5 and 6 Divisions, and in the East the 7 Division. On the South front there will be the 4 independent Mountain brigades. The 3 and 8 Divisions around Bern and Lucerne will be the March troops. From their central situation they can be thrown into the line at any point in case of invasion as the immediate reserve to reinforce the Cover troops at the point of attack: they are real Mountain Divisions. The 9 Division is the only Division which does not conform with this organisation in Cover and March troops. It will continue to be known as the Gotthard Division; and as such will provide the garrisons to man the St. Gotthard fortifications out of its permanent cadres of mobile nucleus troops.

The Division will in future consist of 3 Infantry regiments—but the 2, 6 and 9 Divisions will each have 4 regiments, while 14 "extra-regimental battalions" will be used for special purposes—1 field artillery regiment, 1 motor gun section, 1 Mountain artillery section (this only in the case of Mountain Divisions), 1 motor infantry gun company, 1 reconnaissance company (consisting of 1 squadron, 1 cyclist company and 1 armoured car detachment), 1 sappers battalion, 1 telegraph company, 1 Sanitation section, 1 Commissariat company, 2 Infantry park companies and 1 munition motor lorry company. Under the new system each Division will have about 500 automatic arms, 63 infantry guns and trench mortars and 44 to 52 guns.

Mountain brigades will in future consist of 2 to 3 Infantry regiments, 1 motor infantry gun company, 1 motor cyclist company, 1 Mountain artillery section, 1 to 2 motor gun sections, 1 artillery observation company, 1 to 2 sapper companies, 1 Telegraph company and the corresponding train.

Light brigades will consist of 2 regiments, each of 3 squadrons, 1 cyclist battalion with 1 motorised light machine gun company and 3 companies directly under Brigade Headquarters: of the three last-named companies, one will be armed with light machine guns, and the other two with infantry gun and sapping and mining material respectively.

The three future Army Corps, each under a separate Corps Command, will each have 2 to 4 Divisions or mountain brigades, 1 light brigade, 2 to 3 artillery regiments, 1 pontoon battalion, 1 telegraph company, 1 sanitation transport section, 1 field hospital and 1 munition motor lorry section. In time of war the Federal Council will have power to form a fourth Army Corps in addition to the three peace Corps.

A beginning was made with the introduction of the new arms under the Law of 1935; and the process will be carried further and faster, now that the necessary funds have been made available by the Defence Loan, in conjunction with the new Army system. Automatic weapons are to be introduced, especially in the case of the light troops: the latter will now include cyclist and motor cyclist units in addition to cavalry, which it has been decided after initial hesitations to retain. The principal automatic arm contemplated is the light machine gun with carriage. The heavy machine gun squadrons have been abandoned in favour of the Infantry. On the other hand the light troops are to have motorised infantry guns. The Frontier Defence troops' armament is to consist primarily of light and heavy machine guns, so as to enable them to contend with hostile armoured cars. In addition to existing stocks the following new arms are to be procured: 552 light machine guns, of which 324 will be with carriages, 36 heavy machine guns, 207 infantry guns and the corresponding armoured cars. It is not quite clear from the Defence Bill whether these provisions relate only to the arming of the light troops, or if the Frontier Defence troops are included. As for the Artillery, the basic arm is to be the 10.5 cm. gun, which has been tested since 1933 and has proved its worth; and in principle one section of 2 to 3 batteries of heavy motor guns is to be attached to each Army unit, on the theory that every Army unit should have, generally speaking, as many field and mountain batteries as it has battalions. In the first instance 25 out of date 12.5 cm. motor gun batteries will be equipped with the new wide range motor gun. In the light of the experiences gained at the last manoeuvres there appears to be a certain reserve in regard to the mechanisation of the artillery in view of the character of the Swiss terrain; and the same is the case in regard to the Tank arm, the use of which in very broken country is restricted by natural obstacles within definite limits.

On the subject of fortifications, the Defence Bill speaks only in summary terms. The proposed new works are not likely to take the form of the grand scale connected works laid out on the St. Gotthard and at St. Maurice. It is more likely intended to erect smaller works to serve as a barrier to motorised and armoured enemy troops. Fortifications of this kind are contemplated on all the frontiers.

In the matter of motorisation the „Neue Truppenordnung“ makes very extensive demands. The greater part of all the motor lorries in the country are to be commandeered in this connection; but the number will not be sufficient to satisfy all Army requirements. It is therefore proposed to issue regulations to facilitate the ownership of motor vehicles by private persons, or to procure the necessary park by purchase on a large scale as Corps material.

The Air arm is also to be developed greatly under the Defence Bill: the Defence Loan is to be devoted, as to one-quarter of the whole or 55.3 million Swiss francs, to the acquisition of new military aircraft. A first series of 40 aircraft available for different purposes (bombing, fighting, reconnaissance etc.) are to be delivered in the near future. In an interview which the Head of the Swiss military air force, Colonel Bardet, gave to a representative of the Tribune de Geneve at last year's manoeuvres of the Air arm—the first since 1928—he said amongst other things that "new fighter and bomber types are under study, which will be able to develop a speed of up to 450 kilometres an hour. Over and above the replacement of out of date types by more modern machines, it is proposed that the Swiss Air arm should be increased gradually by some 300 new planes, and brought up to a total of some 550 to 600 planes." These aircraft are in future to be constructed in the Confederation's own works at Thun: hitherto there have been no military aircraft factories in Switzerland. The chief type under construction at present is the C 35 aeroplane. It has a speed of 340 km. per hour, and a capacity for the discharge of 200 kg. of bombs, and can be fitted with a 20 mm. gun and 2 machine guns in the wings and one machine gun in the stern. Side by side with the increase in the number of aircraft, provision is made for extension of the number of observers and pilots this year under training. The existing total personnel of the Air arm, consisting of 230 officers and 3,000 non-commissioned officers and men, is to be brought up to a total of 6,000 men, not including anti-aircraft formations. The „Neue Truppenordnung“ makes provision for 3 Air regiments in addition to the Staff of the Air troops. Hitherto there have been no Air regiments in Switzerland, but only 5 Air sections and 1 Air Staff section—a total of 18 companies in all. The new Air regiments will be divided into 2 to 3 sections, each section consisting of 3 to 4 companies, so that there will be 21 companies in all.

The Air arm thus strengthened will be under a unified Command, which will also assume the direction of the civilian anti-air defences. Proposals have also been put forward for a breach in the underlying principle of the Swiss militia army, in the case of the Air arm as in the case of the Frontier Defence troops, in the sense of establishing a corps of long service airmen available for use at any moment. After the „Neue Truppenordnung“ has been put into force, the Swiss Air arm will have available in the first instance:

6 fighting flights of, in all	54 planes
29 flights available for different purposes, in all	232 „
	total 286 planes.

The anti-aircraft defences consist at present of one anti-aircraft section of 3 companies of 8 guns each. There are also anti-aircraft guns available in different localities for civilian defence. 48 million Swiss francs of the Defence Loan are to be used for the development of the anti-aircraft artillery. It is proposed, amongst other things, to form 30 batteries of 7.5 cm. guns, 63 batteries of smaller calibre guns and special machine guns. Furthermore, the passive Air defences are to be considerably strengthened by an appropriation of 12.3 million Swiss francs from the Defence Loan.

These comprehensive measures of rearmament are clear evidence of Switzerland's intention to spare no financial or material effort in order to provide for the country's safety by the maintenance of the best possibly armed neutrality.

DEVELOPMENT OF ITALY'S NATIONAL DEFENCE

In Rome on October 27th 1930 the Fascist troop commanders were summoned to the Palazzo Venezia to report.

"A hard year lies behind us. So many comments have appeared on the subject of my speeches in Tuscany and in Milan that I propose now to comment on them myself. The intention of those speeches was to tear the mask from the face of that insincere Europe which talks of peace in Geneva and prepares everywhere else for war."

As he spoke, Mussolini took out a bulky document, held it up in front of him, and continued:

"In this book there are noted, day by day, the military preparations made in the years 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930. In presence of these preparations could I hesitate to arouse the Italian people to face the situation created? Those from whom I have torn the mask have of course endeavoured to twist the thing round and represent Italy as the only wolf in a peaceful flock of sheep. But that is too childish. Fascist Italy is arming in proportion as the others arm. When words suffice to settle disputes between nations, I am ready to attach real value to them. But it must be made clear that we are arming, morally and materially, not for attack but in self-defence."

In August 1934 the manoeuvres had been completed with a mass of men and material engaged on either side. Before a gathering of Generals and 2,000 higher officers of all arms Mussolini made his famous "Tank Speech."

"We are a warlike nation, and are like to become increasingly warlike, for that is what we want to be. As I am not afraid of words, I add that we are a militarist nation. To complete our armaments, the whole life of the Italian nation, political, economic and moral, must be adjusted to military necessities."

At Avellino on August 30th 1936 the Grand Manœuvres were once more completed, and millions of people listened to the Duce's broadcast.

"I want the Italian people to take my words absolutely literally. It is not in spite of the Abyssinian War, but because of it, that Italian arms have now a greater striking force than ever before. At any moment at a simple word of command we can mobilise 8,000,000 men within a few hours. The Italian people should know that its peace is assured, within and without the frontiers; and with its peace the peace of the world is assured. We shall not join in the nonsensical talk of perpetual peace, for that is at variance with Fascist doctrine. We want to live at peace with all countries, and to keep peace as long as it can be kept; and for that very reason we are ready to make our daily concrete contribution with a view to cooperation in the peace work of the peoples."

"But after the disastrous failure of the Disarmament Conference, and in presence of the competition in rearmament which has already begun and can no longer be arrested, as also in consideration of the political position, the watchword for Fascist Italy can only be: 'Strong, ever stronger, strong enough to face all eventualities and to look destiny, in whatever guise, firmly in the face!' To this supreme categorical imperative the whole life of the people must be, and will be, subordinated."

At Bologna on October 24th 1936 the 10th Division of Black Shirts had been reviewed; and Mussolini in his speech looked back on the last ten years of Fascism, which he divided into three periods. The third period, he said, began with the year 1934 and its sign was Empire. A people without space could not live, and must suffocate. A people with a thousand-year old culture like the Italians was entitled to a place in the sun.

"From this city of Bologna," he proceeded to say, "which in past centuries held up the torch of human wisdom, I wish today to send out a message to the world, a message which is to go over Alps and seas, a message of peace, peace in work and work in peace. At this turning point between the 14th and 15th years of the Fascist calendar I raise aloft a big olive branch. But—mark you!—the olive branch waves above a forest of 8,000,000 bayonets."

These speeches, rounded off and completed by the Milan Speech of November 1st 1936 (for text of which see No. 171/175 pp. 31-32), embody the main aims of Fascist policy. The third period of Fascism has been taken a great step forward thanks to the iron determination and energy of the Duce. The accounts with the Allies left over from the World War have been settled: the place in the sun has been won: the conquest of Abyssinia has given Italy the wider space she needed for her existence: and Italian prestige throughout the world has been strengthened.

"It was only because the Roman legionary was invincible," the Duce wrote in an article at the end of September 1936, "that he was able to say proudly to the world 'Civis Romanus sum'."

The Duce has certainly spared no pains to seek and ensue that "armed peace" of which he spoke in his Milan Speech by strengthening the Italian Defence forces. His assumption of the War Ministry in 1933 was a landmark in the development of the Italian Army. A new military era began after a period of some years during which the situation in regard to the national defences had been to a certain extent at a standstill and the military resources of the Italian people were not fully exploited. With Mussolini as War Minister far-reaching reforms were carried through in the Army by Committees specially appointed for the purpose. In September 1934 fundamental legislation was submitted to the legislature, and passed by the latter at the end of the year, on the military preparation of the Nation. The legislation in question consisted of three Acts on the principles of pre-military instruction, on the establishment of military courses (cultura militare) at middle-grade and higher schools, and on the introduction of post-military education respectively. Under these laws all Italians capable of bearing arms undergo compulsory military instruction from their 15th to their 55th year, even though not taken by the Army. The laws constitute a notable addition to the Law of February 1932 on the disciplina di guerra, which imposes an obligation in case of war on all persons not called up for active service, including women, to take a "share in the moral and material defence of the country" between the ages of 17 and 70. This latter Act embodies, in addition to provisions for the organisation of the "internal front," preparations for the expropriation of all sources of the nation's strength. It subjects, not only all individual Italians of either sex, but also all corporations and undertakings to a form of military discipline. The Law of 1925 on the Organisation of the Nation for War, which contains the expression "totalitarian war," had already extended the rights of the State to all industrial activities within the country. Its provisions have recently been extended by the establishment of the office of Commissioner General for War Industry, which is responsible for the control and allocation of the resources of war industries in the interest of national defence. Its duties include the distribution of the available raw materials for war manufactures, the allocation of orders to the different branches of industry, the control of imports, prices and the use of labour. The Commissioner General is the Chairman of the Civil Mobilisation Committee and is directly under the Head of the Government in the latter's capacity as Chairman of the Supreme Commission of National Defence. As a corollary to the mobilisation of the whole of the country's material resources in preparation for war, and as a supplement to the legislation of December 1934 on pre-military and post-military training, steps were taken at the beginning of 1936 to introduce a system of "military books" viz, military passports containing particulars of the current physical and moral development and military preparedness of the "cittadino soldato" (i.e. the citizen who is called upon to do military service in any form) from his 15th to his 32nd year. The introduction of a uniform period of service for one year for all Italians, which was at the same time proposed, was intended to emphasise the equal incidence of the military obligation on all: but the period of service has not hitherto been reduced from 18 to 12 months, as intended, and in the light of recent political developments in Europe is not likely to be so reduced for the present. A novel feature was the introduction of compulsory service in the case of the Air arm.

The education of the Italian people in the idea of national defence has produced a marked change in the attitude of the whole nation as well as of the individual Italian. One instance of this is the decision of the Fascist Party leaders of May 19th 1936 which, in pursuance of the oath taken by the Italian people before the Duce on May 9th 1936, enrolls all Fascists capable of bearing arms between the ages of 21 and 55 in the Militia "in order to confirm the warlike spirit of the Black Shirts and the character of the Roman People." The military situation of Italy is not affected by this decision, since the existing legislation already imposed an obligation to take part in the national defence in time of war on all persons between the ages of 15 and 70, including persons not called to active service: but the decision nevertheless lends new meaning to the conception of the "Nation in arms." As an English paper, the Daily Telegraph, observed, the effect of the Party's decision is to show an additional 1 to 1.2 million names on the rolls of the Militia, which will bring the total strength (including the present 500,000 members) up to 1.5 to 1.7 million men. By a stroke of the pen the entire Militia is given a permanent military organisation with an equipment which does not fall short of that of the Army in any respect.

The Volunteer Militia is composed of the Ordinary Militia and the Special Militias. The Ordinary Militia, serving under the Fascist Party decision above-mentioned until the 55th (hitherto 50th) year, consisted down to the autumn of 1936 of 6 main group headquarters, 33 group headquarters, 122 legions, 13 supplementary legions and 6 independent cohorts. Since October 1st 1936 the organisation of the Militia has been adapted to military requirements in the event of mobilisation, and now consists of General Headquarters in Rome, 14 zone headquarters in Turin, Genoa, Milan, Bologna, Bolzano, Trieste, Florence, Ancona, Rome, Aquila, Naples, Bari, Palermo and Cagliari, and 29 battalion group headquarters which are for the most part in the same place as the headquarters of the 30 Infantry Divisions.

The Legions, the number of which is gradually to be increased to 150, are under the battalion group headquarters.

Each Legion is sub-divided into:

- 1 "Youth" battalion (destined to be called up for military service in the Army);
- 1 "Senior" battalion (for local service, air defence, coastal defence and the like. Note that the coastal batteries in Italy are manned by the Militia);
- 2 additional cohorts, one for each of the two battalions to which they are attached, manned by reservists after their service with the colours.

The following are the effective strengths of these formations:

- 1. 1,321 officers and 6,581 men permanently serving on the staffs or in the cadres.
- 2. 36,974 officers and 416,635 men liable to enrolment for service in the Militia, including Black Shirt battalions, but not including 5 Black Shirt Divisions at war strength which at the end of 1936 were still in East Africa.
- 3. 165 officers and 722 men permanently serving in the Air Defence and Coastal Defence Militias.

The Air Defence Militia and the Coastal Defence Militia have lately been combined in so far as their higher commands are concerned. There is now a single Inspectorate for the two with 6 joint legion groups. Under these are 14 legion headquarters for the Air Defence Militia with 10 independent cohorts, and 2 separate legion headquarters with 2 independent cohorts for the Coastal Defence Militia. The joint Inspectorate of the two Militias is under the General Staff of the Army or Navy, according as the units concerned are military or naval, in respect of service organisation, training, disposition and material: in administrative and personal matters the Inspectorate is under the General Headquarters of the Volunteer Militia. In time of war, the various units of the two militias become subordinate in all respects to the armed force which has jurisdiction over the area.

The following effectives of the special militias are in addition permanently in service:

with the		Officers		Men
Railway militia	14 Legions	=	327*)	4,525*)
Post and Telegraph militia	12 Sections	=	80	520

Forest militia	9 Legions	=	328	3,672
Colonial militia	2 Legions	=	88	2,890

The original function of the Militia was primarily internal: to it was entrusted the maintenance of public order. Until the outbreak of the Abyssinian War only relatively small elements of the Militia ranked as part of the Defence forces, namely, 2 or 3 battalions of assault Militia troops to each Division of the regular Army, which were attached to the latter for training or manoeuvre purposes. The position changed considerably with the outbreak of hostilities in Abyssinia in the autumn of 1935. The Militia was expanded by the enrolment of new Black Shirt battalions, but also by additions to other arms, to such an extent that in the course of the Abyssinian campaign no less than 5 Militia Divisions at war strength were sent to East Africa. They were to be brought back to Italy by the end of 1936 and there to be demobilised. Their military achievements side by side with the regular Army Divisions were given full recognition in the Decree-Law of January 12th 1936, which provided amongst other things that "The entry of Black Shirts into Militia formations which are sent to Africa is equivalent to entry into the Royal Army. Service in such formations, including service already so performed before the publication of the present Decree, is in every respect on the same footing as service in the Army." The above provision definitively puts an end to the distinction between the volunteer Militia Divisions sent to East Africa and the regular Divisions. In the ordinary way members of the Militia on mobilisation are called up individually to the Army units to which they belong; and only the assault battalions of the Black Shirts are attached to the regular Divisions as units. The effect of the Decree of January 12th 1936 is to constitute the Militia Divisions in East Africa a part of the Army. The Black Shirts in these Divisions are subject to military law like regular soldiers. The new Italian Defence Law links the Army and the Militia even closer together, as the Militia (to which every person capable of bearing arms belongs) has the whole of the pre-military and post-military education in its hands. Membership of the Militia ceases only during the 18 months of active service. The reservist from the Army serves four more years in the general Militia and after that in the Territorial Militia, the equivalent of the German Landsturm and similar organisations in other armies.

The principle "Strong, ever stronger," the principle of "armed peace," has been systematically applied in the development of the Italian Defence forces. The first step to be taken, as a condition precedent to all other action, was the solution of the officer question. The average age of the officers' corps had to be lowered, and higher standards of performance to be enforced. The Grand Manoeuvres in the autumn of 1935 and the campaign in Abyssinia were evidence of the success achieved by the work of recent years in raising the standards, the joy in responsibility and the power of decision of the officers' corps. The new regulations with regard to promotion contained in the Officers Law of June 1934 made possible the lowering of the average age of the officers' corps by the openings for advancement which it held out, while it at the same time opened up the possibility of increase in the total number of officers. The need for such measures was intensified by the Italian decision in March 1935, in view of the international situation, not only to keep the 1913 and 1914 classes with the colours for an indefinite period, but also to call up the whole of the 1911 class. The effect of this decision was to give Italy a total of some 600,000 fully armed men under arms in April 1935. This figure was largely increased by the calling up of reservists in view of the campaign in Abyssinia: In the summer of 1936 Italy had about a million men still under arms. Since that date considerable numbers of the mobilised formations in East Africa have been brought back to Italy and demobilised. At the present time there are not more than about one Colonial Division (White) under arms in East Africa. At the end of 1936 the organisation of the home troops, after demobilisation of the last of the active Divisions brought back from East Africa, will be as follows:

- 29 Infantry Divisions,
- 3 mechanised Divisions,
- 3 mobile Divisions,
- 5 Alpine Divisions, hitherto called 'Brigades'.

The Italian Army is accordingly composed of:

- 95 Infantry regiments, of which 4 are mechanised,
- 13 regiments of Bersaglieri,
- 11 Alpine regiments,
- 12 Cavalry regiments,
- 32 Divisional artillery regiments, of which 2 are mechanised,
- 3 mobile artillery regiments,
- 5 mountain artillery regiments,
- 13 Corps artillery regiments,
- 1 independent Corps artillery Section,
- 10 Army artillery regiments,
- 5 anti-aircraft regiments,
- 1 independent anti-aircraft Section,
- 1 coastal artillery regiments, including one independent Section,
- 4 tank regiments,
- 3 independent tank Sections,

- 12 engineer regiments,
- 1 independent engineer battalion,
- 2 bridging regiments,
- 2 mining regiments,
- 1 Railway regiment,
- 1 airship battalion,
- 1 chemical regiment,
- 13 motor centres.

The above tabulation would make the present strength of the Italian peace-time Army some 442,000 men, including 34,000 airmen, 50,000 Carabinieri, 25,000 Revenue Guards and 10,000 standing Militia. To this total there have to be added a further 30,000 men in Libya and the newly created Colonial Army of 60,000 men in East Africa, details of the organisation of which are given below.

The discussion of the Army Estimates for the year 1936-37 in the Italian Chamber and the measures since taken are clear evidence of the contemporary military preparedness of Italy in Europe and East Africa. The utterances of the Under-Secretary of State for War, General Baistrocchi, on this occasion gave a clear picture of the position of Italian rearmament preparations and of the reform of the Army. A decisive feature in this connection is the conversion of the previous peace formations into cadres which can at once be filled up in war-time by calling up the reserves. The cadres are so planned as to enable 1.25 million men to be incorporated in the formations at once in addition to the troops already serving. The training of the officers required under this plan, General Baistrocchi explained, is being carefully carried forward. The reorganisation of the Army is being based on offensive principles in the light of the lessons learned from the Abyssinian campaign. The principle of the offensive was formulated by General Baistrocchi in the Chamber in the following terms: "The new theory," he said, "which is based essentially on the assumption of a war of movement, is in accordance with our dynamic Fascist mentality and our political, military and economic circumstances. A short war, a violent and unceremonious war—that is what we look to: but should circumstances beyond our control make that impossible, our people and our Army will know how to wait, ready to strike as soon as the possibility arises." To take others unawares instead of letting oneself be taken unawares by others—that is the principle of Italian military policy: the initiative must never be allowed to pass to the enemy.

This is the principle behind the continued mechanisation. The 12 Cavalry regiments are to be completely mechanised: at present they consist of 3 mounted squadrons, one horsed heavy machine gun squadron and one squadron of 15 fast tanks. The Bersaglieri regiments, which constitute the nucleus of the mobile Divisions, have already been reorganised, and now consist of one cyclists battalion (for which lorry transport is proposed), one mechanised battalion on lorries and one battalion of 2 companies, one of which is on motor cycles with a total of 18 light machine guns while the other consists of 12 fast tanks with in all 24 heavy machine guns. The mechanisation of the Artillery has also been carried forward. The IInd and IIIrd Sections of the three mobile artillery regiments have been provided with motor train transport: similarly with the heavy artillery, the transport of which by lorries is now only exceptional. All anti-aircraft artillery is now mounted on lorries. The Supply services are also extensively mechanised.

The former 8th Infantry Division has been reorganised as a mechanised Division, and the mechanised Trento Division, which made its first trials at the autumn manoeuvres of 1935, has been reconstituted. Each of these mechanised Divisions consists of 2 Infantry regiments and one light machine gun battalion on lorries, one motorised Field Artillery regiment with one Section of 75 mm. guns and one Section of 100 mm. howitzers, each Section being made up of 3 batteries of 4 guns each with motor train. In war the mechanised Divisions will have in addition one tank battalion, one heavy machine gun company on motor cycles, one engineer company and sanitation and Commissariat services, all motorised.

The three mobile Divisions are now finally organised on uniform lines. Each comprises a Divisional Staff, one Cavalry brigade staff, 2 Cavalry regiments, one regiment of Bersaglieri, one Section of fast tanks, and one mobile Artillery regiment of three Sections, of which the Ist (horsed) Section consists of 75 mm. guns, the IInd Section of 75 mm. guns on lorries, and the IIIrd Section of 105 mm. guns also on lorries.

There are three mobile tank Sections, each of which is attached to one of the three mobile Divisions. Each of these Sections is divided into 2 to 3 squadrons; and each squadron has 15 fast tanks of the Ansaldo-Fiat model, which develop a speed of 45 km. an hour. They carry crews of 3 men each and are armed with one heavy machine gun firing 4,000 shots.

The Mechanical Transport Service is also to be expanded. It has been composed hitherto of a Brigadier General, 40 mechanical transport officers, and officers, non-commissioned officers and men commandeered for the purpose from all arms of the Army. By the close of 1937 it is to be built up to an establishment of 7 Colonels, 25 Lieutenant Colonels, 84 Majors, 287 Captains and 145 Lieutenants and Second Lieutenants by means of transfers from other arms. The total establishment of 539 officers will be divided, as in the fighting units, into "Command" and "Mobilisation" officers. The necessary non-commissioned officers and men will be found from volunteers and commandeered men with previous experience of motor transport.

But in spite of this very far-reaching process of mechanisation it remains true, as Mussolini has said, that "the individual is the soul of the Army, and it is on the Infantry that the Army must be built up." The Infantry has accordingly been equipped with new weapons—heavy hand grenades, trench mortars, machine guns, tanks and anti-tank guns. Every Infantry regiment will in future have over 150 machine guns, trench mortars and guns, together with a corresponding park of motor transport attached to the several Divisions. The men who are to lead the troops are being given special training in the principles of the war of movement. The armament of the Army consists of some 7,500 light and 3,500 heavy machine guns and 1,300 light guns, 130 anti-aircraft guns and 800 heavy guns. New regulations have also been issued in the case of the General Staff. The General Staff of the Army is in future to consist of two categories:

- a) the actual General Staff officers—viz. 135 Colonels, and 99 Lieutenant Colonels on the Staff.
- b) the officers attached to the General Staff—viz. Majors, Captains and Lieutenants of the different arms.

This reorganisation implies a reduction in the numbers of Staff officers, but should mean an improvement in the quality. It will in any case make possible the training of a large percentage of officers in Staff duties on whom the country can fall back in the event of mobilisation. Two Deputies are to be attached to the Chief of the General Staff, one for the active Army and one for the national defence services. The latter will be in charge of the organisation of the military zones, the Air Defences and Coastal Defences, and the Air Defence of the population. The military division into 13 Corps districts and 31 Divisional districts remains only as an organisation of the active troops. The territorial forces, the conscription and mobilisation services, the home defence organisation and the pre-military and post-military training services will all be based on the military zone organisation, in order to leave the troops completely free for their military duties. There are now 8 zone groups, 28 military zones and 100 military districts. The national defences have also been reorganised on thorough-going lines. The Supreme Council of National Defence has been greatly strengthened by the addition of further Ministers, the Marshals of Italy, the Admirals of the Fleet and the Marshals of the Air Force. It consists of an Executive Committee, consultative Committees and a General Secretariat.

The Italian Defence forces will be profoundly affected by the decision of the Italian Government of September 12th 1936 to create a Colonial Army for normal peace-time service. The decision is based on the view that the Home Defence Estimates should not be saddled with the defence of the Colonies and their frontiers. The Colonial Army is to be raised in the first instance for East Africa only, and is to be composed of volunteers.

The Colonial Army for East Africa (Armata Coloniale per l'Africa Orientale) will have a peace strength of 60,000 men, of whom 20,000 will be white Italians and 40,000 coloured troops. The Supreme Command under the Viceroy will consist of a General Staff and Inspectors of Artillery, of the Pioneer Corps, of the Black Shirts and of the special services. The Officers Corps will be entirely Italian, and will have a strength of 2,500, of whom one-fifth will be reserve officers. The number of non-commissioned officers will be 1,800. Non-commissioned officers and men will engage for 2 years. The officers, who will constitute a special Corps of Colonial Officers, will be required to undertake to serve alternately 5 years in Africa and 2 years in Italy. During the two years of their service in Italy they will be replaced by active officers, so that there will be a standing exchange of officers between the Colonies and Italy allowing of normal facilities of training and promotion.

The Colonial Army will be organised as follows:

1. White troops (Reparti d'Africa, bianchi):

- a) The Viceroy in Addis Ababa will have under him at his own direct orders the "Savoy Grenadiers" Division, made up exclusively of white troops. It will consist of 2 Grenadier regiments, 1 Artillery regiment of 2 groups, 2 Pioneer companies, Sanitation services etc., and 1 Black Shirt Motor Section which will enable the Division in case of emergency to be transported to the remoter regions of the Colony.

- b) The Commandant of Addis Ababa will have under him 4 Black Shirt battalions and 8 Black Shirt batteries of fortress artillery, all separate from the "Savoy Grenadiers" Division.

- c) Each East African Government will have a reserve for the frontier districts made up of a total of 9 fully mechanised Black Shirt battalions, each with 2 machine gun companies, one armoured car company and one company of fast motor cars. In addition there will be 4 groups of mechanised artillery, 4 groups of anti-aircraft artillery and 7 companies of colonial artillery.

2. Coloured Colonial troops (Reparti coloniali):

These troops, who will be led by white officers and coloured non-commissioned officers, will be divided into 17 Colonial brigades. Each brigade will be divided into 4 Infantry battalions of 3 rifle companies and one machine gun company each, one group of 3 batteries (of which one will be a gun battery and the two others trench mortar batteries), one Pioneer company and one Field Hospital. Six out of the 17 brigades will have a group of 2 squadrons of Cavalry in place of the fourth Infantry battalion.

The native troops will consist of 62 Infantry battalions, 51 batteries, 12 squadrons of Cavalry, and 17 Pioneer and other technical companies.

In addition, the Workers Army, which will shortly be brought up to some 150,000 men, will be organised on military lines on the model of the Fascist Militia, and will have its own uniform and equipment.

"Italy wants peace but is not afraid of war," said General Baistrocchi in the Senate; and it is in this spirit that she is continuously improving her military preparations. Italy has also made mighty efforts in connection with her air armaments in order, as far as in her lies, successfully to maintain her present supremacy in the Mediterranean in this branch.

The Air arm is a separate arm of the Italian defence forces as a whole under the Head of National Defence. The Supreme Command of the Air arm is divided into 9 Departments. The Air Ministry is the supreme administrative authority. The Colonial air formations are under the Ministry for the Colonies.

The Italian air forces are an "organic and professional unit with specialised applicabilities," and for tactical purposes are under the Chief of the Air Staff: the last named has a deputy Chief under him. The Chief of the Air Staff is responsible in the case of the "independent Air Force," i.e. the offensive arm of the Air forces, for disposition, training and administration. In the case of the Army and Navy air formations he is responsible only for their training and administration, the respective military and naval authorities being responsible for their disposition.

The air forces in Italy are grouped in four different organisations according as they are Air Force proper, Air Force Engineer Corps, Air Force Administrative Troops or Schools. The air forces in the home country are divided into the independent Air Force, the Army Air Force and the Navy Air Force. The cadres of the organisation and the numbers of the higher formations (regiments and groups) are fixed; but the number of flights and their grouping are not fixed. Side by side with the horizontal tactical grouping there is a vertical administrative grouping, for the purpose of which Italy is divided into 4 air zones with headquarters at Milan, Padua, Rome and Bari respectively. To supply the personnel for these services, a Decree was approved in the summer of 1935 providing for the immediate attainment of the strengths laid down in the fundamental Law of 1931. The number of officers' posts was at the same time increased from 2,861 to 3,061, and instructions were issued for the temporary calling up of a number of Reserve officers not exceeding 1,500 and for the promotion of non-commissioned officers to officers' rank. The chief problem that presented itself in connection with the expansion of the Air arm on the extensive scale indicated was the problem of training the personnel, as more and more time is required for this purpose with the development of modern technical improvements in the construction of aircraft. To obtain the requisite numbers of airmen and air experts, two courses were held in the spring of 1935 and in the spring of 1936, which were attended by 1,300 pilot pupils and 4,750 specialists in the former case and 1,500 pilot pupils and 4,200 specialists in the latter case. It was stated by General Valle that the numbers of new pilots under training in the two years 1933 and 1935 were as 1:10 respectively; but the requirements have since risen. Italy will shortly have 10,000 trained pilots at her disposal. To find this number, it has already been announced that the element of compulsion will shortly be introduced: Italy will be the first country to apply the system of compulsory service to the Air arm. Industry and the Fascist Party do a great deal to further the training of young airmen. In the spring of 1936, for example, the Party instituted pre-military courses in flying for the purpose. The pre-military training of airmen, which is followed immediately by active service with the Air forces, includes the training of specialists, for which there are special pre-military courses at the universities and in the schools of the big industries.

In the summer of 1936 the Italian Air forces were composed of the following formations:

I. Air Force. 2 Divisions (a third Division was formed at Bologna in October 1936), 6 brigades, 16 regiments, 82 groups, 78 flights composed as follows:
30 fighter flights	=	360 planes
12 battle flights	=	144 "
12 day bomber flights	=	96 "
24 night bomber flights	=	192 "
78 flights	=	792 planes	792
II. Army. 3 regiments and 2 independent groups, 11 groups, 20 flights composed as follows:
25 reconnaissance flights	=	300 planes	300
III. Navy. 3 regiments and 2 independent groups, 2 groups, 34 flights composed as follows:
4 fighter flights	=	48 planes
12 bomber flights	=	144 "
14 reconnaissance flights	=	168 "
4 mixed flights	=	48 "
34 flights	=	408 planes
Add aircraft carried aboard ship	=	74 "
		482 planes	482
IV. Colonies. 4 independent groups, 12 flights . = 144 planes Add aircraft of units transported to East Africa for the war, and subsequently reconstituted in the home country = 340 "
		484 planes	484
V. First line aircraft at schools = 250 planes 250
Together, first line	=		2,308
second line (about)	=		692
Total aircraft available for war purposes			3,000

As regards anti-aircraft defence, the Army has 5 anti-aircraft regiments, each of 2 to 3 Sections of 2 (in war-time 3) anti-aircraft batteries and one searchlight battery each. The mixed artillery regiment in Cagliari (Sardinia) also has a further anti-aircraft Section. In addition there is the Anti-aircraft Militia, to which reference has already been made, with 15 legions and 14 independent cohorts.

The peace-time organisation of the whole Air arm is elastic. The cadres of the arm as laid down by law can be filled up as requirements arise with new war formations.

The reconstruction and rearmament of the Army and Air arm and the campaign in East Africa have between them swelled the Italian Defence expenditure of the last few years to an enormous extent. At a meeting of the Cabinet towards the end of 1935 the Finance Minister made a statement from which it appeared that:

- the financial year ending June 30th 1935 (i.e. the year 1934-35) closed with a deficit of 2.03 milliards of lire, 975 millions for extra-ordinary expenditure in East Africa and 840 millions for subsidies to the Railways being included in this figure;
- the 1936-37 Estimates (i.e. the Estimates for the year beginning July 1st 1936) totalled 20,291,000,000 and included the following Ordinary expenditure on armaments:

Army . . .	2,291,000,000 lire, i.e. 168 millions less than in the financial year 1935-36,
Navy . . .	1,545,000,000 lire, i.e. 279 millions more than in the financial year 1935-36,
Air arm . .	970,000,000 lire, i.e. 130 millions more than in the financial year 1935-36.

The Ordinary expenditure on armaments accordingly rose from 4,565,000,000 lire in the financial year 1935-36 to 4,806,000,000 lire in the financial year 1936-37. The "Extra-ordinary expenditure for East Africa"—for which 12 milliards of lire had been voted down to the end of May 1936—are not included in this figure; nor is the sum of 300 millions from the Air Renewal Fund of April 1st 1935, for which provision is made in the 1936-37 Budget.

A further 140 million lire were appropriated in October 1936 for the construction of new Airports in the basin of the Po and along the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian littorals, as well as in Sardinia and Sicily. This total includes 7.4 millions for the Airport of Orvieto, 15.2 millions for that of Alghero (Sardinia), 10.6 millions for that of Comiso (Sicily), 6.3 millions for that of Naples, 1.5 millions for that of Salerno, 1.4 millions for that of Rieti, and 13 millions each for Viterbo, Tarquinia and Siena, 17 millions for Perugia and 10 millions for Treviso. The work on these Airports is to begin at once.

That Italy of the present day is a powerful military Power, equipped with the most modern equipment and trained by the most modern methods, emerges clearly from a comparison of the defence forces of Italy at the end of 1936 and the defence forces as they were in 1914.

In 1914 Italy had some 250,000 men under arms: in 1915, when she declared war on Austria, the number was 550,000. At the end of 1936 Fascist Italy had over 440,000 men in the home country and 90,000 men in Africa under arms, in addition to a Workers Army of 150,000 men in East Africa. In 24 hours Italy can mobilise 1.25 million fully trained soldiers without drawing on any of the troops stationed in East Africa. Official figures published by the Fascist Party give the number of men between 21 and 54 years of age on which the Italian Defence forces can draw as over 7,838,000 men.

Portugal's anti-communist effort

Portugal suffered severely for a long time after the World War from internal anarchy; and peace and order were not re-established until 1926, when General Carmona and Senhor Salazar assumed political power as President of the Republic and Premier respectively. Knowing their own minds and sparing no efforts in the attainment of their aims, the two statesmen have since then suppressed all Communist activities in the country, and have created the conditions under which Portugal has been able in the last few years to make steady progress in respect alike of her internal and her external policy. It is therefore with a very special attention that Portugal is now following the sanguinary events in her neighbour's territory. The danger of the Spanish Civil War spreading to Portugal is enhanced by the existence of a common frontier 1,200 kilometres in length and by the fact that Communist refugees from Spain have been the agents of a revival of Bolshevik propaganda on Portuguese territory. A victory for Spanish Bolshevism in Spain would be tantamount to war from the Portuguese point of view. In its struggle against Communism the Portuguese Government has the support of the national party União Nacional and the youth organisation Mocidade Portuguesa, as also of the recently founded Legião Portuguesa, an organisation of men of military age which came into being in connection with the struggle against Bolshevism: but above all it has the support of the whole of the armed forces of Portugal, which are firmly on the side of the nationalist Government, as was shown recently when a Communist mutiny which had broken out on two small warships in Lisbon harbour was at once put down by the loyalist troops.

Portugal's Defence forces are based on compulsory military service. Constitutionally they are organised in a Home Army and a Colonial Army. The Home force comprises the Army, Navy and Air Force. The Colonial Army may be used on occasion in the home country. Portugal is divided into 4 military districts, Oporto, Coimbra, Tomar and Evora, the Government district of Lisbon, and the two Military Commands, the Azores and Madeira. The conscription is organised in 23 recruiting areas.

Before the young Portuguese is called up for active service, he is compelled to undergo a pre-military training in his youth from his 14th year onwards. Compulsory military courses are held at all schools and universities. In the 17 months of his active service with the colours in the Army he spends 5 months in the recruits school and 12 months with the troops.

The peace-time Army is organised in 21 Infantry regiments of 67 battalions in all, 9 Cavalry regiments of 36 squadrons in all, 5 light Artillery regiments of 61 batteries in all and 4 heavy Artillery regiments of 25, together with 5 anti-aircraft batteries. There are in addition 2 Pioneer regiments of 11 companies in all, a Railway and a Signals regiment, a Motor battalion of 2 companies, and 2 Tank companies with some 15 tanks.

The Colonial Army consists of 28 (coloured) Infantry companies, 5 Depot, 3 machine gun and 7 Police companies (part coloured), and a squadron of Cavalry, 4 batteries of Field Artillery and one mountain battery.

The peace strength of the Home Army including the National Guard and the Revenue Guards is some 31,000 men, while that of the Colonial Army is about 10,000 men. The Army is armed with some 1,000 light and 250 heavy machine guns, and 300 light and 150 heavy guns including coastal artillery. The probable war strength of the Home Army is at present in the neighbourhood of 870,000 men.

In the air Portugal has a total of 16 flights, distributed under separate Sub-Commands in the War Ministry, Ministry of Marine and Colonial Ministry. The distribution is as follows: the Army has 2 fighter flights, 2 bomber flights and 2 reconnaissance flights, the Navy has one fighter flight, one bomber flight and one reconnaissance flight, and the remaining 7 flights (all reconnaissance flights) comprising 70 planes are stationed in the Colonies. The Home Army and the Navy together have some 160 planes. Portuguese recognition of the importance of a strong air fleet is apparent from an Order issued on June 9th 1936 increasing the expenditure on the Air Force and on military instruction in the Estimates of the War Ministry by a total of 140,000 escudos.

A Law of August 1935 introduced a far-reaching change in the command of the Portuguese Defence Force by the institution of three supreme military authorities, since constituted under the direction of the competent Ministers from the highest officers of the Army, Air Force and Navy, as follows:

1. Supreme Army Council.

Its powers extend to changes in the organisation of the Army, to the maintenance and development of the land fortifications and war material, and to the work of military institutions and establishments. It is the final instance in questions relating to the promotion of officers.

2. Supreme National Defence Council.

Its powers extend to all questions of national defence, protection of the civil population, food supply and safety of transport routes in war-time: also to questions of industrialisation. It is responsible for determining the main lines of military policy.

3. Supreme Military Council.

It has the decision in all matters of armaments, and the organisation and employment of the striking forces of the country on land, at sea and in the air.

* * *

The Portuguese Defence Force is today unquestionably in a position, in virtue of its intrinsic value, strength and composition, to fulfil the task which is incumbent on it of defending the neutrality declared by the Portuguese Government in relation to the Spanish Civil War, if necessary, in arms. For "Portugal has no wish," the Portuguese Foreign Minister Senhor Monteiro explained, "to see an invasion of communism within its borders. We do not want to see our cities burnt, our ancient monuments blown to pieces, our women violated and our countrymen pitilessly slaughtered. The Portuguese Government means to protect the independence of the country at any cost, to defend Western culture and to maintain public order. That is the greatest service Portugal can render to the peace of the world."

Belgium's armaments in the light of political power shifts

The foreign and military policy of Belgium in the past 17 years has been conditioned mainly by the following considerations.

When the neutrality of Belgium was brought to an end under Article 31 of the Versailles Treaty, and replaced by the new situation which that Article established, in 1919, Belgium became a member of the League, but without making any of the reservations made by Switzerland. In the following year Belgium concluded a Military Convention with France on September 7th 1920, which in itself constituted a violation of Articles 20 and 21 of the Covenant of the League. In further violation of Article 18 of the Covenant the Convention was never registered with the Secretariat of the League. Its contents accordingly remained secret: but its existence was made public by the registration and publication of the accompanying Notes of September 10th and 15th 1920. In 1921 Belgium further concluded a defensive alliance with England, and was a party in 1925 to the Locarno Treaties, under which she became, not merely a guaranteed Power, but a Power guaranteeing the status quo in Western Europe. As a consequence she was forced into a one-sided adherence to France and the French rearmament policy, which was shortly patent to the world in the shape of a joint programme of development of the Armies and fortress systems of the two countries and the reorganisation of the Belgian Army on French lines. On the Northern and Eastern frontiers of Belgium there has recently been erected a dense series of fortifications which are meaningless unless regarded as a continuation of the Maginot line. On the Western frontier, i.e. on the side exposed to France, Belgium remained without defences; and the whole of her Defence forces were at the same time organised on lines which ran parallel to those of French military policy. It was this development that gave rise to an internal opposition which gathered strength at every moment. The Flemish section of the population, which after the repression of the first few years after the War was again beginning to raise its head, was increasingly opposed to the effortless subordination to France. The first recognition of the existence of this feeling was the declaration by the Minister M. Hymans on March 4th 1931. It did not amount to much. It was not till three years later that a statement was made by the Count de Brocqueville on March 6th 1934, which made a lasting impression. In the meantime speeches and articles in the Flemish Press multiplied their attacks on the one-sided connection of Belgium with France and their demand for the denunciation of the Secret Agreement of September 7th 1920.

The strength of the Belgian ties to France was again manifest in connection with the discussion by the Belgian Chamber of the proposals submitted by the Belgian Cabinet at the beginning of February 1936 for the extension of the period of active service in the Army and the vote of an additional Supplement to the Budget of some 140,000,000 francs. The War Minister Devèze defended the demand for this rearmament with a reference to the dangers of an eventual invasion from the Dutch frontier; and he added that the frontier defence troops must be put in a position to spread destruction in the districts adjacent to the frontier in good time, and to keep these areas under fire until reinforcements—i.e. reinforcements from France—could arrive! The Government proposals for extension of the period of military service were rejected by the Parties in the Chamber on a first division at the end of February, the voting being largely attributable to the introduction of a Flemish resolution in Parliament on February 20th for the denunciation of the Franco-Belgian Secret Agreement. In the discussion of the Flemish motion in the plenary meeting of the Chamber on March 11th the Flemish deputies argued that Belgium, like certain of the Balkan States, was reduced to nothing more than a section of the French military block. The Belgian defences were directed simply and solely against a single neighbour. The Premier van Zeeland thereupon announced that the Military Convention with France had been terminated only a few days before and replaced by a new Agreement which only provided for permanent contact between the General Staffs. The Premier's statement was not calculated to allay the anxiety in the country. The Flemish Nationalists and the Fleming members of the Catholic Party contended that the new Agreement with France was no improvement in so far as the independence of Belgium was concerned. In Parliament and in the country they argued for the return to an independent policy of voluntary neutrality. After the new Elections of May 1936, which strengthened the ranks of the Flemings and brought the Rexists for the first time into Parliament, the new Foreign Minister of the van Zeeland Cabinet, M. Spaak, at a reception of the Press on July 20th declared in favour of a policy of neutrality. A storm of indignation in the Francophil Press was the sequel; but a semi-official announcement was made short afterwards notwithstanding to the effect that in any new Locarno Treaty Belgium would decline to accept the position of guarantor of any foreign country's frontiers, and that her efforts would be directed solely towards the negotiation of a guarantee of her own frontiers.

In his Speech to the Council of Ministers on October 14th 1936 the King of the Belgians himself referred to the need for a reshaping of Belgian military policy in the light of internal and external political developments. (The text of M. Spaak's speech and that of the King of the Belgians will be found in No. 171-175 of this publication, page 30.)

What weighty grounds were there in the field of foreign politics to induce the King of the Belgians to make these startling public statements with regard to Belgium's desire for a foreign policy of her own—statements, be it noted, which gave the death-blow to the spirit, if not to the actual letter, of the Agreements with France? The answer is to be found in the Note sent from Brussels on October 23rd to the Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay in reply to enquires from London as to the Belgian attitude in regard to the proposed Five Power Conference. The following are the comments of the Brussels Correspondent of The Times on the contents of the Note (The Times, October 23rd 1936):

"The Note makes it clear that the Belgian Government, like the British Government, view with dismay the recent tendency towards the formation of rigid and antagonistic blocs in Europe and that they are determined to hold themselves aloof from it. In the circumstances of 1936 the obligations assumed under the original Locarno Pact are too heavy to be borne by a State of Belgium's size and military strength. Article 1 of the Locarno Pact, by implication, placed Belgium on terms of equality with the Great Powers, and under it Belgium has the same responsibility as the other Powers for the maintenance of German and French territorial integrity. Though the assumption of this obligation was much criticised by the Flemings at the time, it was generally felt that it could be safely shouldered. Germany was largely disarmed, the Rhineland was demilitarised, and the League looked like becoming a nucleus of a dependable system of collective security. Moreover it was felt that the new treaty had made a vital contribution to the maintenance of Belgian security.

"In 1936, the Note explains, everything is different. German rearmament, precipitated by the Barthou Note of April 17th 1934, has culminated in a remilitarisation of the Rhineland and has completely altered Belgium's position in relation to Germany. The collapse of collective security in the face of Italy's war against Abyssinia has so weakened the League that it is now felt to be almost useless as an instrument for the maintenance of peace. Finally, the development of the French system of alliances, with the aim of counterbalancing Germany's growing military strength, tends to divide Europe into precisely two such antagonistic pro-French and pro-German groups as it was the aim of Locarno to dissolve.

"Until the change of policy enunciated by King Leopold, and confirmed in the Belgian Government's Note, the Belgian National Defence Plan was based on the possibility of a new German sweep across Belgian territory into France. Fortifications were built and strategic flooding points were created with the aim of enabling the Belgian forces to fight a delaying action so as to hold up the invader until assistance was forthcoming. But, as King Leopold has explained, under modern conditions the enemy could strike so quickly that, no matter how soon Belgium's allies came to her assistance, she would have to face the first staggering onslaught alone. And, in the Belgian view, a violation of Belgian territory would be all the more likely if, as the result of staff conversations with the French army, Germany were in a position to argue that the triple line of Belgium was merely a continuation of the Maginot line.

"Against this background the Belgian Note goes on to argue that in the light of recent events Belgium can best contribute towards Western security, if the national defences are so strengthened as to offer the maximum deterrent to any aggressor, and if at the same time Belgium, like Great Britain, holds aloof from all systems and thereby does not provide a potential aggressor with the excuse that she forms part of a hostile ring.

"The Belgian Government holds the view that this change of policy is an advantage to Great Britain also. So long as Belgian independence remains of paramount importance to Great Britain—so long, that is, as the British frontier 'begins upon the Rhine'—it is in the British interest that Belgium should remain absolutely neutral, and should pursue a policy 'exclusively and entirely Belgian'. By so doing she claims to be reducing the danger of being drawn into a war whose origins lie elsewhere, and therefore of forcing Great Britain to take part in a struggle for the defence of Belgian integrity which, but for irrelevant pacts and alliances, would never have been threatened."

The Note reveals in the first place the one-sided interpretation hitherto given by France and Belgium to the Locarno Pact, inasmuch as they persisted, in spite of the English and Italian guarantees, in their policy of a military alliance and General Staff conversations. It is easy to read between the lines—as some of the comments in the English, French and Belgian Press did not fail to do—that the new French policy of alliance with the U.S.S.R. was the primary reason for Belgium's reconsideration of her position. The policy of the Franco-Russian Alliance, in the words of one of the Flemish deputies in the Belgian Chamber, left Belgium more than ever at the mercy of that "military determinism" which was bound to involve her in any and every French conflict. The Belgian public and the Belgian Government rightly felt that the Franco-Russian Pact had introduced an incalculable element of danger into the political system of Europe. When, after the initial rift in the shape of the revision of the Franco-Belgian Military Alliance on March 6th, Belgium decided definitively to abandon the system of assimilated Franco-Belgian policy which she had practised for the last fifteen years, and to free herself completely from the commitments it entailed, her decision was due in the last analysis to nothing else than the feverish French mania for the conclusion of Pacts with dangerous, automatically operating obligations, and the exaggerated French insistence on "formulas" ("Peace is inseparable", "collective security" and the like) with their accompaniment of "sanctions" and "mutual assistance", the effect of which, to quote the striking expression of Maurice Bourquin, "is no more and no less than to invite the peoples to throw themselves into the burning, fiery furnace." (See „Grundsätzliche Betrachtungen zum Problem der kollektiven Sicherheit“ by Maurice Bourquin in the Europäische Revue, No. 11/12, pp. 758 ff.)

The speech of the King of the Belgians was the prelude to a lively exchange of views between London and Paris as to the significance of the new policy of neutrality which it proclaimed. The anxieties to which it gave rise in the minds of the French and English Cabinets, were (as the Press comments showed) in connection with the idea of collective security, the one-sided Belgian obligations to the Western Powers on the land and in the air, the arrangements between the different General Staffs, the problem of policy in relation to the League of Nations, the right to march through Belgium, and so on and so on: the proposal for a Western Pact also appeared to have been torpedoed by the Royal utterance. The extension of the fortifications in Northern France along the Belgian frontier was another sequel to the Speech.

As to the Western Pact, Belgium was and is prepared to participate, but not (as the King clearly stated) in the former character of a guarantor of other countries' frontiers, and not unless Holland is prepared to participate as well. The Belgian Foreign Minister further made it clear that Belgium would adhere to the Locarno Treaty and the Agreements of April 1st 1936 pending the conclusion of a new Western Pact between the former Locarno Powers. The Foreign Minister's announcement was indicative of the Belgian inclination—to which subsequent interpretations of the King's speech and the General Staff arrangements which followed also gave expression—not to strain Belgian relations with France and England too far. The Belgian declaration of neutrality applies therefore only to future negotiations: the former agreements remain in force for the present. In his speech on foreign policy in the Chamber on October 28th 1936 the Foreign Minister (M. Spaak) stated that Belgium would still be ready in the future to take part in any reasonable form of collective action within the limits of conditions clearly defined. Belgium was anxious to fulfil her obligations; but the obligations must be laid down in plain and exact terms, explicitly circumscribed in such a manner as to admit of no misunderstanding. Belgium intended to pursue a purely Belgian foreign policy, having regard to her geographical position, her traditions and her capacities. There was no question of a reversion to the pre-war neutrality, since Belgium meant to remain a member of the League. The Foreign Minister then referred to the system of collective security. It was perhaps the ideal system of ensuring the maintenance of Peace, but only if organised on comprehensive and effective lines; and it could not be said to be so organised at the present time. Belgian foreign policy would therefore be based on the maintenance of complete independence. Its object would be to make it perfectly plain to each of her neighbours that Belgium did not propose to allow her territory to be used either for the transit of troops or as a strategic base. Such a policy postulated a strong Belgium. The military and the political issues were consequently inseparable.

The Belgian Foreign Minister proceeded in this connection to discuss the new military proposals which had been approved by the Government on October 14th and submitted to Parliament on October 27th. The object of the proposals was to protect Belgium from the disasters to which she would be exposed in the event of her being involved, notwithstanding her declaration of independence, in a new war. The explanatory statement attached to the Bills embodying the proposals (the central feature of which was the extension of the period of active military service which the Government had already tried to carry through Parliament in the spring of 1936) speaks of the necessity of not merely defending the frontiers, but also of maintaining large concentrations of troops in the interior of the country to cope with the eventuality of attacks by enemy troops introduced into the country by sea or by air.

The proposals start from the assumption of a sudden invasion of the country without previous declaration of war. In the view of the Belgian General Staff the national defences are not at present in a position to repel such an invasion. The Joint Military Committee, on whose studies the military proposals were admittedly based, expressed the opinion that the technical developments of recent years, and in particular the progress of mechanisation, had changed the whole face of the problem of continuous defence of the frontiers. The danger of a surprise invasion at the present time, they added, differed in toto from what it was at the time of the military reforms of 1928, both in its military and in its technical aspects.

The continuous defence of the frontiers, if it was to be effective, now called for the concentration of all the means of defence, active and passive. The most effective form of passive defence was the execution of destructive measures. For these it was necessary to keep a sufficient number of trained men in the technical units of the Army permanently under arms throughout the year. The active defence of the country should be based mainly on the cyclist companies, the Ardennes chasseurs, the Cavalry, the fortresses of Liège and Namur, the Infantry regiments, the machine gun battalions, the Infantry batteries and the Signals Corps. The anti-aircraft defences also called for considerable reinforcement.

Study of the land defences of Belgium since the War shows a steady reduction in the expenditure for these purposes during the years 1922 to 1930. In the year 1926, for example, some 1,000 officers and several thousand non-commissioned officers were placed on the retired list. There was no change until the Liberal deputy Devèze became War Minister in 1932. It was true, as the Military Correspondent of the Handelsblad van Antwerpen observed in an interesting article on October 22nd 1936 on the effects of the Belgian declaration of independence on the French system of defence, that "the General Staffs of France and Belgium had worked together in the closest contact ever since the Armistice of 1918, and this cooperation was intensified after the conclusion of the Locarno Pact in 1925." But the position was fundamentally altered when the deputy Devèze assumed the post of War Minister. The Military Correspondent of the Handelsblad van Antwerpen continued: "When the Chief of the Belgian General Staff disagreed with the views of the French Generals Weygand and Gamelin, and proceeded to develop Antwerp as the principal fortress in Flanders, he was forced by War Minister Devèze to resign. The result was to make the Belgian girdle of fortifications on the Eastern frontier the natural extension of the French Maginot line. Longwy is the point of juncture, and the line runs on from there by Arlon, Bastogne and Hervé to Maaseyck on the Dutch border, Liège and Namur representing a second line of defence in the rear. The Belgian declaration of independence at one stroke laid open the French front on the North. The Northern front of France, which runs from Longuyon by Montmédy—Maubeuge—Valenciennes—Lille to Dunkirk, is divided into a number of physically different regions. Strong military forces are distributed over North France. At Lille, the Headquarters of the 1st Army Corps, there is the 1st Infantry Division. At Amiens, the Headquarters of the IInd Army Corps, there is the 3rd Infantry Division. The VIth Army Corps at Metz has three Divisions, and the XXth Army Corps at Nancy four Divisions. To these forces must be added the Fortress troops and the so-called Réserve mobile de couverture, large mechanised formations. It is, to say the least of it, not improbable that in future there will be large concentrations of French troops in the North; and such a measure would presumably be countered on the Belgian side by the transfer of equivalent forces to the French frontier."

Until the King made his Speech to the Council of Ministers on October 14th 1936, the Belgian Army regarded itself as the advance guard, so to say, of its Allies' armies with the duty in war of resisting the enemy on the Eastern frontier with all its strength until such time as the Allied armies could come to its relief. Belgian military policy was largely based on this conception of the Belgian Army's function in the event of war.

At a vast expenditure of money and effort Belgium has been engaged for a number of years past in the execution of a programme of development of the girdle of fortresses on the Eastern frontier, and the work is nearly complete. In the years 1935-36 the execution of the programme went forward systematically. A line of blockhouses along the Belgian-Luxemburg and Belgian-German frontiers from Arlon via Bastogne and Vielsalm to Eupen (which, according to the War Minister Devèze, is intended to serve as a "wasp's nest" in the path of an invader penetrating into the Ardennes) was steadily carried to completion. In the neighbourhood of Eupen-Malmédy fortifications were for the first time pushed right up to the German frontier. The modernisation of the Fortress of Liège and its extensions to the East via the Hervé plateau to the line Jalhay—Limburg—Henri-Chapelle—Homburg, and to the North as far as the point where the new Canal Albert branches off from the Meuse, are complete, together with a great part of the constructional work in the areas concerned (in particular, the strong points of Battice and Eben-Emael): a number of other works are close on completion. The defensive works on the Meuse between Eben-Emael and Maaseyck, and on the Northern frontier of Belgium between Maaseyck and Turnhout, the modernisation of the North-East front of Antwerp and the erection of a bridge-head South of Ghent are all complete. The strongest defences of the Belgian North-East frontier will in future be the Canal Albert and the fortified works along its course. The construction of this waterway, which runs from Liège through the district South-West of Maastricht and Hasselt and North of Diest and Herenthal to Antwerp, has been pushed on energetically; and several stretches of the Canal have already been opened to traffic. Lastly in continuation of the "réduit national", which runs with its front towards the South-East from Courtrai to Ghent on the Lys and from Ghent to Antwerp on the Scheldt, a bridge-head

6 km. deep has been created South of Ghent by means of a line of blockhouses.

The following additional military measures have been taken to strengthen the Eastern front. The 14th Infantry regiment was moved in August 1935 to what are in future to be its permanent headquarters in Huy and Liège. The 1st Infantry regiment was concentrated two months later (i.e. in October) in Verviers. The effect of these movements was to bring the troops of the 3rd Division, which is the Division chiefly concerned with the defence of Liège and its advanced forts, close together in a narrow area. One Infantry regiment of the 3rd Division was also strengthened in the course of the summer of 1935 by a section of Frontier cyclists. The 1st regiment of mounted chasseurs was moved to Beverloo to take the place of the 14th Infantry regiment when the latter was moved to Huy and Liège: the 1st regiment of mounted chasseurs had previously been garrisoned at Mons. A section of the 1st anti-aircraft regiment was also transferred from Brussels to Liège with the specific object of taking over the listening service on the whole length of the Eastern frontier.

Belgium may be said therefore to have taken steps on an extensive scale for the protection of the Eastern frontier. In addition, the striking power of the Army has been considerably increased by improvements in the Artillery, mechanisation of an increased number of units and the establishment of Reserve Divisions.

As to mechanisation, it should be noted that the part-mechanisation of four out of the six regiments of Cavalry was completed according to programme by the end of 1935. The four regiments are now composed of one horsed half-regiment of 2 carabineer and one machine gun squadrons, and one mechanised half-regiment of one motor cyclist squadron, one armoured car section and one anti-tank battery of eight 4.7 cm. guns. In the march past in Brussels on April 8th 1936 the new armoured cars of the part-mechanised Cavalry were shown for the first time. The armoured squadrons of these regiments consist of 12 caterpillar armoured cars with high turrets carrying one heavy machine gun. In the course of 1936 the establishment was increased by the addition of two motorised regiments ("cavaliers portés") combined in a single brigade, to be formed on mobilisation. The new brigade is to form part of the Corps troops at the disposal of the Commander of the Cavalry Corps, and to constitute a mobile reserve. The cars are requisitioned. At the Cavalry Corps manoeuvres at the beginning of July 1936 a brigade of this kind was formed out of reservists, and transported in 70 requisitioned lorries.

Reference must further be made in this connection to two legislative measures affecting the mobilisation of private cars. A Law of March 22nd 1935 imposed certain restrictions (not further particularised) on the owners of motor busses for the public conveyance of passengers "in the interest of security, National Defence etc." As the measure was countersigned by the War Minister, it may be taken to have introduced an obligation to hand over all motor busses in the event of mobilisation, as a peace-time measure of preparation for meeting certain requirements of the Army's transport. Another Law of March 31st 1936 further extended these restrictions to all public motor conveyances. The idea is presumably to borrow a leaf from the book of the French General Gallieni, who used taxis for the transport of troops at the battle of the Ourcq in September 1914: Belgium is making preparations to do the same.

The Artillery is also being further mechanised. All three Corps artillery regiments are to be motorised. Each of the three Army Corps is to have a mechanised battery of eight 4.7 cm. guns; and so is the Cavalry Corps. Mechanised batteries of this type have also been introduced with the Infantry regiments. Certain Divisions have been given "escort" battalions composed of 2 companies of 4.7 cm. armoured anti-aircraft guns. Apart from fortress artillery, Belgium has 353 light and 199 heavy guns.

Special efforts are being made in the Belgian Army in connection with the continued training of reservists. In March 1936 the 9th Division, one of the six Divisions of first-line reservists which it is proposed to form on mobilisation, was constituted at its war strength and did service training for 14 days. The reservists called up were those of the years 1930, 1931 and 1932. They were used to constitute the 16th, 17th and 28th Infantry regiments. The strength of these formations and the numbers of officers and non-commissioned officers serving were exactly the same as in war-time. In October 1936 the 10th Division served a similar period of training. Two Reserve Divisions will in future do training in this way every year. In addition, a Law of April 11th 1936 extended the general training periods for reservists as follows:

In the case of reservists of the Infantry, cyclists, Cavalry, Artillery and Pioneers, from 42 to 58 days.

In the case of reservists intended to serve as Reserve officers or non-commissioned officers, from 42 to 74 days.

This Law came into force on January 1st 1937.

Army mechanisation:

St. Chamond wheeled and caterpillar tracked 80 H.P. motor lorry for gun transport (France)

English Mark III caterpillar car for transport of infantry with kit

Czech armoured draisine trolley with machine gun pivotal turret

The parliamentary discussion and approval of the new military proposals—which the Chief of the Belgian General Staff announced as likely to cost 2½ milliards of francs—was to be completed by December 1st 1936, that being the first date for the calling up of the 1937 class. After long debates, in the course of which the Socialists made counter-proposals in regard to the period of service which were turned down by the Government, the Committees of the two Chambers approved the proposals as a whole at the end of November. The Premier, M. van Zeeland, thereupon announced that the Government, while adhering in principle to the 18 month period of service, was prepared to limit the enforcement of the extended period to a trial of five years, i.e. until 1941, in the hope of the decline in the birth-rate being made good by that time—in which case the one year period would again become the rule. The Government Parties were not prepared however to accept this proposal. Instead, they brought in a new amendment reducing the period of service (beginning with the 1937 class) from 18 to 17 months in the case of the Infantry, part of the Ardennes chasseurs and the cyclist regiments, and raising it to 12 months—it had hitherto varied between 8 and 12 months for the bulk of the recruits—for all other troops. With this amendment, which the Government accepted, the Bills were then passed by a large majority of the Chamber on December 3rd 1936. In future something like three-fifths of the annual conscription will serve 17 months. The annual contingent, which under the old law was supposed to be 44,000 men but—owing to the many exemptions granted—in fact averaged only 41,000 trained men per annum, is now to be brought up to 47,000 by restricting the exemptions as also by a provision that the establishment of each year is to be increased by the shortage in the strength of the previous year. Furthermore, the Minister for National Defence brought in a Bill in the Chamber at the end of 1936 raising the contingent of recruits for the year 1937 to 84,000 men. In addition 4,000 professional soldiers with three to five years' service are to be enlisted for the Fortress artillery, the anti-aircraft batteries and the mechanised Cavalry: these, in addition to the 2,000 volunteers already serving in the cyclist units. Until the new system of professional elements is in working order, the recruits of the three arms mentioned will serve for 15 months. Special measures are also proposed for the year 1937 to enable a sufficient number of trained men to be kept permanently with the Colours. The mechanisation of the Cavalry will be completed in the course of 1937. The preparations for destruction on the frontier as a measure of national defence are to be extended and intensified, and the development of the fortifications behind the zones of destruction is to continue. As a measure of frontier defence on all fronts, the Bill proposes a redistribution of the headquarters of the Infantry regiments. From 1938 onwards two Infantry regiments will be transferred from the interior of the country to Turnhout (in the province of Antwerp) and Tongres (in the province of Limburg), so that the striking force on the North and North-East frontier will in future be composed of five Infantry regiments, while the remaining Infantry regiments will be garrisoned in Flanders (3 regiments), in the South (3 regiments), in the Hennegau (3 regiments) and in Brussels (3 regiments). The system of marching battalions of fully trained men for the initial occupation of the frontiers on the outbreak of war, one such battalion to each regiment, will be retained for the time being. The redistribution of stations of the Infantry regiments, so far as at present known, is as follows:

1st Regiment of the line	Verviers,
2nd Regiment of the line	Ghent,
3rd Regiment of the line	Ostend,
4th Regiment of the line	Bruges,
5th and 6th Regiments of the line . .	Antwerp,
7th Regiment of the line	Tongern,
8th Regiment of the line	Turnhout,
9th Regiment of the line	Brussels I,
Grenadier regiment
Carabineer regiment
11th Regiment of the line (1st battalion)	Beverloo,
11th Regiment of the line (IInd and IIIrd battalions)	Hasselt,
12th and 14th Regiments of the line (IInd and IIIrd battalions)	Liège,
14th Regiment of the line (1st battalion)	Huy,
13th Regiment of the line	Namur,
Ardennes chasseurs	Arlon, Bastogne, Vielsalm,
1st Regiment mounted chasseurs . .	Mons,
2nd Regiment mounted chasseurs . .	Charleroi,
3rd Regiment mounted chasseurs . .	Tournai.

Of the total of 7 Infantry and 2 Cavalry Divisions of the peace-time Army, 26 Infantry battalions, 2 cyclist regiments, 2 Frontier cyclist battalions, 1 Air regiment, 1 anti-aircraft Section, 2 Engineer regiments, 3 part-mechanised Cavalry regiments and 9 light and heavy Artillery Sections with the corresponding number of Army troops are stationed on the Eastern frontier for its defence; and this list does not take into account the numerous batteries of the forts of Liège and Namur. In other words, one-quarter of the 77,000 men of the peace-time Army are stationed in the Eastern frontier provinces and in the area of the Liège fortress. For the maintenance of her proposed unconditional neutrality, Belgium would now be in a position out of her trained reservists to put in the field, if required, a field army of some 650,000 men, that is to say, 19 Infantry Divisions, 2 Cavalry Divisions, with some 1,500 light and 460 heavy machine guns, and an Air Force (under present conditions) of some 520 aircraft including second line planes, 2 anti-aircraft regiments with 16 anti-aircraft batteries, and 2 searchlight formations with 6 searchlight batteries.

I. POLICY AND ARMAMENTS

"We would have been ready to conclude a Disarmament Convention, and have not indeed yet abandoned all hope of doing so. But in the world as it now is the strengthening of our own defences is not only a consummation devoutly to be wished: it is a consummation which comports an imperative national obligation."

To something like this common denominator all the speeches with which responsible English statesmen in the past year have justified rearmament—and rearmament on a scale such as has never been known in England before in time of peace—can be reduced. It is a kind of general absolution. "In the world as it now is . . ." No question but that the argument is a strong one! And the English people, which has failed more than once of recent years to comprehend what its Government was about, has understood this much that, in a world which is arming, England cannot remain "disarmed," particularly as her rearmament is not only or primarily in the interest of English security, but also in the interest of the strengthening of the League of Nations, the development of collective security and—through collective security—the cause of peace. We have even the satisfaction of observing—a little late in the day, it is true—the alacrity and the insistence with which the French Press welcomes and gives prominence to the new English recognition of the dangers inherent in one-sided disarmament on England's part. This one-sided disarmament is the cause of the disturbance in the balance of power: it has been a useless sacrifice for a utopian ideal. At last it has been realised that Germany had a case when for the last ten years she urged the senseless character of the one-sided disarmament imposed on her by force. England today is paying the price of past disarmament in the shape of rearmament on the most gigantic scale.

"In the world as it now is!" But the speakers have unfortunately forgotten to explain to their audiences why the world has become what it now is, and why England must rearm. For we are under no illusions as to what they mean by "the world": they mean amongst other things Germany, and perhaps they mean principally Germany.

An answer to this question has not yet been given: but light is thrown on the matter by the armament debates in both Houses of Parliament in the United Kingdom and by the numerous speeches made by responsible English ministers then and on other occasions in recent years.

Their argument is that the crisis, through which Europe has been passing since 1935, is not due to the reintroduction of compulsory military service and the concurrent rearmament of Germany, since Germany did not proceed to take this step until the authors of the Versailles Treaty had violated and ignored for seventeen years the true principles of Versailles, which on the basis of President Wilson's Fourteen Points were intended—and were expected by English public opinion equally—to establish new forms in international relations. Accordingly the key to a solution of the armaments question was never in Germany's hands. The crisis through which Europe has been passing since 1935 was a consequence rather of the Abyssinian issue. Later it was intensified and rendered acute by the conclusion of the Franco-Soviet alliance, which made an end de facto of the security in the West created by the guarantees of the Locarno Pact and led inevitably to the restoration by German troops, of complete sovereignty in the demilitarised Rhineland zone, as also by the open interference of Soviet Russia in events in Spain.

As a result of the crisis arising out of the Abyssinian question, Mediterranean issues of vital importance for England's interests as a Great Power were raised; and these were closely linked up with problems of the Near, Middle and Far East. It should not be forgotten in dealing with the political developments which followed that the Suez Canal is a vital artery of the British Empire. Herein lies the whole explanation of the whole Mediterranean policy of England and the need for the maintenance of strong military forces in Egypt and the English possessions in the Mediterranean.

But, as the English Premier Mr. Baldwin stated at the time in the House of Commons, England's strength is not complete even though her prestige is great. It was the lesson of the hour for England. She was driven to creating for herself the strength which she lacked, if she was to be able to give her policy the requisite backing and to be able, should the need arise, to proceed to the final consequences which her policy implied. There were two ways of doing this. She might secure the support of Allies, or she might develop her own resources.

She did both. In the Abyssinian conflict she not only concluded far-reaching understandings and agreements with France for close cooperation of their respective forces at sea, on land and in the air; she also made certain of the support of the States bordering on the Mediterranean littoral. These last however were not in a position to render her adequate military aid in the shape of naval and air forces in case of need; and England proceeded accordingly to arm herself. The King accordingly announced in the Speech from the Throne that the fulfilment of British international obligations under the Covenant of the League of Nations and the necessary protection of the British Empire made it imperative to take steps to deal with the shortcomings in the national defences.

England therefore drew the conclusion from the Abyssinian War that never again must it be possible for a foreign Power to override England's will. It is this categorical imperative which, far more than the necessities of defence which are put forward to the outside world as her motive, that is responsible for England's decision to rearm. It is not difficult to prove that this is so. The English Armaments White Paper for example of March 1936 expressly says:

"... Although in the circumstances created by the Italo-Abyssinian conflict, His Majesty's Government were able to make the dispositions which the situation required, they were embarrassed by the decline in the effective strength of their armaments by sea, land and air. ... It was only possible to safeguard the position in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea by denuding other areas to an extent which might have involved grave risks.

"... In any event, collective security can hardly be maintained unless every member of the League of Nations is prepared to make a contribution, adequate in relation to its resources, to the strength of the whole.

"We cannot excuse our own weakness by pointing to the strength of our neighbours. Our weakness would prevent us from playing our due part in enforcing collective security, ... It is essential therefore that the relation of our own armed forces to those of other Great Powers should be maintained at a figure which will be high enough to enable us to exercise the influence and authority in international affairs which are alike required for the defence of vital British interests, and in the application of the policy of collective security."

The rearmament of England which has been in progress since 1935 is therefore an expression of the English determination to be able, where they wish to have a say, to say it with emphasis. Since Mr. Eden's statement in the House of Commons on November 5th 1936, be it remembered, Great Britain is determined once again to take the lead in foreign policy. A strong fleet and Air Force and an Army ready to be thrown into the scale as required are in future to lend to English political Notes that emphasis which has been so painfully lacking in the last two years.

In his speech at Leamington on November 20th 1936, in explanation of the rearmament programme, Mr. Eden gave a still clearer outline of British obligations; and in his interpretation of the latter he took occasion to indicate the guiding principles of British foreign policy as a plain and unmistakeable peace policy in the following terms:

"These arms may, and if the occasion arose they would, be used in our own defence and in defence of the territories of the British Commonwealth of Nations. They may, and if the occasion arose they would, be used in defence of France and Belgium against unprovoked aggression in accordance with our existing obligations. They may, and if a new Western European settlement can be reached they would, be used in defence of Germany were she the victim of unprovoked aggression by any of the other signatories of such a settlement. Those, together with our Treaty of Alliance with Iraq and our projected Treaty with Egypt, are our definite obligations. In addition our armaments may be used in bringing help to a victim of aggression in any case where, in our judgment, it would be proper under the provisions of the Covenant to do so. I use the word 'may' deliberately, since in such an instance there is no automatic obligation to take military action. It is moreover right that this should be so, for nations cannot be expected to incur automatic military obligations save for areas where their vital interests are concerned."

It is noteworthy that, in specifying the circumstances under which the British defence forces are to be used, Mr. Eden mentions Germany only conditionally—the condition being that a new Agreement is concluded in Western Europe as a substitute for Locarno.

On December 14th at Bradford Mr. Eden repudiated the reports, which had been in circulation as a result of the Leamington Speech, with regard to an alliance with France and Belgium and a movement towards the formation of a Bloc, and again expressed a wish for cooperation with Germany, not merely for the purpose of concluding a West European Pact, but with a view to the establishment of a new European order as a whole. He further attacked the false interpretation of his remarks in regard to the geographical spheres of influence of Great Britain. Though British vital interests might be found in certain clearly defined areas, the British interest in peace was world-wide. Great Britain therefore must be on the alert at all times and in all places: it was not possible for her to disinterest herself in this or that part of the world in the vague hope that events in such a part would not touch her. She could not seek her security alone in the glass house of Western Europe.

The latter utterance unquestionably embodies an allusion—not unconnected, perhaps, with the visit of the Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck, to London—to the East of Europe, which region however plainly excludes in English official eyes the Soviet Union: England believes herself to be fully assured against the danger of Bolshevik influences. In spite of the grave handicaps to the political development of Europe which the intrigues and machinations and actual interventions of the U.S.S.R. and its Bolshevik agents in Europe constitute—as to which the Spanish Civil War affords an object lesson to the whole world—the British Government still holds fast, as Eden's speeches show, to the policy announced in the communiqué published on March 31st 1935 on the occasion of Mr. Eden's visit to Moscow, the policy (that is to say) embodied in the statement that "friendly cooperation between England and the U.S.S.R. is of great importance in connection with the general efforts for the collective organisation of peace."

In an end-of-the-Session speech on December 19th in the House of Commons Eden once more made the point which he had put previously to the House on November 5th, with regard to the cordial relations between England and France as the two great Democracies of Western Europe. England might, he said, look forward with confidence to further and closer relations between the French and British Governments; and the same was true of Belgium, from whom an assurance had been received that Belgium adhered to her existing obligations. (Anglo-Belgian friendship had been specially emphasised on November 27th by Mr. Eden at the reception of the Belgian Premier van Zeeland by the British Committee of the International Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Eden on that occasion referred to the vitally important interest of Great Britain in the independence and integrity of Belgium, and was at pains to specify that Great Britain would come to Belgium's aid in the event of unprovoked aggression directed against the latter.)

The tension which had developed in the Mediterranean as a result of the Italo-Abyssinian conflict was finally terminated—after the numerous references to the subject by Mussolini in his public utterances (the last of which was his Milan speech on November 1st) and the corresponding replies by Baldwin, Neville Chamberlain, Sir Samuel Hoare and Eden—by the Gentleman's Agreement of January 2nd 1937. The "steel castles" established in the mean time by Great Britain at her various Mediterranean points d'appui have however remained in situ, it having been conclusively demonstrated that the paper castle of Geneva is not an adequate defence of Great Britain's world-wide interests.

II. REARMAMENT

The rearmament programme of Great Britain extends to all three branches of the Defence forces—Navy, Army and Air Force. The increase in armaments, on the need for which renewed emphasis is now being laid, was first initiated by the English Defence Estimates for 1935-36. The grounds for the rearmament programme were stated in the White Paper of March 1935—to with obvious allusion to Germany—to lie in the fact that in their present state the Defence forces were no longer sufficient to ensure the protection of the British Empire, having regard to the armaments of other countries, and must accordingly be strengthened in order to bring them up to current standards. The Navy Estimates in recent years had been kept, generally speaking, at a level which enabled the requisite replacement building to be carried through: but the Army and Air Force Estimates had been cut down from £62,300,000 to £53,000,000 in the course of the years 1922-1932. Since the last named year they had been slowly rising. The total Estimates and Supplementary Estimates for the Army and Air Force for the financial years 1935-36 and 1936-37 compare as follows with the totals for 1934-35: the figures are in millions of £ sterling.

Arm	1934-35 Budget total	1935-36			Increase over 1934-35 total	1936-37			Increase over 1935-36 total
		Estimates	Supplementary Estimates	Total		Estimates	Supplementary Estimates	Total
Army	39.60	43.55	1.35	44.90	5.30	49.28	6.60	55.88	10.98
Air Force...	17.56	20.65	1.61	22.26	4.70	39.00	11.70	50.70	28.10
Royal Arsenal...	—	—	—	—	—	—	0.29	0.29	0.29

With the exception of the chapter "Lodging and Transport" there is an increase under every head in the chapters of the earlier of the two Budgets (1935-36). The item "Armaments" shows by far the biggest increase. About one-half of this total, viz. £1,087,000 out of £2,111,000, went to Artillery munitions, the expenditure on which in 1934-35 was only £680,000. The expenditure for motor transport in 1935-36 was 110 per cent more than in the previous year: that for motor transport capable of movement across country was 54 per cent more: and that for Signals equipment searchlights and bridging material as much as 240 per cent more.

In the current 1936-37 Budget the total armaments expenditure on the Army and Air Force shows an increase as compared with 1935-36 of £34,370,000 or about 37 per cent*). The increase in the Air Force alone is nearly 128 per cent! The major part of the 1936-37 increases in the case of the Army is not for expansion of the effectiveness so much as for reorganisation, and in particular the acquisition of war material and mechanisation. The heading "Armaments" again shows an increase, as in 1935-36, this time of nearly 50 per cent. Half of the total was again allocated to the replenishment of artillery munition stocks. In order to bring the production of munitions for the Army into line with the postulates of the White Paper on National Defence and the Speeding up of Production, the post of Director General for the Manufacture of Munitions was created in July 1936.

An Army Order issued by the Secretary for War at the end of December 1935 was of paramount importance in connection with the reorganisation and modernisation of the Army which is at present armed with some 10,000 light and 4,200 heavy machine guns and some 1,900 light and 500 heavy guns. The purpose of the proposed reorganisation was stated in the following terms. The Infantry was to be reorganised in such a way as to make it possible to reduce the size of the Divisions while increasing the fire-strength of the auxiliary arms. The tactical cooperation of the Infantry units was to be improved, and their subsequent development facilitated. Infantry training and the increase of establishments in war-time were to be simplified. The present Cavalry Division was stated to be lacking in the rapidity of movement, range of action and fighting strength required under present-day conditions from mobile troops engaged against mechanised units; and it was added that the Tank Corps must be able under certain circumstances to command the support of equally mobile troops capable of being thrown into action in terrain unsuited for tanks.

The central points of the Order were therefore:

1. The regular Army to be more powerful, more mobile and faster-moving.
2. The Cavalry to be restored to its old position as a battle arm and as the strategic advance-guard of the Army.

Drastic changes were accordingly projected in the organisation of the Infantry Brigades, which correspond tactically to the Infantry regiments of an army like the German Army, while at the same time the Cavalry was to be mechanised on a far-reaching scale. A so-called Mobile Division was to take the place of the former Cavalry Division. Details of the proposed new organisation are as follows.

*) Meanwhile the British Government at the beginning of February 1937 announced an Armaments Loan of £400,000,000 with a free hand in the matter of expenditure on armaments.

The reorganisation of the Infantry, which is to be completed in the current financial year (1936-37), is to take the form of a reduction of the 4 battalions of the present Infantry brigades to 3, and the formation of 2 machine gun battalions as Divisional troops with each Division. The mechanisation of the Infantry has made great strides. It is probable that in a future war the whole of the Infantry of a Division will be transported in omnibuses.

The present Cavalry Division consisting of 2 horsed brigades and Divisional troops is to be combined with the Tank Corps in a mechanised "Mobile Division." It will be composed of 2 mechanised Cavalry brigades (each consisting of 2 Cavalry motor regiments and one Cavalry light tank regiment) and 2 mechanised Divisional troop units. In Egypt there is one mechanised Cavalry brigade consisting of one Cavalry armoured car regiment and 2 mechanised Cavalry regiments. The following Tank troops are at present available—one Tank regiment consisting of one light tank battalion and 3 mixed tank battalions with one Army tank battalion. It is proposed to form 3 more Army tank battalions, so that in the future four out of the five Divisions stationed in the home country will each have one Army tank battalion. The reorganisation of the Tank Corps will be spread over a considerable period. The number of tanks may be put at about 600.

According to the White Paper on National Defence of March 3rd 1936 four new Infantry battalions are also to be formed to reinforce the garrisons in the Mediterranean. The existing Army formations are to be radically modernised and equipped with the newest forms of armament and modern material, and supplied with adequate munitions and other war equipment. Special attention is being directed to the armament of the Field Artillery, which is being completely renewed. The mechanisation of the Artillery and the whole of the Supply Services is also to be taken in hand.

The establishment of the regular Army in the home country and overseas was increased in 1936 from 152,200 to 158,400 men without Air troops. Including the 57,524 British troops in India, there is an establishment of altogether 215,924 men without the Air arm. This establishment is at present about 10,000 men short. The Army Reserve will be some 121,000 strong at the end of the financial year 1936-37. At the end of July 1936 the English War Minister stated in the House of Commons that the Supplementary Reserve, founded in 1924 primarily as a technical reserve and numbering at the present time some 22,000 men, was to be augmented by a new Infantry reserve formation of (at the outset) 17,000 men, to be open to young unmarried men between 17 and 25 years of age, who were prepared to bind themselves for six years' service with an option of an extension for a further four years. Candidates who accept this undertaking will undergo training in the first year for 26 weeks with an active Infantry regiment, with subsequent periods of training of 14 days in each subsequent year. Referring to the grounds for this new formation, The Times wrote at the end of July 1936 that it was hoped on the one hand to stem the shortage of recruits, since some of the reservists might be expected after the first half-year to remain with the colours, and on the other hand to provide the regular Army with a valuable reserve of trained young persons.

Another notable change in the organisation of the regular Army is the decision to entrust the ground defence against attack from the air and the defence of the coasts of England, Scotland and Wales to the Territorial Army. This decision relieves the regular Army of all those duties which have hitherto stood in the way of its immediate use as an expeditionary force. In the House of Commons debate on the Government declarations with regard to the Defence programme at the beginning of November 1936 the question was raised as to the part to be played by the British Defence forces on the Continent in future wars, and it was asked whether it was proposed to prepare an expeditionary force for the purpose. The then First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Samuel Hoare, replied that it was better to speak of a "force of all work" rather than an expeditionary force, as the latter appellation presupposed that events would follow the same course as in 1914. The "force of all work" would consist of 5 Divisions, and would be armed and equipped in such a manner as to be available "under any conceivable circumstances." Sir Samuel added that the present position differed appreciably from that of 1914. In 1914 there were definite obligations and an actual Plan drawn up by agreement between the French and English General Staffs: there were no such obligations at the present time.

In the case of the Territorial Army, which for technical reasons cannot be modernised simultaneously with the regular Army, a beginning is to be made with the improvement of the at present inadequate armament and training. It should be explained that the Territorial Army, like the regular Army, is based on the voluntary system. But, whereas the regular Army is a voluntary professional army with twelve years' service, of which 7 years are served with the colours and the rest in the Reserve (from which the establishments are brought up to strength on mobilisation), the Territorial Army is a voluntary body with a form of militia training. The volunteers for the Territorial Army bind themselves only for four years' service in the home country and overseas. The importance of the Territorial Army in relation to the field army to be formed in case of war is to be found in the British Regulations which lay down that the Territorial Army provides the cadres for the expansion of the peace-time army in case of war, so as to form a national army. It has also the duty of supporting the regular Army in operations overseas in case of war. But the use of the Territorial Army for this purpose depends on the scope of the warlike undertaking. There is a distinction underlying British Defence legislation between minor wars (i.e. colonial operations or wars against minor Powers) and major wars (i.e. wars against great Powers). In the case of the latter the Territorial Army is required to put into line its 12 Divisions, 1 Cavalry Division, and Army, Air Defence, Coast and Home Defence troops. These are then reinforced and, if necessary, sent overseas according as they are needed.

The above-mentioned particulars show the peculiar significance of the Territorial Army in relation to the Defence preparedness of Great Britain. The organisation of the higher direction of the Territorial Army in the War Office was taken in hand in 1935 and concentrated, in order to bring it into closer connection with the regular Army and to speed up its mobilisation in case of need. The proposal to reduce the number of Territorial Divisions from 14 to 12 with a view to constituting Air Defence formations for London and the big industrial centres in the Midlands and in the North was carried through in 1935 to the extent that the ground defence of the London Air Defence organisation was reinforced by the conversion of a Division of the Territorial Army into an Air Defence Division, while the Air Defence forces were reinforced by 4 new anti-aircraft Sections in the home country and three such overseas. In the middle of December 1936 a second Territorial Division was converted into an Air Defence Division for the districts North of London. The White Paper of March 3rd 1936 says that it is proposed further to speed up the renewal and modernisation of the coastal defences and fortified ports of the home country, and to extend the reorganisation of the Air Defence in the South East of England for the protection of the important industrial districts in the Midlands and in the North. In November 1936 the War Office announced the establishment of 3 batteries and 7 companies of new anti-aircraft troops to strengthen the existing defences of the capital against attack from the air. Over and above these extensions of the Air Defence and coastal defence of the Territorial Army, the Secretary for War announced in the House of Commons in July 1936 that the Defence Corps which had been created in 1934 as a special branch of the Territorial Army would be replaced by National Defence companies attached to the local Infantry battalions of the Territorial Army. The new National Defence companies are to be recruited from former soldiers of 45 to 60 years of age. They are intended to defend important points in the country in case of war. Their total strength is to be 8,450 men.

Great Britain has always had peculiar difficulties in connection with recruiting. There was for example a shortage on the establishments on January 1st 1936 of the following numbers of officers and men:

Regular Army . . .	8,639 officers and men
Territorial Army . .	54,140 " " "

In November 1st 1936 the numbers were:

Regular Army . . .	10,724 officers and men
Territorial Army . .	43,838 " " "

These difficulties are largely due to the physical unfitness of the applicants at the recruiting stations. In the military service year ending March 31st 1936 no less than 53,000 persons in the whole of England were rejected by the examining Committees as unfit. The majority of these rejections (24,000 men) were applicants for service in the Army; the Air Force, which has an even higher standard than the Army, rejected only 8,500. These striking figures are sufficient explanation of the fact that the numbers of the Army are still very much below its budgetary establishment. A vigorously organised recruiting service with its headquarters in London is now engaged in an active campaign to secure the requisite man-power for the Army by every possible means. The recruiting posters which are to be seen all over England are sufficient evidence of the psychological effect on the population of military age. Certain regiments conduct their own propaganda to attract recruits to their ranks. The serving troops endeavour by propaganda marches, the exhibition of anti-aircraft defence guns and similar public demonstrations—the great annual air manoeuvres at Hendon are an instance—to arouse the interest of the nation in its national defence. This extensive propaganda has increased the numbers of recruits for the Territorial Army to a certain extent, but not to the extent required to bring the establishments up to strength. The numbers would no doubt be much higher but for the fact that nearly two-thirds of the applicants are physically unfit. The Labour Party, as may be seen from the House of Commons debates at the beginning of November 1936, attributes this deterioration in the physical fitness of the English people to the prevailing unemployment and low wages and their corollary in the shape of under-nutrition of large sections of the population. Mr. Alexander, First Lord of the Admiralty in a former Labour Government, pointed out on this occasion that, according to a Report of the League of Nations, not less than 50 per cent of the British population were under-nourished. The Government, in presence of this heavy percentage of physically unfit applicants at the recruiting stations, has recently considered the possibility of reducing the physical qualifications required. The intention is, according to a report which appeared in The Times at the end of October 1936, in future to have four grades of fitness, of which the first three would be enforced in the case of service in the Infantry, Artillery and Cavalry, while the fourth would be applicable to service behind the front line. How serious the recruiting issue is for Great Britain may be gathered from the speech delivered by the War Minister Duff Cooper on November 20th 1936, in which he said that, if there was no change for the better in the near future in the recruiting for the Army, the present system of volunteer recruits would break down. The warning uttered on this occasion can hardly be understood otherwise than as meaning that the system of voluntary recruiting will have to be replaced by some form of compulsory service.

The prevailing anxiety in regard to the recruiting figures was referred to by Lord Stanhope at length on November 19th 1936 in the House of Lords. The numbers had been insufficient, he explained, ever since 1933. In 1933-34 there were 28,696 applicants for the Territorial Army; in 1935-36 there were only 23,815. In the current financial year (1936-37) the War Office hoped to get some 40,000 men. But, even if these numbers presented themselves, they would not be sufficient to fill the natural gaps and occasional deficiencies, since the Territorial Army had now to reckon with an establishment of 191,500 men. To bring it up to that figure, 86,000 additional men were needed! In the case of the regular Army the position was still worse. For the year 1936-37 35,000 recruits were wanted; and the War Office could only count on some 21,500. The shortage was, in other words, increasing. As for the newly created Supplementary Reserve (Infantry class), the recruiting was altogether insufficient. In the first two months only 850 applicants had presented themselves.

The position in regard to recruiting for the Air arm is very much better. Special orders were issued extending and increasing the recruiting and training of the airmen, in order to meet the active demand for personnel for the regular Air Force.

This active demand for personnel for the Air arm is due to the fact that it is the British Air Force which has had the largest rearmament programme of the three Defence forces. In previous years the British Air Force was kept within quantitatively low limits—though the quality of the Force was always high—in anticipation of successful results from the disarmament discussions at Geneva: but at the end of 1934 the Government decided to embark on air rearmament on a very big scale indeed. This unexpected action on the part of England was said by English spokesmen to be a consequence of the increased air armaments of the European countries, and Germany in particular, and of the resulting increase of tension. Faced with the fact that in view of these developments insular position and a strong Navy were no longer an adequate defence against attacks from the air, the English Parliament proceeded in May 1935 to approve an extensive rearmament programme for the British Air arm. The Air Minister on this occasion took the line that the strength of the British air forces must always be adjusted to that of the largest air fleet within striking distance of Great Britain. The programme accordingly proposed that the British Air Force should be strengthened by 71 squadrons and brought by the end of March 1937 up to 123 squadrons with 1,500 first line planes, not including 490 planes in service with the Fleet Air Arm and overseas. The personnel of the Air Force was to be increased at the same time from 32,000 to 55,000 men.

Further action is to be taken in the financial year 1937-38, when a beginning is to be made with the execution of the new Air programme announced in the White Paper. Under the new programme a total of 129 home squadrons are to be formed with some 1,750 first line planes. To this number are to be added 4 new auxiliary squadrons for the Territorial Army. Five Army squadrons, which are already in being, are to be increased to seven. The existing 25 oversea squadrons, consisting of 273 first line planes, are to remain at that strength until the end of March 1937. By the end of March 1939 they are to be increased by 12 squadrons, consisting of 144 planes, so as to bring the total up to 37 squadrons consisting of 414 planes. Great Britain now has a total number of some 3,500 first line planes in the home Army, in the Navy and overseas, together with training and second line aircraft. Under the rearmament programme the figure is to be increased by the end of March 1937 to a total of some 5,000 planes. Meanwhile the personnel of the Air arm at home and overseas has risen to 68,875 men including 13,250 reservists, while the number of trained pilots has risen to over 5,000.

The development of the Air arm, and in particular the increase in first line aircraft, in the three branches of the British air forces under the Rearmament Programmes is shown in the following table:

	1934	April 1935	Jan. 1936	July 1936	April 1937	April 1938
At home	548	583	691	802	1,500	1,750
Overseas	267	273	273	273	273	423
Fleet Air Arm	180	190	190	190	217	357
	995	1,046	1,154	1,265	1,990	2,530
Second line planes.....	800	900	1,154	1,265	3,000	3,750
Total	1,795	1,946	2,308	2,530	4,990	6,280

This comprehensive programme is evidence of the British intention to use the Air arm in the future to play a decisive part in the general scheme of defence of the Empire. The closer connection established in the year 1935 between the three branches of the Defence forces, Army, Navy and Air Force, under a Minister of Defence in the Committee of Imperial Defence is intended to throw light on the general question of the use of the forces and to promote a solution of the problem of the concentration of the defence of the Empire. At a Defence Congress of all parts of the Empire, to be held in connection with the King's Coronation in 1937, these urgent problems of Imperial defence will be discussed with the Heads of the Dominions and put on a new footing.

In the foreground of the British air rearmament is the problem of the air defence of the home country. All the Air forces of the home country are accordingly to be combined in the Metropolitan Air Force. An Order issued by the Air Ministry in June 1936 announced fundamental changes in the command and administration of the Air forces. The object of the reorganisation, to quote the comments of the Morning Post Air Correspondent at the time, is to increase the striking power of the Air arm by bringing its peace strength up to a point approximately equivalent to war strength. In future there will be four independent Commands under the supreme command of the Air Ministry as under:

1. The Bomber Command at Uxbridge for all bombing squadrons.
2. The Fighter Command at Stanmore, to which the reconnaissance, Army observation and auxiliary air squadrons will belong.
3. The Coastal Command at Lee-on-the-Solent for all flying-boats and the squadrons for general sea reconnaissance. This Command comprises a special branch for land training of squadrons of the Fleet Air Arm.
4. The Training Command at Ternhill (Salop) for the training of all airmen other than the naval airmen.

The Daily Telegraph observed at the time that the establishment of the Bomber Command, to which the official announcement itself gave the most prominent place, was tantamount to complete acceptance of the position of bombing aircraft as constituting under present conditions the first line of air defence.

The main object of the British defence programme is the defence of the home country by an Air arm of the highest possible strength and striking power and a strong fleet backed by the anti-aircraft defence organisation, said Sir Thomas Inskip, the Minister of Defence, in November 1936. He added with reference to the progress made with the air armaments that the Government believed the new British aircraft types to be second to none in other countries. From 1937 onwards till 1939 and 1940 the manufacture of aircraft would increase steadily. The number of workers employed by the aircraft industry had risen from 30,000 in April 1935 to 58,000 in June 1936. The stock of planes other than first line planes was already very large. The majority of the planes at present being produced at high pressure were, he said, intended as second or third or fourth line planes, as the organisation of the aircraft industry was only gradually being built up. The British Air Ministry announced at the end of October 1936 that six big firms had been given an order to erect 8 factories. The construction of the factories would be financed by the Government. As soon as they were ready, they would begin to produce, and train the staff of employees required for war.

The organisation of the armaments industry was indicated as one of the main features of the Rearmament Programme when the latter was first announced. The process of "industrial mobilisation" was accordingly pushed forward energetically, Government-owned works being extended while private works already manufacturing armaments or works considered capable of adaptation for the purpose were instructed to extend their plant for the production of war material. In addition, the Government proceeded to build up what is known as a "shadow industry"—that is to say, it caused certain selected firms to erect additional works at the Government's expense to be held in readiness to produce armaments in time of war. On the other hand the Government does not propose for the present either to appoint a special Minister of Munitions or to nationalise the armaments industry.

The rôle which History has assigned to the regular Army in the defence of the Empire remains still what it has been for centuries. That part of the Army which remains in the home country is the principal training-school and nursery for all the land forces. In war it constitutes the strategic reserve, which is held in readiness to be sent in whole or in part to reinforce the forces overseas or to be thrown in to some new field of operations elsewhere. The Minister for Defence, Sir Thomas Inskip, has himself stated that the strategic position of Great Britain does not permit of the Army being restricted to the defence of the home country's coasts. If Great Britain, he said, is ever again involved in war, whether for the maintenance of collective security in conjunction with others or in virtue of the operation of an alliance against unprovoked aggression, she will not be able to abandon the struggle until her security is re-established—which is tantamount to saying, she will be compelled to make every effort until she has won the final victory.

The duties of the Army may be particularised as follows, though any such enumeration necessarily involves a good deal of overlapping.

1. Provision of drafts for service in the overseas possessions under the Cardwell system.
2. Maintenance of an Expeditionary Force, a "force of all work", consisting (when brought up to full strength by the calling up of reservists) of 5 Divisions and one Mobile Division, to reinforce the troops in India and overseas as required, and to implement international commitments.

In the last named connection the Expeditionary Force may play in the first instance a rôle as a diplomatic weapon. The stronger it is and the better armed it is, the more effective it will be for diplomatic purposes. Hence the great importance attaching to the exploitation of modern technical possibilities in connection with (a) mobility and (b) armament. The composition of the Expeditionary Force will depend on the nature of the operations proposed and the character of the theatre of war in each case.

3. Participation in the general defence of the British Empire in the event of war against one or more Great Powers.

III. ENGLAND'S REARMAMENT CAMPAIGN

Towards the end of 1934 (on November 28th) the alleged German armaments were the occasion of a lengthy statement in the House of Commons by Mr. Baldwin, at that time acting Prime Minister; and it was plain to all that his utterances were not directed towards any revival of the disarmament negotiations which had foundered ever since the preceding June, but were intended rather to provide the justification for the British rearmament programme on which it was now proposed to embark with all sail spread.

Mr. Baldwin's speech had been preceded in the course of 1934 by a number of statements by British statesmen, which in their turn followed on the speeches made at the end of 1933 on the occasion of the German action of October 14th, all of which will be found reproduced with comments in No. 83-84 of this periodical.

The striking feature of all these utterances was the underlying tendency of the English movement for Rearmament and, as the kernel of the movement, the demand for a stronger Air Force.

These motives were especially apparent in the debate which took place in both Houses of Parliament on November 29th 1933, and in the speeches by Mr. Baldwin and the then Air Minister Lord Londonderry on that occasion. The latter's demand for parity with the next strongest Air Powers was based on references to the air rearmament of the United States, Japan and the U.S.S.R. When Baldwin the day before said England could not continue at her present state in respect of her air forces, and alluded in this connection to difficulties made by certain States whom he must not name if any progress with disarmament was to be had, he cannot have included Germany under this heading for the simple reason that he went on to say, either let there be disarmament down to the German level or an approximation of armaments, i. e. disarmament of the highly armed down to a middle line and rearmament of the disarmed up to the same level. Germany therefore had no place in the origins of the British movement to rearm.

The Rearmament movement was accompanied by a process of enlightening the British public as to the dangers of inadequate air defences. Special attention was drawn to the air rearmament of various hitherto unarmed countries and the creation of independent Air Forces as a specially menacing aspect of such rearmament. Long before Germany left the League and the Disarmament Conference, voices were to be heard in the English Conservative Press calling for increase of the English Air Force to a total of 3,000, 5,000 and even 10,000 planes: see the speeches delivered at the Conservative Party Congress in Birmingham at the beginning of October 1933. Even though such demands were not taken seriously in any responsible circles, it was none the less the case that the feeling in favour of strengthening the English Air arm had grown to such an extent that a Parliamentary debate on the position in regard to British security in the air had become inevitable.

But the Rearmament movement which was apparent in the debate of November 29th was still hampered by the attachment of the majority of the English people to a policy of disarmament. Lord Londonderry was compelled to make a further statement on December 7th, in which he explained that his remarks in the House of Lords on November 29th did not mean that the British Government had any intention of changing their policy for a policy of air rearmament. His Majesty's Government still took their stand, he said, on the policy embodied in the English Draft Convention of March 16th 1933.

We find British statesmen expressing this view as early as the beginning of 1934. But Baldwin's speech in the House of Commons on February 8th 1934 showed that the British Government was taking up an increasingly defensive position in relation to Baldwin's own Party with their eager advocacy of Rearmament, as well as against other supporters of the Rearmament movement. Baldwin still hoped for a Convention which would fix the "limits up to which we could arm. It would be our duty to make ourselves as competent as we might up to that limit, because on an equality of armaments you will find that is what every nation will do, what every nation must do if it is to make itself fit to be the colleague of other nations when the time comes that sanctions have to be enforced. . . . It can be but a short time before it becomes known whether the prospect is favourable for the British draft or whether it is going to end in failure."

A month later on March 8th a statement by the Under-Secretary for Air, Sir Philip Sassoon, made it clear that the decision to increase the Air Force by 4 to 6 squadrons was now definite. The reasons for this step, as stated by Sassoon, were as follows: "The world has reached a critical point of extreme delicacy in the matter of disarmament. Last year I expressed the hope that the Disarmament Conference would come to a satisfactory agreement for the limitation and reduction of air armaments. That has not yet been done. . . . Throughout all the discussions which have taken place upon the subject we have been foremost in advocating general disarmament in the air to the lowest level on which international agreement can be secured. We have put forward definite proposals to that end. We have in fact followed a policy of studious moderation in the matter of air armaments for over 15 years. Far from accepting our proposals, farther yet from following our example, other nations have steadily increased the strength of their respective air arms until they far outnumber our own. . . . In these circumstances His Majesty's Government feel that it is impossible for this country to hold in abeyance the ten-year old programme of 1923, now so long overdue for completion. We cannot afford to accept a position of continuing inferiority. We have made it plain that this country must, so long as air forces exist, have parity in the air, howsoever that parity be attained. . . ."

"If other nations will not come down to our level then inevitably our national and Imperial security demands that we must begin to build up to theirs. . . . We do not want at this stage to put forward a programme of construction which might prove to be the starting-gun for a race in air armaments."

Remarkable insight into the position of Germany was also shown by Baldwin, when he made the interesting remark that, whatever the ultimate motive that made Germany at the moment so anxious for her air force, it was a case of the same feeling of apprehension as Winston Churchill had noted in the case of the English people. "The real danger to peace is a very strong Air Power on the one hand and a defenceless nation on the other. . . . The Government will not relax their efforts, if a Convention on our lines fails, to try to get an Air convention alone among the countries of Western Europe. . . . If all our efforts fail, the Government will see to it that in air strength and air power this country shall no longer be in a position of any inferiority to any country within striking distance of our shores."

Again in the House of Lords on May 7th the British Government was called upon to defend its new policy in rebuttal of the charge of sabotaging the Disarmament Conference by its hesitant and fluctuating attitude. The opposition manifested evoked a striking statement by the Under-Secretary of State, Earl Stanhope, to the effect that France was not prepared to accept the English disarmament proposals with or without guarantees. The British Government, he said, would have been glad to go a long way to meet other Governments, had there been a chance of acceptance by the latter of their proposals.

A new note was struck in the story of British armament policy by the House of Commons debate of May 18th, which was concerned mainly with the question of the League of Nations and its reform, as well as with the position in regard to sanctions. The then Foreign Secretary Sir John Simon in a long speech described the latest phase of the Disarmament discussions in the spring of 1934, and noted Germany's acceptance of the British Memorandum of January 29th as a particularly helpful contribution, and contrasted it with the negative attitude of France. In succession to Sir John Simon, Mr. Baldwin spoke on the question of sanctions. He said:

"One of the conclusions to which I have been driven as a result of my close study of these questions during the past twelve years is that there is no such thing as a sanction that will work which does mean war. In other words, if we adopt sanctions, we must be ready for war; and, if we adopt them without being ready for war, we are not honest trustees of the nation. . . . Nothing could be a worse guarantee to the world, or a more cruel deception of the people of this country, than to say that they will guarantee peace by arms and then not be ready to do so. If this country is going to enforce a collective guarantee or collective sanctions, it means that they must make this country a great deal stronger than it is today."

That was the key-note for the new political watch-word "Collective Security equals Rearmament." With this for its watch-word, the Conservative Press proceeded in the next few weeks to multiply and magnify its allusions to the coming Armaments Programme, while the three Defence Ministers Lord Londonderry, Lord Hailsham and Sir Bolton Eyres-Monsell made speeches up and down the country to a similar effect to prepare the public for what was to come. Lord Londonderry himself declared without further periphrasis in the House of Lords on June 27th that the Disarmament Conference had failed, and that England must now proceed to rearm in the air. His colleague from the Admiralty on June 23rd made mock of the "dream of international disarmament." These observations gave rise to vigorous criticisms on the part of Liberal and Labour speakers on July 14th; and Sir John Simon and the Lord Privy Seal, Mr. Eden, were at pains to smoothe the ruffled surface of the waters by declarations to the effect that the Government would continue in the future as in the past to do all in its power to rescue the Conference, though it must not lose sight of the consequences of an eventual collapse. They would however in any case wait till the end came. On which Mr. Churchill in his robust manner expressed satisfaction at the prospect of the Conference coming to an end and "passing into history," with the result that it would now be necessary to double the English Air Force.

On July 19th there followed the long awaited announcement in the House of Commons of the new Air armaments programme (the Five Year Plan) by Mr. Baldwin with explanations of the reasons which had led to rearmament on so gigantic a scale.

In the meanwhile the negotiations and exchanges of Notes between Great Britain, Italy and Germany for the rescue of the Disarmament idea—if in no other shape, at any rate in the form of limitation based on an approximation of armaments—were shattered by the French "No" of April 17th; and on June 10th after stormy proceedings in Geneva the Disarmament Conference was duly buried. At the beginning of June the French Foreign Minister Barthou and the French Generalissimo Weygand had paid their visits to London. The visits not unnaturally gave rise to a great deal of comment, the effect of which Sir John Simon in the House of Commons on July 30th—in a speech which, incidentally, embodied a plea on behalf of the Eastern Pact and the entry of Russia into the League—endeavoured to minimise.

The comments which he sought to minimise were by no means however the work of their authors' imaginations; and they were fed by the fact that in his speech on July 30th Mr. Baldwin at times was thinking aloud to such an extent as to invite conjecture as to the substance of the conversations which had taken place between the British and French General Staffs. The warning of the Labour Party, Major Attlee, that his Party, if it came into power, would not recognise any secret agreements had a singular ring.

Baldwin under these circumstances was entitled to say in his explanation of the reasons for the Rearmament Programme that experience showed there was no longer any prospect of early results in the matter of armament limitation.

In reply to a vote of censure moved by Lord Ponsonby against what he described as a policy calculated only to foster new competition in armaments and, as such, to endanger the peace of the world, Lord Londonderry repeated in the House of Lords on July 23rd the old grounds for rearmament. He described again the new American, French, Italian, Russian and Japanese Air armament programmes, and added: "The first four of these countries already have Air Forces which largely exceed our own. The numerical strength of the Air Forces of France and Russia are indeed approximately twice that of the Royal Air Force. No responsible Government with any regard for its overriding duty to ensure by all means in its power the safety of the people of this country could allow our Air Force to remain any longer in a position of such tremendous inferiority."

On July 30th there followed the full-dress debate in the House of Commons on the Five Year Plan, in the course of which the Labour Party moved a vote of censure similar to that debated in the Upper House.

In his great speech in justification of the Government Baldwin began by arguing that, in order to set an example to the other countries, England had postponed the completion of the 1923 Programme in its entirety for ten years; but he added, the rest of the world had not followed her example. He again referred to international obligations, and said that he gathered from the "whispering gallery of Europe" that the English contribution to collective security was thought to be a weak one. He noted the general increase in air armaments and the general tendency towards acceptance of a form of strategy in which the aeroplane was treated as the primary offensive arm. That was the explanation of the fact that France and Italy were increasing the number of their bomber and battle aircraft. If Germany had the right, or seized the right, to rearm, she had every argument in her favour from her defenceless position in the air to try and make herself secure. It was a regrettable circumstance that there was no evidence of any of the nations, who were participants in the Disarmament negotiations or advocates of a Disarmament Convention, themselves ceasing to rearm. If other nations for whatever reason, good or bad, increased their armaments, England must do the same to a certain extent, if her contribution to collective security, and so to the deterrence of aggressors, was to be of any value at all.

The proposals of July 19th were, he contended, a notable advance towards the requisite parity, even though the expenditure figures as they stood were not sufficient for the attainment of that parity—which was the end ultimately in view—within the next five years. No Government dare take the responsibility of leaving the country "in the world as it is today" in a state of defencelessness; and therefore no time was to be lost in bringing the national defences into order.

But there was another argument which figured prominently in Mr. Baldwin's speech. It is an argument which is highly characteristic of the disarmament negotiations, and indeed of all international negotiations. This was his plea for the need of a strong backing with which to bargain. In countering the charge of sabotaging the Disarmament negotiations, Baldwin argued that it might have been possible to influence the course of events at the Conference more effectively, if British armaments had themselves been stronger than they were. The British representatives at Geneva had not always an easy task in making proposals which involved much greater concessions from the more heavily armed nations. They got tired of descanting on their own country's virtue in not having increased her armaments. It was quite possible that the reason why so little was achieved at Geneva was that England had so little to bargain with. Sir John Simon followed up this argument by observing in his speech which followed that of Mr. Baldwin that "It is difficult to carry through an agreement for the reduction of armaments, if you have carried your own disarmament to such a point that you can make no contribution." For these reasons a rearmament programme could not prejudice disarmament agreements, and might possibly assist them.

Thus was launched the new watch-word in the armaments discussion, namely, "Through Rearmament to Disarmament."

It was in this debate that Baldwin let fall his unhappy aphorism that England's frontier lies on the Rhine. His exact words were as follows: "Let us never forget this! Since the day of the air the old frontiers are gone. When you think of the defences of England, you can no longer think of the chalk cliffs of Dover. You think of the Rhine. That is where today our frontier lies." Taken in conjunction with Baldwin's other remarks on the menace to England from the air and the loss of the protection hitherto inherent in her insular position, the meaning of the remark in Baldwin's mouth was no doubt that which was given to it some days later by Lord Hailsham in the House of Lords debate on November 14th, when he replied to a number of vigorous repudiations of the expression. There was no suggestion, he maintained, of England having any particular hereditary enemy on the Continent: the reference was merely to the fact that in view of modern developments it is vitally important for England not to be open to attack from the Low Countries or from any other point within striking distance of the British coast. (As regards the Low Countries, i. e. Belgium and Holland, Lord Hailsham had himself stated in a speech at Torquay on June 15th that England must be able to use them as points d'appui for her air forces.) According to this view therefore Baldwin might just as well have said that England's frontier was on the Seine. But that he could not do—in spite of the French refusal of any further negotiations on disarmament on April 17th and May 30th—in presence of the understanding entered into immediately after that refusal on the occasion of the French diplomatic and military visits to London.

Unfortunately therefore it was not Lord Hailsham who had the last word, when he expressed the hope that this "coined phrase" had been explained satisfactorily once and for all: the last word was with Churchill, when he said that the Baldwinian aphorism would speedily go round the world.

Striking it is to note how in the course of all the subsequent armament discussions France who, with certain other countries, had hitherto always figured as the opponent par excellence of disarmament, now vanishes from the scene, her place in the minds of the speakers being taken—more or less avowedly—by Germany and "the German peril". The new watch-word from now onwards afforded French propaganda a ready opportunity of utilising the "English frontier on the Rhine" motif as on the one hand the explanation of the English Rearmament Programme, and on the other hand—with infinite variations—as an argument in favour of the French policy of encirclement of Germany.

From all these speeches it is clear that in 1934 England was preparing to abandon the traditional basis of her armaments policy. It was equally clear that the rearmament programme was not attributable in any respect to qualitative defects in her air forces, but that it was a question of quantitative strengthening. That was plain from repeated utterances by the responsible Ministers to the effect that England's Air arm might only take fifth place in the list of the air armaments of the Great Powers, but that the quality of this limited English Air Force was regarded by the others as a model for themselves.

But these speeches went also to show that the grounds for the Rearmament were at no time to be sought in Germany's efforts to restore her national defences, but were on the contrary the very same grounds on which Germany was entitled to justify her own rearmament in imitation of the others' example.

With this concentration on Germany begins as from the end of 1934 the second phase of English Rearmament policy. The Guildhall Speech of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald on November 10th was the prelude: the debate in the House of Commons on November 28th was the play: and the English White Paper of March 1st 1935 was the transformation scene.

The famous debate of November 28th took place, it will be remembered, as a result of an amendment moved by Winston Churchill to the Speech from the Throne of November 20th, in which it was asserted that the strength of the national armaments, and the national air armaments in particular, was no longer such as to ensure the peace, security and freedom of the country. Churchill's exposition of the grounds of his thesis was such an outrageous misrepresentation of the German armaments and the menace they constituted for Great Britain and the peace of the world that Baldwin was compelled in his answer to tone them down in no small degree: but what he said contained nevertheless allusions to the "secrecy" of the German armaments and the "dark Continent" which were hardly calculated effectively to enforce his warning against panic.

On March 4th 1935 the British Government brought out the notorious Armaments White Paper of March 1st 1935. It bore the initials of Ramsay MacDonald; but its contents were entirely similar to what Baldwin had said on November 28th. As in the latter's speech, the chief blame for the new problems of Rearmament was put on Germany, who was charged (as Mr. Baldwin had charged her) not merely with rearming on a bigger scale than before, but also with having left the League of Nations and the Disarmament Conference and thereby having brought disarmament to a standstill.

The reception of the White Paper was not, it will be remembered, a good one even in England itself. The comments on the British policy and its latest move, which it evoked from the Opposition both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons on March 11th and 13th respectively, were far from flattering.

"There has never been a wholehearted support of the Disarmament Conference. The declaration of Germany's rights was mentioned, but the failure of any action to implement that declaration was not mentioned. The whole dismal story of the failure of the Disarmament Conference was passed over You cannot cast out Satan by Beelzebub. The suggestion that greater armaments are required in order to carry out our obligations under Locarno and other Treaties was repudiated by the author of the Locarno Treaty, Sir Austen Chamberlain, himself on November 18th 1925 There was a reference to increasing armaments in Germany, Russia, Japan and the United States of America. Why was there no reference to France? If it is true that we, to fulfil our obligations under the League Covenant, the Locarno Treaty and the Air Pact which is proposed, must have a great and powerful Air Force, it follows equally that Germany must do the same That part of the White Paper which is most strongly criticised even by the supporters of the Government is the part in which Germany and Germany's rearmament are represented as the pretext for our rearmament. It cannot be said that German rearmament comes as an unexpected contingency: it was an unavoidable development, which cannot in any circumstances serve as justification for the rearmament of others."

Mr. Baldwin and Lord Hailsham made shift to meet these objections of the Opposition speakers by a certain withdrawal from the one-sided view of the situation and a reference to the gigantic armaments of the U.S.S.R. Baldwin at the end of his speech summed up the arguments he had advanced in the striking and true enough statement that "A country which shows itself unwilling to make what necessary preparations are requisite for its own defence will never have force, moral or material, in this world." He left it to Sir John Simon to make the requisite obeisance to outside opinion with a protestation of British adherence to the League of Nations and the ideal of collective peace and a reassertion of British eagerness to strengthen both. He proceeded in this connection to give Article 8 of the Covenant an interpretation which is unquestionably correct but was never allowed to be mentioned in the course of the Disarmament discussions. He said that, while national armaments are a function of national security, their expansion must be in correct ratio to the national security, and such ratio presupposes allowance for the strength of the armaments of neighbouring Powers. A sentence in Austen Chamberlain's amendment to the effect that general disarmament cannot be obtained by the method of unilateral disarmament reduced Sir John Simon's ratio to a shorter denominator.

No more talk of the French and Italian armaments! And no wonder! In the interval the Anglo-French understanding of February 3rd had been brought to fruition; and on the horizon there was already visible in outline the realisation of France's dream of a "Stresa front" and the inclusion of Italy in the "girdle of security" enclosing Germany.

The single dissonant voice was a notable speech by the Under-Secretary of State, Sir Philip Sassoon, on the Air Estimates on March 20th. He once more included France and Italy in his list of the four countries whose air forces exceeded those of England, and once again warned the public against the serious inferiority of Great Britain as compared to the air forces of France and Russia. He made a further allusion in passing to the proposal, which was again on the tapis, of an Air Pact between the Western Powers in the following brief and pithy words: "Until such time as we can persuade other nations to disarm, a stronger British Air Force will enable us to play our part more effectively in the Air Pact which is even now under discussion by the Western Powers." The said Air Pact, first suggested by Baldwin on March 8th 1934, had silently been lost sight of since then in the course of the armament debates, and was not resuscitated until the London Agreement of February 3rd after an explicit reference to its potentialities by the International Peace Council in a manifesto published on November 8th 1934.

These utterances of Sassoon's were entirely in accordance with the British rearmament policy; and it was no happy prelude therefore to the Western Air Pact negotiations—to which the proposals of the German Memorandum of April 16th 1934 might have lent valuable weight—when the only step Germany could take in answer to the British White Paper (the restoration, namely, of German defence sovereignty on March 16th 1935) was met by the knock-out blows delivered on April 14th and 17th at Stresa and Geneva respectively. The new line of policy was equally apparent from the English Blue Book on the Air Pact negotiations. The Air Pact negotiations, as we have seen, had been driven underground by the British rearmament movement a year and more; and after February 3rd 1935 and the French demand for "All or nothing," followed by the conclusion of the Franco-Russian and Czecho-Russian Pacts of Mutual Assistance and later by the Italo-Abyssinian conflict, they never got going again. But in the British Blue Book the attempt was made to create the impression that Germany was the obstacle when, in the light of the three events named and the resulting European tension, she expressed the view that further negotiation was not at the moment advisable and had best be held over until such time as the position was clearer and the tension less acute. This, without any reference to the fact that French policy with its obsession of Pacts had stipulated, with the consent of Great Britain, that the Air Pact after its conclusion should become part and parcel of the common brew—East European Pact, Danubian Pact and all the others—for cooking in the Geneva kitchen according to the accustomed stew recipes.

On May 21st 1935 the Führer and Chancellor delivered his second great Reichstag speech, in which the grounds for the action taken on March 16th were indicated in detail, and the main lines of German foreign policy were summarised in 13 points which included a fresh offer to reduce and limit armaments and an expression of willingness to accede to the Western Air Pact. The draft of a proposed Pact was forwarded to the British Foreign Office on May 28th. A sigh of relief went round the world. Baldwin himself described the speech in the House of Commons on May 22nd as a ray of light; and The Times on the same day wrote: "For all men and nations of good will this is indeed a supreme moment for achieving a practical limitation of arms."

The good will of Germany and of the German Führer found an echo alas! in England alone. On June 18th an Agreement was signed between the two countries in regard to the naval strengths of both Fleets, which finally laid the spectre of naval rivalry which had poisoned Anglo-German relations before the War, and had begun since March 16th once more to raise its head in England. It was the first Armaments Agreement. It had succeeded at last in breaking the magic circle which hitherto had barred all progress in the matter of armaments!

Alas! It was to be the last—as well as the first Armaments Agreement: for all further proposals of Adolf Hitler were swallowed up in the sandy wastes of Abyssinia, in the Narrows of Suez and Gibraltar and in the waters of the Red and Mediterranean Seas.

The third phase of British Rearmament policy now begins with the intensification of the Italo-Abyssinian conflict and the resulting deterioration in Anglo-Italian relations in view of the English initiative in the voting and enforcement of sanctions at Geneva against Rome. In our three Abyssinian numbers we described the details of this engrossing drama, by the end of which the issue was no longer the fate of the Empire of the Negus, but the position of the British World Empire in Africa and in the Mediterranean, whose interests, as opposed to those of the new Imperium Romanum, coincided so happily with those of the League of Nations.

So we see the British ship of State (after a shift of command, it is true, at the beginning of June from MacDonald-Simon to Baldwin-Hoare) proceed with swelling sails and a strong current of increasing propaganda—not uninfluenced, perhaps, by the famous Peace Ballot conducted by the English League of Nations Union at the beginning of 1935, when millions voted in favour of a national declaration on the League of Nations and the Disarmament question—safe into port in the shape of the November 14th elections. All the well-known catch-words were pressed into the service of the Rearmament programme, and a new one was coined, to suit the palate of the many circles of the British population to whom Fascism and National Socialism are alike distasteful, in the shape of the slogan "Democracies versus Dictatorships." For once an English Election cry with an international outlook! In spite of repeated utterances by Baldwin and other Ministers in a contrary sense, this catch-word has been taken up and used—and still is used—particularly by French propaganda with much zest, the new friend from Moscow being unconcernedly included without fuss in the higher circles where the Democracies do congregate.

On July 11th 1935—Mr. Eden's abortive visit to Mussolini had already taken place in June—the new Foreign Minister Sir Samuel Hoare delivered his first speech as Foreign Minister on British foreign policy in the House of Commons. The greater part of his points might have been made by his French colleague in the French Chamber. From the cornucopia of his ideas Sir Samuel proceeded to produce . . . one and all of the conceptions, so dearly beloved and so ardently ensued in Paris, in regard to London and Stresa, the indivisibility of peace and the much acclaimed collective security. The Air Pact, once the special favourite of England, which only in the preceding February was to have been given priority over all other objects of negotiation, was relegated to a position which, if not secondary to the East European and the Danubian Pacts, was at any rate no more than on an equal footing with them—a position very different to that which it had previously held in British representations; and at the same time Germany was told—two months after the German declaration of readiness to accede to the Pact—that it was up to her to take the first initiative in the matter and to make a new contribution towards the success of the negotiations. A specially warm section of the speech was devoted to the “deep and abiding” friendship with France, “our old and intimate collaborator.” The Naval Agreement with Germany was almost the subject of an apology. It had been the first, and it should be the last, bilateral agreement. A “practical and understanding realism” would in future be shown in relation to Germany.

The whole speech contained not one word in regard to the armament proposals of May 21st. The sole reference to them was to be found at the close of the speech by the Minister for League of Nations Affairs, Mr. Eden, in which he observed in elegiac tones: “The French Government, for whatever reasons, rejected the German offer last year to agree to an air force not exceeding 50 per cent of that of France, and an army at parity with the French at a figure of 300,000. Was not that a basis upon which we should all be most anxious to agree today? There is no policy more costly to the tax-payers and to peace than the policy of missing the bus.”

On September 21st—the Italo-Abyssinian conflict was already verging on war—the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, for the first time raised a warning voice when, speaking at Floors Castle, he said that Great Britain could only fulfil her mission as the peace-maker of Europe, if she was armed and the strength of her armaments was recognised by others.

“We have tried,” he said, “unilateral disarmament in the hope that other countries would follow our example. It has proved to be a complete, a costly, and a dangerous failure. The time has come now when we must face realities, when we must bring our forces up to the minimum required for our own self-respect, when we must recognise that in this workaday world disarmament must follow, and not precede, the establishment of a sense of security.”

“Peace through Rearmament” and “Security first.”

Such was the watch-word with which—in conjunction with all the others—the country went to the polls amid the turmoil of the Elections on November 14th. The drum-fire had had its effect on the British public: the Government were returned by an overwhelming majority; and with flying colours they proceeded to Geneva to take over the command of the International General Staff for Sanctions, there established, in the struggle with Rome.

The subsequent course of British Rearmament was conditioned by the impression created by the sanctions war as it was in the beginning, as it was when in full course, and as it was at the end. The position as it was at the middle of the period is reflected in the new Armaments White Paper of March 3rd 1936.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, speaking on March 6th at Edgbaston said that all other measures were overridden both in importance and in urgency by the programme for the reorganisation of the country's defence forces. It was the biggest, the most far-reaching and the most progressive programme of the kind ever put forward in England.

In the debates in the two Houses of Parliament on March 9th, 10th and 17th it was made perfectly plain that, while the British Government still hoped for an understanding in the matter of armaments, it was essential for the fulfilment of their obligations under the Covenant of the League, as well as in the interest of collective security and for their own defence, that the position in regard to the British armed forces should be overhauled (see Baldwin on March 9th, Chamberlain on March 10th and Sassoon on March 17th).

On May 14th, after Mussolini had in the interval proclaimed the annexation of Abyssinia, Baldwin remarked offhand in the Albert Hall that he put as the first object the safety of his own country and of the Empire and, “next to that or (say) side by side with that,” the peace of Europe and the peace of the world.

There was a great discussion of Rearmament again at the Conservative Party Congress in Margate on October 1st and 2nd, in the course of which the First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Samuel Hoare, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, speaking for Mr. Baldwin, made the following declarations of principle in the light of the lessons of past experience. Hoare said: “The first of these lessons is the futility of one-sided disarmament. The weakness of the British Empire—even the supposed weakness of the British Empire—has been proved by bitter experience to be a disturbing factor in the field of international politics . . . Secondly, we can on no account agree to any disarmament proposals which would stereotype our relative weakness. If, as we all hope, in the future we can arrive at any general limitation of armaments, it must be on the assumption that our programme has been completed and not on the basis of any intermediate status quo.” (These remarks were repeated by the speaker in the House of Commons on November 10th.)

Chamberlain said: “We shall proceed with our plans, whatever the Opposition may say. No one can pretend that we have not given Disarmament a fair chance. But as no one else has followed our example—on the contrary, other nations are all arming on a gigantic scale—we should have failed in our duty to our own people if we had not taken steps to repair our deficiencies with all speed. As to the measure of our rearmament, the Government of the day alone can take the responsibility of fixing it. It is futile and dangerous to attempt to distinguish between the armament necessary for our defence and what is required for the fulfilment of our international obligations.”

In the meanwhile there had ceased to be anything to fear from the side of the Opposition. The Labour Party at its Party Congress in Edinburgh on October 6th fell into line with the Rearmament Front for the strengthening of the League of Nations and the system of collective security, and voted in favour of providing the necessary armed forces to join in the collective security system!

The Rearmament Campaign was won.

In his last Guildhall Speech on November 11th 1936 Baldwin, the unwearied standard-bearer and fighter in the Rearmament campaign, attacked what he called the unintelligible insanity of European rearmament. He could have pointed the moral of that insanity to better effect, had he quoted from an unpublished Memorandum of the War Office, from which he would have seen that in 1932 Germany had indeed an army of 100,000 men, but neither reserves, nor aircraft, nor heavy arms of any kind, and was only waiting until the highly armed Powers should at length make up their mind to fulfil the obligation they assumed in 1919 themselves to disarm.

The German people too, to quote the words of the Labour member of the House of Lords, Lord Strabolgi, is tired of humiliations being put on it here, there and everywhere.

Furthermore, to quote the words of another speaker in the same debate, Lord Halifax, the German people has been undergoing in recent years a necessary and steady process of education on these matters.

And it has followed precisely the same course, under the leadership of Adolf Hitler, as the English people has followed under Baldwin.

And that is

The course which was indicated alike by Honour, Freedom and Security.

The Struggle to Realise and to Assure European Peace

I. Speech delivered by Adolf Hitler, Führer and Chancellor, before the German Reichstag, on January 30th, 1937

Text of the Foreign-Political Declaration

Four years ago, when I was entrusted with the Chancellorship and therewith the leadership of the nation, I took upon myself the bitter duty of restoring the honour of a nation which for fifteen years had been forced to live as a pariah among the other nations of the world. The internal order which we created among the German people offered the conditions necessary to reorganise the army and also made it possible for me to throw off those shackles which we felt to be the deepest disgrace ever branded on a people. Today I proceed to bring to a close with the following few declarations: —

First: The restoration of Germany's equality of rights was an event that concerned Germany alone. It was not the occasion of taking anything from anybody or causing any suffering to anybody.

Second: I now state here that, in accordance with the restoration of equality of rights, I shall divest the German Railways and the Reichsbank of the forms under which they have hitherto functioned and shall place them absolutely under the sovereign control of the Government of the German Reich.

Third: I hereby declare that the section of the Versailles Treaty which deprived our nation of the rights that it shared on an equal footing with other nations and degraded it to the level of an inferior people has thereby found its natural liquidation in virtue of the restoration of equality of status.

Fourth: Above all, I solemnly withdraw the German signature from that declaration which was extracted under duress from a weak government, acting against its better judgement, namely the declaration that Germany was responsible for the war.

The revindication of the honour of the German people, which was expressed outwardly in the restoration of universal military service, the creation of a new air force, the reconstruction of a German navy and the reoccupation of the Rhineland by our troops, was the boldest task that I ever had to face and the most difficult to accomplish.

Today I must humbly thank Providence, whose grace has enabled me, once an unknown soldier in the War, to bring to a successful issue the struggle for the restoration of our honour and rights as a nation.

I regret to say that it was not possible to carry through all the necessary measures by way of negotiation. But at the same time it must be remembered that the honour of a people cannot be bartered away; it can only be taken away. And if it cannot be bartered away it cannot be restored through barter; it must simply be taken back.

That I carried out the measures which were necessary for this purpose without consulting our former enemies in each case, and even without informing them, was due to my conviction that the way in which I chose to act would make it easier for the other side to accept our decisions, for they would have had to accept them in any case. I should like to add here that, as all this has now been accomplished, the so-called period of surprises has come to an end.

As a State which is now on an equal juridical footing with all the other States, Germany is more conscious than ever that she has a European task before her, which is to collaborate loyally in getting rid of those problems that are the cause of anxiety to ourselves and also to the nations.

If I may state my views on those general questions that are of actual importance today, the most effective way of doing so will be to refer to the statements that were recently made by Mr. Eden in the British House of Commons. For those statements also imply the essentials of what must be said regarding Germany's relations with France. At this point I should like to express my sincere thanks for the opportunity which has been given me by the outspoken and noteworthy declarations made by the British Foreign Secretary.

I think I have read those statements carefully and have understood them correctly. Not to linger in a maze of detail, I propose to single out the leading points in Mr. Eden's speech, so as to clarify or answer them from my side.

In so doing, I shall first try to correct what seems to me to be a most regrettable error, the assumption namely that somehow or other Germany wishes to isolate herself and to allow the events which happen in the rest of the world to pass by without participating in them, or that she does not wish to take any account whatsoever of the general necessities of the time.

What are the grounds for the assumption that Germany wants to pursue a policy of isolation? If this assumption in regard to German isolation be a conclusion which must necessarily be drawn from what are presumed to be Germany's intentions, then let me say this: —

I do not believe at all that a State could ever mean to declare itself intentionally disinterested in the political events taking place throughout the rest of the world, especially when this world is so small as Europe is at the present day. I think that, if a State should really find it necessary to take refuge in such an attitude, then the most that can be said is that it has been forced to do so under the coercion of a foreign will imposed upon it. Now, in the first place, I should like to assure Mr. Eden that we Germans do not in the least want to be isolated and that we do not at all feel ourselves isolated.

During recent years Germany has entered into quite a number of political agreements with other States. She has resumed former agreements and improved them. And I may say that she has established close friendly relations with a number of States. Our relations with most of the European States are normal from our standpoint and we are on terms of close friendship with quite a number. Among all those diplomatic connections I would give a special place in the foreground to those excellent relations which we have with those States that were liberated from sufferings similar to those we had to endure and have consequently arrived at similar decisions.

Through a number of treaties which we have made, we have relieved many strained relations and thereby made a substantial contribution towards an improvement in European conditions. I need remind you only of our agreement with Poland, which has turned out advantageous for both countries, our agreement with Austria and the excellent and close relations which we have established with Italy. Further, I may refer to our friendly relations with Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, Portugal, Spain etc. Finally, I may mention our cordial relations with a whole series of nations outside of Europe.

The agreement which Germany has made with Japan for combating the movement directed by the Comintern is a vital proof of how little the German Government thinks of isolating itself and how little we feel ourselves actually isolated. Furthermore, I have on several occasions declared that it is our wish and hope to arrive at good cordial relations with all our neighbours.

Germany has steadily given its assurance, and I solemnly repeat this assurance here, that between ourselves and France, for example, there are no grounds for quarrel that are humanly thinkable. Furthermore, the German Government has assured Belgium and Holland that it is ready to recognise and guarantee these States as neutral regions in perpetuity.

In view of the declarations which we have made in the past and in view of the existing state of affairs, I cannot quite see why Germany should consider herself isolated or why we should pursue a policy of isolation. From the economic standpoint there are no grounds for asserting that Germany is withdrawing from international cooperation. The contrary is the truth. On looking over the speeches which several statesmen have made within the last few months, I find that they might easily give rise to the impression that the whole world is waiting to shower economic favours on Germany but that we, who are represented as obstinately clinging to a policy of isolation, do not wish to partake of those favours. To place this whole matter in its true light, I should like to call attention to the following bare facts:—

1. For many years the German people have been trying to make better commercial treaties with their neighbours and thus to bring about a more active exchange of goods. And these efforts have not been in vain; for, as a matter of fact, German foreign trade has increased since 1932, both in volume and in value. This is the clearest refutation of the assertion that Germany is pursuing a policy of economic isolation.

2. I do not believe however that there can be a lasting economic collaboration among the nations on any other basis than that of a mutual exchange of commercial wares and industrial products. Credit manipulation may perhaps have a temporary effect, but in the long run economic international relations will be decisively influenced by the volume of mutual exchange of goods. The state of affairs at the present moment is not such that the outside world would be able to place huge orders with us, or offer prospects of an increase in the exchange of goods, if we were to fulfil I know not what extraordinary conditions. Matters should not be made more complicated than they already are. If international commerce is ailing, that is not due to Germany's refusal to assist it, but is due to the fact that disorder has invaded the industrial life of the various nations and has influenced their relations with one another. But Germany cannot be blamed for these two things, and especially not National Socialist Germany. When we assumed power, the world economic crisis was worse than it is today.

I fear however that I must interpret Mr. Eden's words as meaning that in the carrying out of the four years plan he sees an element of refusal on Germany's side to participate in international collaboration. Therefore I wish it to be clearly understood that our decision to carry out this plan is unalterable. The reasons which led to that decision were inexorable. And since then I have not been able to discover anything whatsoever that might induce us to discontinue the four years plan.

I shall take only one practical example. In carrying out the four years plan our synthetic production of rubber and petrol will necessitate an annual increase in our consumption of coal by a margin of something between 20 and 30 million tons. This means that an extra quota of thousands of coal miners are assured of employment for the rest of their active lives. I must really take the liberty of asking this question: Supposing we abandon the German four years plan, then what statesman can guarantee me some economic equivalent or other, outside of the Reich, for these thirty million tons of coal?

I want bread and work for my people. And certainly I do not wish to have it through the operation of temporary credit guarantees, but through solid and permanent labour, the products of which I can either exchange for foreign goods or for domestic goods in our internal commercial circulation.

If by some manipulation or other Germany were to throw these 20 or 30 million tons of coal annually on the international market for the future, the result would be that the coal exports of other countries would have to decrease. I do not know if a British statesman, for example, could face such a contingency without realising how serious it would be for his own nation. And yet that is the state of affairs.

Germany has an enormous number of men who not only want to work but also to eat. And the standard of living among our people is high. I cannot build the future of the German nation on the assurances of a foreign statesman or on any international help, but only on the real basis of a steady production, for which I must find a market at home or abroad. Perhaps my scepticism in these matters leads me to differ from the British Foreign Secretary in regard to the optimistic tone of his statements.

I mean this, that if Europe does not awaken to the danger of the Bolshevik infection, I fear international commerce will not increase but decrease, despite all the good intentions of individual statesmen. For this commerce is based not only on the undisturbed and guaranteed stability of production in one individual nation but also on the production of all the nations together. One of the first things which is clear in this matter is that every Bolshevik disturbance must necessarily lead to a more or less permanent destruction of orderly production. Therefore my opinion about the future of Europe is, I am sorry to say, not so optimistic as Mr. Eden's. I am the responsible leader of the German people and must safeguard its interests in this world as well as I can. And therefore I am bound to judge things objectively as I see them.

I should not be acquitted before the bar of our history if I neglected something—no matter on what grounds—which is necessary to maintain the existence of this people. I am pleased, and we are all pleased, at every increase that takes place in our foreign trade. But in view of the obscure political situation I shall not neglect anything that is necessary to guarantee the existence of the German people, although other nations may become the victims of the Bolshevik infection. And I must also repudiate the suggestion that this view is the outcome of mere fancy. For the following is certainly true. The British Foreign Secretary opens out theoretical prospects of existence to us, whereas in reality what is happening is totally different. The revolutionizing of Spain, for instance, has driven out 15,000 Germans from that country and has seriously injured our trade. Should this revolutionizing of Spain spread to other European countries, then these damages would not be lessened but increased.

I also am a responsible statesman and I must take such possibilities into account. Therefore it is my unalterable determination so to organize German labour that it will guarantee the maintenance of my people. Mr. Eden may rest assured that we shall utilize every possibility offered us of strengthening our economic relations with other nations, but also that we shall avail ourselves of every possibility to improve and enrich the circulation of our own internal trade.

I must ask also whether the grounds for assuming that Germany is pursuing a policy of isolation are to be found in the fact that we have left the League of Nations. If such be the grounds, then I would point out that the Geneva League has never been a real League of peoples. A number of great nations do not belong to it or have left it. And nobody has on this account asserted that they were following a policy of isolation.

I think therefore that on this point Mr. Eden misunderstands our intentions and views. For nothing is farther from our wishes than to break off or weaken our political or economic relations with other nations. The contrary is the truth. I have already tried to contribute towards bringing about a good understanding in Europe and I have often given, especially to the British people and their Government, assurance of how ardently we wish for a sincere and cordial cooperation with them.

I admit that on one point there is a wide difference between the views of the British Foreign Secretary and our views; and here it seems to me there is a gap which cannot be filled up.

Mr. Eden declares that under no circumstances does the British Government wish to see Europe torn into two halves. Unfortunately this desire for unity has not in the past been either voiced or listened to. And now the desire is an illusion. For the fact is that the division into two halves, not only of Europe but also of the whole world, is an accomplished fact.

It is to be regretted that the British Government did not at an earlier date adopt its present attitude that under all circumstances a division of Europe must be avoided; for then the Treaty of Versailles would not have been entered into. This Treaty brought in the first division of Europe, namely a division of the nations into victors on the one side and vanquished on the other, the latter nations being outlawed. Through this division of Europe nobody suffered more than the German people. That this division was wiped out, so far as concerns Germany, is essentially due to the National Socialist Revolution; and for that I think I can take some credit to myself!

The second division has been brought about by the proclamation of the Bolshevik doctrine, an integral feature of which is that they do not confine it to one nation but try to impose it on all the nations.

Here it is not a question of a special form of national life in Russia but of the Bolshevik demand for a world revolution. If Mr. Eden does not look at Bolshevism as we look at it, that may have something to do with the position of Great Britain and also with some happenings that are unknown to us. But I believe that nobody will question the sincerity of our opinions on this matter, for they are not based merely on abstract theory. For Mr. Eden Bolshevism is perhaps a thing which has its seat in Moscow, but for us in Germany this Bolshevism is a pestilence against which we have had to struggle at the cost of much bloodshed. It is a pestilence which tried to turn our country into the same kind of desert as is now to be seen in Spain; for the habit of murdering hostages began here, in the form in which we now see it in Spain. National Socialism did not try to come to grips with Bolshevism in Russia, but the Jewish international Bolsheviks in Moscow have tried to introduce their system into Germany and are still trying to do so. Against this attempt we have waged a bitter struggle, not only in defence of our own civilization but in defence of European civilization as a whole.

If in January and February of the year 1933, when the last decisive struggle against this barbarism was being fought out in Germany, Germany had been defeated in that struggle and the Bolshevik field of destruction and death had extended over Central Europe, then perhaps a different opinion would have arisen on the banks of the Thames as to the nature of this terrible menace to humanity. For since it is said that England must be defended on the frontier of the Rhine, she would then have found herself in close contact with that harmless democratic world of Moscow, whose innocence they are always trying to impress upon us. Here I should like to state the following once again.

The teaching of Bolshevism is that there must be a world revolution, which would mean world-destruction. If such a doctrine were accepted and given equal rights with other teachings in Europe, this would mean that Europe would be delivered over to it. If other nations want to be on good terms with this peril, that does not affect Germany's position. As far as Germany itself is concerned, let there be no doubts on the following points:—

1. We look on Bolshevism as a world peril for which there must be no toleration.
2. We use every means in our power to keep this peril away from our people.
3. And we are trying to make the German people immune to this peril as far as possible.

It is in accordance with this attitude of ours that we should avoid close contact with the carriers of these poisonous bacilli. And that is also the reason why we do not want to have any closer relations with them beyond the necessary political and commercial relations; for if we went beyond these, we might thereby run the risk of closing the eyes of our people to the danger itself.

I consider Bolshevism the most malignant poison that can be given to a people. And therefore I do not want my own people to come into contact with this teaching. As a citizen of this nation I myself shall not do what I should have to condemn my fellow-citizens for doing. I demand from every German workman that he shall not have any relations with these international mischief-makers, and he shall never see me clinking glasses or rubbing shoulders with them. Moreover, any further treaty connections with the present Bolshevik Russia would be completely worthless for us. It is out of the question to think National Socialist Germany could ever be bound to protect Bolshevism or that we, on our side, could ever agree to accept the assistance of a Bolshevik State. For I fear that the moment any nation agreed to accept such assistance, it would thereby seal its own doom.

I must also say here that I do not accept the opinion which holds that in the moment of peril the League of Nations could come to the rescue of the member States and hold them up by the arms, as it were. No, I don't believe that. Mr. Eden stated in his last address that deeds and not speeches are what matters. On that point I should like to call attention to the fact that up to now the outstanding feature of the League of Nations has been talk rather than action.

There was one exception and in that case it would probably have been better to have been content with talk. In this one case, as might have been foreseen, action was fruitless.

Hence, just as I have been forced by economic circumstances to depend on our own resources principally for the maintenance of my people, so also I have been forced in the political sphere. And we ourselves are not to blame for that.

Three times I have made concrete offers for armament restriction or at least armament limitation. These offers were rejected. In this connection I may recall the fact that the greatest offer which I then made was that Germany and France together should reduce their standing armies to 300,000 men; that Germany, Great Britain and France, should bring down their air force to parity and that Germany and Great Britain should conclude a naval agreement. Only the last offer was accepted and it was the only contribution in the world to a real limitation of armaments.

The other German proposals were either flatly refused or were answered by the conclusion of those alliances which gave Central Europe to Soviet Russia as the field of play for its gigantic forces. Mr. Eden speaks of German armaments and expects a limitation of these armaments. We ourselves proposed this limitation long ago. But it had no effect because, instead of accepting our proposal, treaties were made whereby the greatest military power in the world was, according to the terms of the treaties and in fact, introduced into Central Europe. In speaking of armaments it would be well to mention in the first instance the armaments possessed by the Power which sets the standard for the armaments of all others.

Mr. Eden believes that in the future all States should possess only the armament which is necessary for their defence. I do not know whether and how far Mr. Eden has sounded Moscow on the question of carrying that excellent idea into effect, and I do not know what assurances they have given from that quarter. I think however that I ought to put forward one point in this connection. It is quite clear that the measure of a country's defensive armament should be in proportion to the dangers which threaten that country. Each nation has the right to judge this for itself, and it alone has the right. If therefore Great Britain today decides for herself on the extent of her armaments, everybody in Germany will understand her action; for we can only think of London alone as being competent to decide on what is necessary for the protection of the British Empire. On the other hand I should like to insist that the estimate of our protective needs, and thus of the armament that is necessary for the defence of our people, is within our own competency and can be decided only in Berlin.

I believe that the general recognition of these principles will not render conditions more difficult but will help to release tension. Germany at any rate is pleased at having found friends in Italy and Japan who hold the same views as ourselves; and we should be still more pleased if these convictions were widespread in Europe. Therefore nobody welcomed more cordially than we did the manifest lessening of tension in the Mediterranean, brought about by the Anglo-Italian agreement. We believe that this will first of all lead to an understanding which may put a stop to, or at least limit, the catastrophe from which unhappy Spain is suffering. Germany has no interests in that country except the care of those commercial relations which Mr. Eden himself declares to be so important and useful. An attempt has been made to connect Germany's sympathy for Nationalist Spain with some sort of colonial claims.

Germany has no colonial claims against countries which have taken no colonies from her. Germany has suffered so much from Bolshevism herself that she would never take advantage of another unfortunate people in the same plight to extort concessions now or for the future. Our sympathies with General Franco and his Government are in the first place of a general nature and, secondly, they arise from a hope that the consolidation of a real National Spain may lead to a strengthening of economic possibilities in Europe. We are ready to do everything which in any way may contribute towards the restoration of order in Spain.

But I think that the following considerations should not be left out of account.

During the last hundred years a number of new nations have been created in Europe which formerly, because of their disunion and weakness, were of only small economic importance and of no political importance at all. Through the establishment of these new States new tensions have naturally arisen. True statesmanship however must face realities and not shirk them. The Italian nation and the new Italian State are realities. The German nation and the German Reich are likewise realities. And for my own fellow-citizens I should like to state that the Polish nation and the Polish State have also become realities. Also in the Balkans nations have reawakened and have built up their own States. The people who belong to those States want to live and they will live. The unreasonable division of the world into nations that have and nations that have not will not remove or solve that problem, no more than the internal social problems of the nations can be solved through more or less clever phrases.

For thousands of years the nations asserted their vital claims by the use of power. If in our time some other institution is to take the place of this power for the purpose of regulating relations between the peoples, then it must take account of natural vital claims and act accordingly. If it is the task of the League of Nations only to guarantee the existing state of the world and to safeguard it for all time, then we might just as well entrust it with the task of regulating the ebb and flow of the tides or directing the Gulf Stream into a definite course for the future.

But the League of Nations will not be able to do the one or the other. The continuance of its existence will in the long run depend on the extent to which it realises that the necessary reforms which concern international relations must be carefully considered and put into practice.

The German people once built up a colonial Empire without robbing anyone and without violating any treaty. And they did so without any war. That colonial Empire was taken away from us. And the grounds on which it was sought to excuse this act are not tenable.

First: It was said that the natives did not want to belong to Germany. Who asked them if they wished to belong to some other Power? And when were these natives ever asked if they had been contented with the Power that formerly ruled them?

Second: It is stated that the colonies were not administered properly by the Germans.

Now, Germany had these colonies only for a few decades. Great sacrifices were made in building them up and they were in a process of development which would have led to quite different results than in 1914. But anyhow the colonies had been so developed by us that other people considered it worth while to engage in a sanguinary struggle for the purpose of taking them from us.

Third: It is said that they are of no real value.

If that is the case, then they can be of no value to other States also. And so it is difficult to see why they keep them.

Moreover, Germany has never demanded colonies for military purposes, but exclusively for economic purposes. It is obvious that in times of general prosperity the value of certain territories may decrease; but it is just as evident that in times of distress such value increases. Today Germany lives in a time of difficult struggle for foodstuffs and raw materials. Sufficient imports are conceivable only if there is a continued and lasting increase in our exports. Therefore, as a matter of course, our demand for colonies for our densely populated country will be put forward again and again.

In concluding my remarks on this subject I should like to note a few points concerning the possible ways of promoting a general pacification of Europe, which might also be extended outside Europe.

1. It is in the interests of all nations that the individual countries should possess internally stable and orderly political and economic conditions. They are the most important conditions for lasting and solid economic and political relations between the peoples.

2. The vital interests of the different peoples must be frankly recognised. Mutual respect for these vital interests alone can lead to the appeasement of the essential needs of the nations.

3. The League of Nations, to be effective, must be reformed, and must become an organ of the evolutionary concept, and must not remain an organ of inactivity.

4. The relations of the people towards one another can only be regulated and solved on a basis of mutual respect and absolute equality.

5. It is impossible to make one nation or another responsible for armaments or for limitation of armaments, but it is necessary to see this problem as it really is.

6. It is impossible to maintain peace among the nations so long as an international irresponsible clique can continue their agitation unchecked.

A few weeks ago we saw how an organised band of international war mongers spread a mass of lies which almost succeeded in raising mistrust between two nations and might easily have led to worse consequences than actually followed.

I greatly regret that the British Foreign Secretary did not categorically state that there was not one word of truth in those calumnies about Morocco which had been spread by these international war mongers. Thanks to the loyalty of a foreign diplomat and his Government, it was possible to clear up this extraordinary situation immediately. Supposing another case arose in which it turned out impossible to establish the truth so readily, what then would happen?

7. It has been proved that European problems can be solved properly only within certain limits. Germany is hoping to have close and friendly relations with Italy. May we succeed in paving the way for such relations with other European countries! The German Reich will watch over its security and honour with its strong army. On the other hand, convinced that there can be no greater treasure for Europe than peace, it will always be a reasonable supporter of those European ideals of peace and will be always conscious of its responsibilities.

8. It will be profitable to European peace as a whole if mutual consideration is always shown for the justified feeling of national honour among those nationalities who are forced to live as a minority within other nations.

This would lead to a decisive lessening of tension between the nations who are forced to live side by side, and whose State-frontiers are not identical with the ethnical frontiers.

In concluding these remarks I should like to deal with the document which the British Government addressed to the German Government on the occasion of the occupation of the Rhineland.

I should like first to state that we believe and are convinced that the British Government at that time did everything to avoid an increase of tension in the European crisis, and that the document in question owes its origin entirely to the desire to make a contribution towards disentangling the situation of those days.

Nevertheless, it was not possible for the German Government, for reasons which the Government of Great Britain will appreciate, to reply to those questions.

We preferred to settle some of those questions in the most natural way by the practical building up of our relations with our neighbours, and I should like to state that, complete German sovereignty and equality having now been restored, Germany will never sign a treaty which is in any way incompatible with her honour—with the honour of the nation and of the Government which represents it—or which otherwise is incompatible with Germany's vital interests and therefore in the long run cannot be kept.

I believe that this statement will be understood by all. Moreover, with all my heart I hope that the intelligence and goodwill of responsible European Governments will succeed, despite all opposition, in preserving peace for Europe. Peace is our dearest treasure.

Whatever contributions Germany can make towards preserving it, these she will make.

II. The Attitude of England and of France

From the speech delivered by Mr. Eden, British Foreign Secretary, in the House of Commons, on January 19th, 1937

I should like now to say a few words on the general international situation. I crave the attention of the House because what I have to say is, perhaps, of rather more gravity than what is ordinarily said by a Foreign Secretary in the course of a debate. I am leaving to-morrow for Geneva to attend one of the three regular meetings of the Council. We shall there be confronted with a formidable agenda, which is in itself an indication of the important part, whatever its critics may say, that the League plays in international affairs. It will be our objective to try to emphasize and widen that part.

But before leaving for that session there are certain remarks that I want to address to the House. In recent speeches I have endeavoured both in the House and in the country to outline the objectives of our foreign policy at this time and the means by which those objectives might be realized. I am not going to attempt to repeat those speeches, yet in the first speech made in the New Year there are certain factors that we have to face. His Majesty's Government are at present engaged in the active prosecution of the re-equipment of their three fighting Services. Though we are convinced that this is an indispensable means to our objective, it is not our objective. This remains, as I have previously stated, the negotiation of a European settlement and the strengthening of the authority of the League of Nations. We are prepared to cooperate in the common work of political appeasement and economic cooperation, and if this work is to succeed it needs the collaboration of all. If that collaboration is forthcoming there cannot be any doubt in the minds of anyone in the House or elsewhere that we can create a better, saner, and more prosperous Europe in a world of peace.

How is that to be done? Not only must the world reduce its expenditure on armaments because it is already lowering its standard of life, but it has to learn the ways of economic cooperation so that the standard of life can be raised. Let us never forget that our objective in this country must be the prosperity of all, by which I mean the raising of the standard of life in the countries in which it is to-day low as well as its further improvement where it is to-day comparatively high.

We are willing to help towards a further advance along the line of increased economic opportunity, but this should be in our view on one condition. Economic collaboration and political appeasement must go hand in hand. If economic and financial accomodation merely result in more armaments and more political disturbance the cause of peace will be hindered rather than helped. On the other hand, a new and freer economic and financial collaboration based upon solid and wellconceived political undertakings will be a powerful aid towards the establishment of a unity of purpose in Europe. (Cheers.) Ultimately, and fundamentally, the objects of all honest political endeavour in whatever country must be the raising of the standard of life. We know well enough from the resources of science to-day that that can be done if it is undertaken in an atmosphere of peace and mutual confidence.

In engaging upon this task there are certain things which we do not accept. We do not accept that the alternative for Europe lies between dictatorship of the Right and the Left. (Cheers.) We do not accept—and let me make this quite clear—that democracies are the breeding-ground for Communism. We regard them rather as its antidote. We are not content to see Europe arming feverishly under the contending standards of rival ideologies. There is a better way. We know it, and we wish to enter upon it. And so I must close this review with a few words about Germany.

The future of Germany and the part she is to play in Europe is to-day the main preoccupation of all Europe. Here is a great nation of 65,000,000 people, in the very centre of our Continent, which has exalted race and nationalism into a creed which is practised with the same fervour as it is preached. All the world is asking at this present time whether these doctrines are to lead Germany, whither they are to lead all of us. Are they to restore the position of a great Power in the centre of Europe, enjoying the respect of other Powers both great and small, and using the manifold gifts of her people to restore confidence and prosperity to a world heartily sick of feuds and antagonisms, and ardently desiring a return to normal conditions of work and partnership; or are they to lead her to a sharpening of international antagonisms and to a policy of ever greater economic isolation?

Europe is to-day seriously asking herself what are the answers to these questions, for Europe cannot go on drifting to a more and more uncertain future. She cannot be torn between acute national rivalries and violently opposed ideologies without bearing scars which will last for a generation. Germany has it in her power to influence a choice which will decide not only her fate but that of Europe. If she chooses cooperation with other nations, full and equal cooperation, there is nobody in this country who will not assist wholeheartedly to remove misunderstandings and to make the way smooth for peace and prosperity. But it is idle to imagine that we can cure the evils from which we are suffering by mere palliatives; no mere local remedies will suffice. There must be no reserve or evasion on the part of any nation, whatever its ideology, whatever form of government it prefers for itself, in its cooperation with others and abandoning any form of interference in the affairs of others.

So we cannot cure the world by pacts or treaties. We cannot cure it by political creeds, no matter what they be. We cannot cure it by speeches, however lofty and peace-breathing they may be. There must be the will to cooperate which is unmistakable. That will can manifest itself in certain very definite ways—by abandoning the doctrine of national exclusiveness and accepting every European State as a potential partner in a general settlement; by bringing armaments down to a level sufficient for the essential needs of defence and no more; and by accepting such international machinery for the settlement of disputes as will make the League of Nations a benefit to all and servitude to none.

These things must be stated clearly at this time, at the beginning of a new year. We ourselves have no greater desire than to cooperate fully with others and herein we make no exception. We shall respond fully to the same desire, wherever it manifests itself, and we shall work for the greatest possible solidarity in the belief that, in their hearts, that is what the vast majority of people in every nation ardently desire.

From the speech delivered by Monsieur Blum, French Minister President, at Lyons on January 24th

I now come to the portion of my speech which, I am well aware, is anticipated on all sides with the keenest interest.

According to the Paris press all the newspapers in Europe and in the world have vied with each other in asseverating that on January the 24th, at Lyons, I would deal with the relations between France and Germany. I will speak on this subject, therefore, since the international press has so decided. If I were now to be silent on the matter that would also be a manner of speaking.

In the first place I would like to discuss before you the meaning of an expression that is frequently used, though not without a certain inadvertence. What does "direct talk" with Germany really mean? We are always having "direct discussions" with Germany through its Ambassador and ours, by our ministers getting into touch with each other when a fortunate chance brings them together. In the course of these discussions we consider that there is no subject that has to be avoided. We have always been and still are always ready to make the most earnest and unreserved efforts not only to deal with the current questions that arise between two neighbouring countries, but also to enter with every frankness into the general problems presented by the political life of the two great states. Direct talks are held, therefore, but I fear that in reality something else is meant when "direct talk" is referred to. "Direct talk" signifies, in the view of people who take special pleasure in the use of this expression, most often "Special settlement". They mean by this that a firm understanding could be arrived at between Germany and France after a discussion in which only the two take part, and with which other powers have no concern. It is obvious that this view is supported by the method represented and applied by Chancellor Hitler. This method favours the conclusion of separate bilateral treaties between one State and every single neighbouring State or State in which it is interested, and which intentionally keeps these other States separate from each other both in the negotiations and in their results.

This method is not advocated or applied by the French Government, and in recalling this fact I do not wish to pronounce a theoretical world judgment. I believe that I am doing justice to the reality when I declare that we do not wish to detach French security from European peace. And as a matter of fact we do not wish this because we simply cannot do it. We are convinced that special obligations towards France would not guarantee security, and this conviction finds expression in the formula of an "indivisible peace" that is so often wrongly understood. —

We cannot continue to be disinterested onlookers in Europe. We are members of the League of Nations, loyal to its principles and its statutes. We have made friendships, to which we adhere absolutely firmly. We have undertaken obligations, which we fulfil loyally to the utmost extent. Our aim is, to repeat the expression of the London Declaration of July, 1936, the complete settlement of the European problems. We have proved that in order to reach such a settlement we were prepared to make the most unreserved and the most unselfish, I might almost say, the most expedient contribution. It is, however, only in the hope of achieving a total settlement or within the scope of such a settlement that we strive for the solution of the German—French problem.

I believe further that this settlement is possible, if all the nations of Europe countenance it with equal goodwill. I believe, however, as Eden also said in the House of Commons on Tuesday, that at the present moment this possibility depends chiefly on Germany, and on this point I wish to speak with every possible candour. At the present time the whole organising talent and the whole power of its national will is being directed by the German Reich to the task of overcoming grave economic difficulties. The idea of a barter business has, therefore, grown spontaneously in many minds, of an arrangement whereby Germany would obtain economic help that it would compensate with a gratifying participation in a peaceable settlement of the European situation. I should not like to take that attitude. I do not believe that we should propose anything to Germany that would resemble bargaining. Our feeling of national dignity is too deeply seated, and we are too firmly determined, if the necessity should arise, to ensure it respect, not on our part to respect the dignity of other nations. We are still less disposed to entertain the idea, which is equally false and dangerous, that the aggravation of Germany's economic difficulties may one day compel that country to seek help and to submit to conditions. We take very good care, finally, not to doubt the will to preserve peace to which Chancellor Hitler has given expression on ceremonious occasions. Should agreements be arrived at one day, they can and may be concluded only in the spirit of confidence and on the basis of equality.

Now that this has been said there is for the future something like an obvious truth, which everybody must recognise. How in the present state of Europe, when for long months past the sensitiveness of the nations has been exposed to violent periodical shocks, and when competitive arming proceeds at a much more rapid pace than before the world war, can anyone imagine an economic agreement independent of a political settlement? What nation would be prepared to collaborate with another, whether by granting credits or by improving its provision of raw material, or by giving facilities in questions of population and colonisation, or any other help, if it should in any sense fear that the help it renders could one day be turned against itself, that the credits, the raw material, and the undertakings established abroad could serve to add to a power and to increase a military "potential" whose victims it or its friends would become? There is thus a necessary connection, an inseparable association between economic collaboration on the one hand and the organising of peace and the cessation of competitive arming on the other hand. In order to work together one must be able to work in peace.

This connection is just as evident when the question is put from the other side. I am firmly convinced that the excess of armaments in Europe will compel a re-examination of the whole question of armaments. An agreement to restrict and gradually to reduce armaments must of necessity be an essential part of a general settlement of the European problems. The war material industry holds such a position today, however, in the production of the industrial power that it would probably be impossible to ordain a stoppage at a moment's notice without exposing those powers to the danger of serious internal crises. It is perhaps no longer possible to contemplate an international agreement of a political nature concerning disarmament without concluding in connection with it or supplementary to it an economic agreement that would create new possibilities of activity for the industries and their workmen.

By this means the questions of the provision for and of the execution of great European, colonial, and international operations would naturally arise, that is to say, questions of material and technical collaboration, and also questions of credit, or financial co-operation. I concur here with some suggestions in the plan put forward by the International Labour Office at the commencement of the crisis in accord with the Syndicalistic organisations, and I also come back to the ideal that my friends and I presented after the war for the solution of the Reparations problem.

My conclusions are, therefore, a close association of the German—French problem with the whole European problem, and the consequent connection of the economic collaboration with the political settlement and the organisation of peace. I know that they are banal, but I warned you to expect disappointments. I hardly need add that the French Government is prepared today, and will be ready tomorrow to manifest by deeds its fervent desire to restore real security to Europe and to the world, that is to say, the deep inner feeling that the world has again become peaceful, that fears no longer weigh on it, and that it has found again peace in which to work and sleep. Eden said in the speech to which I have frequently referred, and with which I am in all senses fully in accord: "We cannot heal the world with pacts or treaties, and also not with speeches, however lofty and peaceable they may be; there must be a desire for collaboration that is unmistakable."

This desire is present in France in complete unanimity. It is so evident, and has manifested itself so often that nobody in the world thinks of doubting it. When, as we hope, Germany also declares her desire to collaborate we shall be ready to work with her as with all other nations without any reservation and without any lack of candour. We shall allow no one to outdo us in the mutual endeavour, and we can think of nothing more fortunate for Europe than the noble rivalry in the cause of peace that will then ensue. Our standpoint is that what perhaps the country thanks us most for today is our persistent and unswerving endeavour to preserve indivisible peace.

From the speech delivered by Monsieur Delbos, French Minister for Foreign Affairs, at Châteauroux, on January 31st, 1937

At the time when we were endeavouring to prevent the war in Spain from spreading we were making efforts, in spite of the difficulties presenting themselves, which were often of a tragic nature, to carry on the organisation of European peace. Loyal united with the League of Nations as we are, we praised its methods of security, and shall continue to defend the strengthening of those methods. In this we have set a good example. At the last meeting of the Council we reached a settlement of this controversy, from which it was believed that difficulties would arise, that satisfied all concerned. In this matter France and Turkey showed in collaboration with the statesmen then in Geneva the efficacy of the League of Nations.

We feel that we have strengthened general peace and at the same time French security by tightening the bonds that unite us with other peace-loving powers. Our close friendship with England, the stability of our agreements with the Little Entente, with Poland and with the Soviet Union are actual guarantees in our fight against war, while we have furthermore the benefit of the moral support of a number of other nations, in the very first place of the great American democracy, that are united with us in the pursuit of a common ideal.

We do not think of excluding anybody, or of refusing our friendship to anyone whatever. On the contrary, our desire is to prevent the formation of competing blocks and of coalitions working against one another, whatever may be the ideas and interests they represent and advocate. Our agreements, that are of a strictly defensive nature, and our watchful care for our national defences are merely guarantees and precautionary measures against a sudden tempest. I know that all nations may have the same feeling, and I shall never doubt that it is as sincere in all those cases as is ours.

I prefer, therefore, to hold fast to the positive, human, and fruitful side of the peace organisation, and to help onwards the extension of the efforts of the wide circle of friends, that is still open, to universality. By working for the restoration of international trade and commerce, as we do, by concluding commercial, financial, and customs treaties, by taking part in every exchange of ideas in the international domain, and by submitting all disputes to a court of arbitration the proof can be daily and effectively presented that there is room in the world for all nations possessed of good will, and that recourse to the force of arms is at the same time a miscalculation and a crime. Who among those who hold in their hands the fate of nations has the right to hesitate when he is called upon to choose between the destruction of victors as well as of the vanquished and the benefits of peaceable collaboration?

For this reason I cast no doubts on the sincerity of the solemn declarations that have come to us from beyond the Alps and from the other side of the Rhine. Only yesterday Chancellor Hitler confirmed his desire to maintain peace. The differences of opinion concern, therefore, not the aim but the methods, and the methods must be dealt with, diversified and even antithetical as they so often are. My remarks are not to be taken as a reply to yesterday's speech, for I have not yet had the leisure to devote to it the earnest study and reflection that it deserves, and in foreign politics one must guard against improvisations. I will only formulate a few impressions. In the first place, I am glad to note that Hitler's speech contained no sort of attack on France, and that the Chancellor declared that between the Germans and us there could be no humanly possible matter of dispute. That is our view also, and our wish. But we and the Germans are not alone in the world, and the maintenance of peace is subject to general rules that stretch far over both of us. Among these rules we include, as far as we are concerned, respect for treaties. When the Chancellor recalls former breaches of treaties, and when, on his own initiative, he adds other declarations to this recollection he does not strengthen the confidence that must be placed in signatures. He unquestionably begins a new page when he declares himself to be ready to collaborate loyally in the future, but international collaboration includes negotiations and agreements, which threaten to become very difficult when he declares for Germany in view of her armaments—which are really of a defensive nature—that everybody is the sole judge of what he shall do.

I gladly admit, however, that on the other hand there are passages in the speech which even in view of this question of disarmament are more positive when the Chancellor rightly states that this question must be treated as a whole. This is what we think when we demand the summoning of a general conference. I emphasise in particular the following statement: "Peace is our most valuable possession, Germany will do all that it can to contribute particularly to this work".

As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to support all efforts that help towards a relaxation of tension and towards rapprochement, though we are well aware of the fact that it is not necessary to have the same views from the very outset in order to arrive at an agreement. One condition must be made, however, namely, that such efforts and endeavours are not directed against anybody. In this connection I am thinking of the Soviet Union, and of the fact that I consider it to be arbitrary and dangerous to exclude from the international community a nation of almost 200 million people, a nation that, moreover, does not make the same demands, and that in common with all other nations, needs peace and desires it.

I would like to bring forward still another problem that is at the same time a general and a German—French problem. When we say that the economic restoration of Europe can be effected only in an atmosphere of peace, and that it is dependent on the notification and control of armaments and of their cessation and gradual limitation, Germans are disposed to find offensive allusions in our words. We have, however, always declared with emphasis that our statements are valid for all countries, including our own. We demand from Germany nothing that we do not demand from all, and that we do not demand from ourselves. And when we are now, in declaring that we are ready to collaborate in a more equitable distribution of raw material, anxious that war shall not thereby be promoted, who has the right to feel insulted by such justified and general anxieties? In order that peace shall prevail the war industries must be transferred into peace industries. This adjustment, without which most terrible crises are inevitable, is all the more difficult as armaments have been actively pushed forward at the cost of other production. This difficulty can be overcome only when the wish and the determination to arm are given up entirely, and when, by means of the re-established exchange of goods, and thanks to the confidence and the security of the economic revival, new marketing possibilities are opened up to the new production. We summon Germany and all other countries to participate in this great task, and in order to accomplish it thoroughly let us drop on both sides susceptibility and mistrust, and deliver the world from the nightmare of the war by freeing ourselves from it. We shall collaborate towards the relaxation of this tension with all the forces at our disposal.

We are convinced that there need not necessarily be war, and that this crime must for ever be proscribed, because it would destroy civilisation for ever. We shall, therefore, in order to avoid war, exhaust all the means of conciliatory procedure. The only limit to our desire for peace is our inflexible determination to defend ourselves if we should be attacked, and to fulfil loyally the obligations that we have undertaken. We offer, therefore, the example of a free and strong nation that, sure of itself and of its friendships, can extend its hand honourably and without fear to everybody.

III. From the Declarations made on the Heroes' Commemoration Day and at the Receptions of the Participators at the Congress in Berlin of the Permanent International Front Fighter Commission

From the speech delivered by General Field-Marshal von Blomberg, Reich War Minister, on Commemoration Day of Heroes 1937 in Berlin, February 21st

In the midst of a mighty peaceable struggle for freedom and of a boisterous work of national re-construction this day which we devote to the memory of our heroes carries our eyes and hearts back again to that greatest of all ordeals, for as such the world war will live in our consciousness and in that of those who come after us. "Wanderer, stay", is what this day calls to us, and this peremptory summons exhorts us to self-communion, searching retrospect, and to venturesome circumspection. From the understanding of the past and of the present, however, there must proceed the fixed determination to shape the future, or otherwise this day will have lost its meaning.

Once again, in recalling the years 1914 to 1918, the depth of the suffering and the greatness of the sacrifice that the world war demanded of our people shakes our whole being. Once again we look on the endless rows of graves of two million German soldiers dispersed over the whole earth and in all seas; once again we feel the profound misery that our mothers, widows, and orphans suffered and still suffer. The sad fate of those disabled in the war also speaks to us in forcible language. As we think of our own dead we think also today with all reverence of the soldiers mourned by the nations who fought with us and against us 20 years ago. "Forget hate!—Prove worthy of our Sacrifice!—Use all the strength at your disposal to prevent a recurrence of the horror!" This is our interpretation of the cry that reaches us from the graves of the world war.

The new Germany has taken up this cry. It has not contented itself with setting up monuments of stone and of metal; it has not only fulfilled the simplest duty imposed by gratitude, in giving a dignified appearance to our soldiers' resting places, and in mitigating and improving the lot of those who were left behind and of those disabled in the war. What appears to me to be much more important is the fact that in these past four years the German people and its leaders have torn down the walls of hatred and of dissension that were previously regarded as being insuperable. In the first place we have removed the barriers in the inner life of the people that were set up by the conflict of the classes and by the arrogance of rank, and we have replaced them with comradeship, with the sense of community, and with National Socialist discipline. The right to work and thus human dignity have been restored to millions of unemployed, and what a moral achievement it is that in a nation of 65 million people no working hour is any longer voluntarily lost! Where in the whole world is there a philanthropic organisation that could compare with the German Winter Relief Work? What country can boast of having given the working classes more of the joy of life and better possibilities for recreation than new Germany has given in the past few years? In what country is more done for the education of a healthy, animated, and robust youth in which we see the assurance of the welfare of the Fatherland? We were indeed great and bold in our peaceable, cultural re-construction, and at the same time we have been studiously careful to respect the vital rights of other nations, for, just as the central point of the Führer's domestic policy is the peaceful comprehension of all the nation's forces, so the leading motive of his foreign policy is the preservation of international peace. The fact should not be lightly estimated abroad that after an unparalleled period of suffering during and after the war, and after an almost endless series of humiliations and oppression, the German people have expressed to all their neighbours their readiness to meet in complete reconciliation. The outside world should also finally understand what importance for the moral appeasement of the world lies in the fact that Germany has eradicated from her inner life the dictated Treaty of Versailles, that devilish work of hate and of delusion. We stand today in the centre of Europe as a free people, and the freedom of other nations is in no danger from us. All, however, who see in the freedom, in the equality, and in the distinctive life of the nations the basis for international orderliness, will understand also the inexorable defiance hurled by National Socialism at Bolshevism, that menace to the world.

Germany has reverted to the sources of her strength.

The German people know that they can pursue undisturbed their peaceable avocations under the protection of their newly-recovered defensive force. The time of dictates and of threats has gone for ever; we are again master in our own house, and can do in this whatever we wish.

Born of the spirit of National Socialism, the defensive force is the upholder and the herald of the National Socialist view of and conformation of life. Together with the National Socialist Party, to which it feels itself indissolubly bound, it constitutes the backbone and the foundation of the New Reich. It gives to the New Reich the power to assert itself in the midst of the foreign political play of forces, and it watches over the peace of the nation. From the defensive force and from its work the confidence must emanate that pulsates in all the streams of the national life, and that finds its supreme efficacy in the task of educating the German person. For it is thus, and not with guns and bombing squadrons that we wish to operate in the future.

From the speech delivered by General-Colonel Göring, Minister President of Prussia, on the occasion of the official reception in the Reich Air Ministry of February 15, 1937, of the representatives of the Permanent International Front Fighter Commission

Men from all countries are face to face at this Congress who once fought in the most mighty of all wars either side by side as allies or as chivalrous opponents for the ideals of their countries. The fight is at an end, a new path has been opened up. All of us here have been through the terrible inferno of modern material battles. We know that the warriors of the world war are the peers of the heroes of pre-historic times in respect of endurance, of bravery, and of courage. We then realised with fearful consternation what a grievous loss it was for the whole of mankind that the most valuable inheritance of the nations was being destroyed in those most sanguinary front fights.

I believe that the world war was the final test, and that the nations can never again allow themselves to stand up against each other in such a struggle. It was the last warning by fate not to let western civilisation be submerged. Further progress has been made in technics, the equipments for war have gained in force and in destructive power. A new war would increase enormously the terrors of the last one.

For these reasons I believe that there are no better promoters of peace than the old Front Fighters. I am convinced that you, before all others, have the right to demand peace, and to organise it. I award the right to organise the life of the nations in the first place to the men who, for four atrocious years, went through the hell of the world war with weapons in their hands, and I know that the front fighters will be the first to use all their endeavours to ensure that their nations shall retain the blessings of peace.

It is far too often said that the soldiers themselves are the chief representatives of a war party. I believe, comrades, that those people rattle most assiduously with the sabre who have never drawn one. — Those who know nothing of the horrors of war can talk about a "brisk and exhilarating war". We, however, know what a terrible thing the final contention among the nations is.

It is my fervent wish, a wish coming from my heart, that this Congress may contribute towards establishing the groundwork of a real peace of honour and of equality for all parties. You, my comrades, must take the preparatory steps. I am glad that the Congress meets in new Germany, which yearns for peace as fervently as do the other nations, and will maintain it as firmly. I do not believe that it would be possible to hold the Congress in a country whose people were inclined to war, for the front fighters speak everywhere, wherever they happen to meet, not of future wars, but of how peace can be preserved.

General-Colonel Göring concluded with the request to the Front Fighters: Put everything into the background that once divided the nations and us! Remember that history has gone forwards! Discard the sentiments that engendered wrong preconceived ideas, and that develop into gulfs between the nations. Let us not speak of prestige, not of victors and vanquished, but only of the ideals of the front fighter, namely, of comradeship to the very utmost, of fulfilment of duty to the end, and of readiness to make sacrifices until death! These ideals can be realised at all times, and also in the service of peace. Find the language of the front fighter that permits you to grasp each other's hands over what is disuniting in politics. Remember that many millions of dead comrades are looking down on us. They will not wish to have died in order that everything shall be repeated; their death is justified only if a new, happier life issues from their graves. These are the wishes, my comrades, that I would like to give you for this Congress.

From the speech by Rudolf Hess, the Führer's Deputy and Reich Minister, welcoming the participants in the First Congress of the Permanent International Front Fighter Commission in Berlin, on February 16, 1937

"I believe that it can be taken as symbolical of the spirit pervading the International Front Fighter Organisation that at the beginning of its existence it is meeting in the capital of the country that for years was regarded by most of you as the main enemy. Perhaps one or another in your home will blame you for travelling here on the grounds that Germany is arming very heavily, for augmenting armaments is hardly compatible with the object of the Front Fighters, which is to work for peace. In reply to this I can only repeat the idea to which I gave expression years ago. I can repeat it in the words spoken by a foreign statesman a few days ago: 'A great Reich which is at the same time a weak Reich is a menace to the stability of the world and a temptation to the aggressor.'

Germany, however, has no wish to menace the stability of the world and to be a temptation to the aggressor. Believe me: a people that has suffered so grievously as the German has through war, and that is led by a government of Front Fighters—at their head the Front Fighter Adolf Hitler—such a people does not arm for the purpose of attacking. Germany also 'throws her strength into the scale of peace'.

We Front Fighters are a band of comrades—for the real Front Fighters entertained from the outset a feeling of comradeship for those who bore the same privations, suffered the same distress, did the same things, and were threatened by the same death in all its terrible forms. The fact that this feeling of comradeship between the opponents themselves, even in the midst of the most awful fight known to history, could not be quite suppressed led many Front Fighters even while the war was going on to hope that the men who fought in the ranks of all the nations might be called upon to fulfil a great and noble mission on behalf of afflicted humanity. I believe that a way to the fulfilment of this hope has been found in the formation of this International Front Fighter Commission, in which the representatives of the nations stand side by side in full equality and equally esteemed. It can only be hoped that from this beginning, through the work of these men, who have seen and been through the most appalling and the most highly concentrated suffering that ever mankind had to bear, real understanding between the nations will result. May the esteem in which these men hold each other spread more than heretofore among the nations, and may the spirit rise from this extended esteem that will use every effort on all sides to hinder national catastrophes such as it has been our lot to experience."

From the Address by General Field-Marshal von Blomberg, Reich War Minister, on February 21st, 1937

Comrades! When I address you, comrades of the great war, with this title of honour, and bid you welcome in the name of the German defensive force, the meaning of the word comrade demands that we should direct all our thoughts and all our actions to the good qualities and the virtues that have characterised soldierly comradeship in all ages and among all peoples. To be a comrade is to be brave; comradeship calls for confidence; there can be comradeship only between free, honour-loving people and nations that are on a footing of complete equality. Comrades help one another; the very essence of true comradeship consists of submitting in common to the common fate.

Almost two decades have gone by since the world war came to an end. International efforts and endeavours to repair the consequences of that terrible occurrence and to prevent the outbreak of a new war have not been wanting. Most of these endeavours have failed, however, have come to nothing because comradeship was not behind them. Now a new "Internationale", the international corporation of the front fighters, is fighting for the same aim. I believe that this Internationale has on its side the greatest right and the greatest chance of attaining that aim. Who knows war better than you, my comrades? Who has made greater sacrifices on the altar of the mother country than the soldiers of all nations who fell in the war, than the front fighters who carry the wounds on their bodies through life that were inflicted in that war? Who can fight more convincingly for the peace of the world than the soldiers of the last world war?

This is a new kind of pacifism. It is not the outcome of cowardice and lack of dignity, not also of egotism and of malignity. It renders unto Caesar what is Caesar's, but also to God what is due to God. This pacifism pronounces from a full heart in favour of peace, but it also accords to all peoples the right and the duty to defend their country. This pacifism recognises that it is honourable to fight and to suffer for one's country. To esteem one's own honour and one's own rights carries with it, however, recognition of and scrupulous esteem for the honour and the rights of neighbours.

It is the task of the front fighters of all nations to disseminate this idea, and the present Congress serves the same end. That the representatives of 14 nations are met here in Berlin to work with a good will for international understanding and for peace among the nations is a gleam of light on the clouded political horizon. My wish for you, my comrades, is that you may achieve eminent success! You will become acquainted in Germany with a Reich and a people that have borne unending suffering, that are now working with an heroic exertion of strength at their regeneration, and that wish for nothing more ardently and need nothing more urgently than peace for themselves and peace throughout the world. Take this conviction home with you! Become the standard-bearers of a new idealism, of an ideal that is capable of uniting all the nations and of burying all enmity!

Naval Armaments

The Political Struggle by the Powers for Maritime Predominance

The Collapse of Naval Disarmament

The problem of disarmament was, as is well known, taken up at an early date outside the League of Nations, by the five great naval powers. The most important stages of the negotiations to this end were the Washington Conference, which led to the conclusion of an Agreement on February 6th, 1922, that remained in force until the year 1936; the so-called Admirals' Conference that was summoned by the American President Coolidge in the summer of 1927, and that was without result; the Anglo-French naval negotiations in the summer of the year 1928; the Naval Conference in London in the spring of the year 1930, that resulted in the Treaty of April 22nd, 1930, between England, the United States of America, and Japan; the attempts made by France and Italy in the beginning of the year 1931 to terminate the naval rivalry, which ended with the conclusion of the Agreement of March 1st, 1931, that never came into force; the endeavours made in the Disarmament Conference to reach an agreement, which also failed; the Anglo-German negotiations, which resulted successfully in the conclusion of the Naval Treaty of June 18th, 1935; and finally the Conference that also met in London on December 9th, 1935, and terminated provisionally on March 25th, 1936, with the conclusion of a three-power Treaty between England, the United States, and France.

The Washington Conference 1921/1922

When the world war was concluded all the naval powers among the victor countries felt the desire to reduce naval armaments to the utmost possible extent. The primary reason for this wish was the imperative necessity to reduce expenditure, though the war-weariness of the nations also contributed to it. Finally, also, all the Admiralties felt the need to make a profound study of the experience gained in the war, before laying down any considerable number of new constructions.

The conditions for disarmament were to be created by the dictate of Versailles, whose naval provisions fixed the naval strength of the German Reich at such a small amount that it could practically be ignored in the deliberations of the victor countries concerning their naval armaments. One of the consequences of the Russian Revolution was that the Tsarist navy was rendered incapable of action, so that there remained as naval powers of importance England, the United States, Japan, France, and Italy.

It soon appeared, however, that although they had just won together the war against the Central European powers none of those countries was inclined to renounce the naval force that it considered it had the right to claim on the basis of its political position and of its interests. Two groups were formed, within which rivalries in naval armament questions soon arose, namely, an oceanic group, comprising England, the United States, and Japan, and a Mediterranean group consisting of France and Italy. Much, it is true, was said about disarmament, and a large number of old ships were scrapped by all the navies, about which much was made, but nobody thought seriously of relinquishing demands for its navy in respect of ships of really great fighting force and of most modern construction. For the ships in course of construction the rate of building was again accelerated, and fresh building programmes were drawn up. Naval disarmament was abandoned, and the beginning of a competitive armament was indicated, especially between the three oceanic naval powers, in the building of battle-ships and of aircraft-carriers. England, that had a vital interest in preventing such a competitive armament, succeeded in averting this danger through the medium of the Washington Conference of 1921/22. By abandoning the two-power standard, and by recognising the right of the United States to complete equality, England succeeded in gaining the support of the latter power to her most important wishes. Under the combined pressure of the two Anglo-Saxon powers a Treaty was arrived at that fixed the naval strength of the five naval powers: England, the U.S.A., Japan, France, and Italy, quantitatively in the ratio to each other of 5:5:3:1.75:1.75, and provided for maximum tonnage in the case of battle-ships and aircraft-carriers. From the qualitative point of view maximum tonnage for the individual ship and maximum calibre were fixed for battle-ships, aircraft-carriers, and heavy cruisers. Certain exceptions were specially regulated for each signatory of the Treaty.

In actual figures the British Empire and the United States were allowed to possess capital ships with a total tonnage of 525,000 tons each, Japan 315,000 tons, France and Italy 175,000 tons. At the same time the maximum limit for capital ships was fixed at 35,000 tons, the maximum calibre at 40.6 cm. and the age limit of the ships at twenty years. The building of large warships was to cease for the next ten years.

In addition the tonnage was fixed for the aircraft-carriers allowed to the five States, i. e. the British Empire and the United States, 135,000 tons; Japan, 81,000 tons; France and Italy, 60,000 tons. The maximum tonnage of the aircraft-carriers was also limited to 27,000 tons and the maximum calibre to 20.3 cm.

No limitation of the total tonnage was reached in the case of all the other classes of ships. But as regards armoured cruisers, the so-called "Washington cruisers", a maximum tonnage of 10,000 tons was fixed together with a maximum calibre of 20.3 cm. As regards the light naval forces, such as small cruisers, torpedo boats, torpedo boat destroyers and submarines, no agreement was concluded in respect of number and total tonnage or the size of the vessels. This obvious lacuna in the Treaty was due of course to the attitude of France, who felt she was being treated as a naval power of the second class, and was not prepared at any price to dispense with such an important defensive weapon as the submarine. England proposed the complete abolition of submarines in the light of War experiences, but did not carry her point. France also refused outright to agree to any limitation of the size, armament or tonnage of submarines. England thereupon abandoned her original attitude of willingness to accept limitation of cruisers and destroyers, regarding these types of vessels as specially adapted for defence against submarines and desiring to retain a free hand to continue to build them pending the abolition of the submarine.

That left the Washington Treaty an unfinished torso, though it served to provide valuable starting points for naval disarmament in the shape of provisions with regard to intervals of construction, age-limits and the arming of merchant-ships. It relaxed—for a time at least—the high tension which had prevailed. The idea of Disarmament had in short found a footing.

When President Harding invited the other powers to Washington he informed them at once that the limitation of naval armaments was bound up with the political problems in the Pacific Ocean and in the Far East. It was clear, therefore, from the outset that one of the aims of the Conference was to arrive at an understanding concerning the principles that should dominate the policy in the Far East. The agreement thus reflected in particular the disquietude produced by the prevailing troubles in China in a world that was uneasy concerning its capital investments in the Far East.

The provisions embodied in Article XIX of the Treaty with regard to naval bases in the Pacific in the case of England, the United States and Japan are important. They stipulated that for the period of the Treaty no changes should be made in the position in regard to defence equipment or resources for the repair and maintenance of naval vessels in the possessions of the three Powers in the Pacific, and in particular prohibited the erection of new fortifications. In the case of England this stipulation applied to Hongkong and the British islands east of the 110th meridian. It did not apply to the bases in the neighbourhood of the Canadian coast or to bases belonging to the Dominions of Australia and New Zealand. Singapore, England's chief base on the fringe of the Pacific area, was also not affected by these provisions; and the programme of development of this base was free to continue. In the case of the United States the restriction applied to all the U.S. possessions in the Pacific including the Philippines, Guam and the Aleutian Islands, with the exception of the Hawaii group and the U.S. possessions of the Western coast and Alaska and in the neighbourhood of the Panama Canal Zone. In the case of Japan the restrictions applied to the mandated islands and to the Kuriles, the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Coochoo Islands, Formosa and the Pescadores. Bases on the mainland and adjoining islands might continue to be developed.

The ratio 5:5:3 distributed the burden of power among the three nations in such a manner that each could hold the upper hand in its sphere of influence, without being strong enough to attack one of the two other powers with any prospect of success. Notwithstanding her lower ratio Japan retained the predominance in the Far East, owing to the great distance that separated her from America and from Europe. The Americans for their part were also, thanks to the great distance, superior in their waters to the English and the Japanese, and for the same reason England was superior to those two countries both in the Mediterranean and in the eastern half of the Atlantic.

Furthermore, England, America, Japan, and France agreed in the so-called Four Power Pact to respect reciprocally their rights to the islands in the Pacific, and in case disputes should arise or those rights be menaced by a third power to meet for friendly conference.

In exchange for these important concessions Japan was, it is true, compelled to bind herself in the so-called Nine Power Treaty to respect the sovereign rights, the independence, and the integrity of China, and to uphold there the principle of the open door.

The fact should not be overlooked finally in connection with these Treaties that the alliance existing between England and Japan since the year 1902 was not renewed.

The Coolidge Conference 1927

In the years that followed, however, it became evident that the Washington Treaty had indeed prevented competitive armament in the battle-ship and aircraft-carrier classes, but that in the categories not limited by Treaty its effect had been a general increase of armaments. Each of the five naval powers drew up more or less extensive building programmes, that augured a very considerable expansion of the cruiser, destroyer, and submarine fleets. The competitive building that had been prevented with the aid of so much care and labour in the case of battle-ships and aircraft-carriers, was soon in full operation in the other classes of ships. This movement was now not restricted to England, America, and Japan, but spread also to France and Italy, whose naval rivalry in the Mediterranean constantly gathered strength.

A commission set up by the League of Nations in the year 1924 in Rome endeavoured vainly to bring about an understanding.

It was Coolidge who succeeded in bringing the United States, England, and Japan to the conference table at Geneva in the year 1927, in the hopes that an arrangement might be arrived at by those powers in regard to armaments in the various classes of the light fighting forces. The endeavour to secure the application of the provisions valid for the heavy fighting forces also to the light fighting forces failed completely. Japan opposed the ratio of power of 5:5:3; America and England could not agree on the cruiser question. England claimed for her widespread and widely ramified maritime interests two classes of cruiser (heavy and light) and a superiority of cruisers over those possessed by the United States. The latter country insisted on equality, however, and rejected two categories of cruisers. England's endeavours were aimed at the recognition of a minimum quota of about 70 cruisers, the number of heavy cruisers of 10,000 tons being limited, while the light cruisers should be subjected to no restrictions of any kind. This proposal was viewed by the United States as being a heavy blow to its interests, its contention being that the situation in the Pacific and in the Far East necessitated the retention of a tonnage as high as possible for its individual cruisers.

The Anglo-French Naval Negotiations in 1928

After it had been proved to be impossible to come to an agreement with the United States, England made every effort to reach an understanding with France.

The Anglo-French naval negotiations in the summer of 1928 were an attempt at an agreement between the two countries for the limitation of the light naval forces.

The views of Great Britain and of France in respect of the limitation of naval armaments had hitherto been diametrically opposed. Great Britain refused to make a close connection between land and sea armaments, while France adopted the principle of the interdependence of armaments and therefore took the view that it was impossible to negotiate separately regarding naval armaments. On the contrary, she considered that armaments formed an organic whole and that negotiations could only be carried on regarding the whole, that is to say, regarding land, air and naval armaments at the same time. Great Britain and France also disagreed as to the method of limiting naval armaments. France took the view that the total amount of tonnage should be fixed for each country, while the distribution of this tonnage among the various categories of ships should be at the discretion of each Power. Great Britain, on the other hand, desired a limitation of the total tonnage of the various categories of vessels. The important point in this connection was that France desired to reserve the greatest possible scope for the development of the light naval forces; this was the very thing that Great Britain wished to prevent since, by fixing the total tonnage for each category, the other naval Powers were prevented from increasing the light naval forces—an increase which would in the nature of things be of special value to the smaller naval Powers but would be particularly inconvenient for Great Britain and might even endanger the maintenance of her world-wide trade and the connections with the various parts of her Empire. The treaty negotiated between Great Britain and France in the summer of 1928, the text of which was fixed but which did not come into force on account of the sharp resistance of Italy and the United States, was based on an agreement that Great Britain should meet the French in respect of land armaments while France should meet the English in respect of naval armaments, Great Britain agreeing with the wishes of France that the trained reserves and war material should be excluded from the disarmament factors while France gave way to the British view regarding the limitation of naval armaments according to categories of ships. Whereas Great Britain previously agreed with Germany, especially on the question of the trained reserves and the war materials in stock, she was subsequently the main contributing factor to the exclusion of this point from the draft convention of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission. The whole was therefore not an agreement for facilitating and preparing for a general limitation of armaments, but an agreement against disarmament. It failed on account of its rejection by the Labour Government which came into power in June 1929. The study of the English and French documents and other publications relating to these naval speeches, that were issued in London and in Paris on October 22nd, 1928, is still interesting. It is also a valuable help in judging the methods then employed, and also on later occasions, in the armament negotiations, for it was ultimately these methods that occasioned the breakdown of the negotiations.

The London Naval Conference 1930

The Labour Government then attempted to tackle the question of the limitation of naval armaments and to check the competition in armaments from another angle, i. e. from an agreement with the United States. To ensure this agreement, England declared her willingness to renounce the 70 cruisers requested, and to be satisfied with a minimum number of 50 cruisers. After preparations had been made by Mr. MacDonald's visit to the United States in the autumn of 1929, the Naval Conference convened by the British Government in London at the end of January endeavoured to fill up the gaps left open at Washington in respect of the limitation of naval armaments and thus also to fix definite armament ratios by categories of ships for the light naval forces of the individual naval Powers. The Five-Power Treaty which had been hoped for was however not reached in view of the Franco-Italian difference of opinion in respect of naval parity. On April 22nd, 1930, only a Three-Power Pact was concluded, which was signed by Great Britain, America, and Japan as Part III of the London Treaty.

The essential feature of the London Agreement was the division of cruisers into two classes—Class A (heavy cruisers) with a maximum tonnage of 10,000 tons and guns of over 15.5, but not over 20.3 cm. calibre, and Class B (light cruisers) with a maximum tonnage of 10,000 tons and guns not exceeding 15.5 cm. calibre. A part of the English claims was thus met; but on the other hand the United States succeeded in asserting their own standpoint in the cruiser question by securing larger numbers and tonnage in the heavy cruiser class. In addition to the arrangement in the cruiser question, the tonnage was fixed in the case of destroyers on the 5:5:3 basis. In the case of submarines there was for the first time a breach in the established ratio, all three Powers recognising the principle of parity. The tonnage of submarines was limited quantitatively. Agelimits were also fixed on the lines laid down at Washington. Furthermore, so-called sliding clauses and special exceptional provisions were adopted, which show, on the one hand, how extraordinarily difficult it was to reach a settlement, and, on the other hand, how small was the satisfaction given — when the matter is viewed as a whole — by that settlement. The validity of the Treaty was made to coincide with that of the Washington Treaty.

Article 1 of the London Agreement further confirmed the concession of replacement tonnage for big ships in the case of France and Italy to the extent of 70,000 tons each. For a considerable period no advantage was taken by either country of this provision with regard to replacement tonnage: but in the last few years building of this tonnage has begun. France considered her "security" seriously endangered by the building of the German armoured ships of 10,000 tons, and proceeded accordingly to lay down two battleships of 26,500 tons each with 33 cm. guns in December 1932 and November 1934 respectively. The first of these ships, the "Dunkerque", was launched on September 15th, 1935, and was completed by about the end of 1936. The second, the "Strasbourg", is not to be completed before the summer of 1938. Franco-Italian divisions on naval and Mediterranean issues led Italy at the end of October 1934 to reply to the French programme of new construction by laying down 2 battleships of 35,000 tons each, the "Vittorio Veneto" and the "Littorio" which come up to the maximum limits laid down in the Washington Treaty in every respect: in particular, they are to carry 9 38.1cm. guns. The latest indications were that France did not propose to leave this increase of Italian sea-power unanswered. The French Law of March 23rd, 1935, authorised the building of other big French ships, the "Jean Bart" and the "Richelieu" this time of 35,000 tons.

The blow to the idea of naval disarmament is thus to be seen not so much in the fact that France decided to construct a capital ship at all as in the type that was decided upon for this ship. In the summer 1932 England had made the valuable proposal at the Geneva Conference that in future capital ships should be reduced to a tonnage of 25,000 and the gun calibre to 30.5 cm. or, with a simultaneous reduction of the limits hitherto set for cruisers, that the tonnage for capital ships should even be limited to 20,000 and the gun calibre to 28 cm. There was thus a definite prospect of reaching a certain measure of disarmament as far as the larger battle ships were concerned. This British proposal was thus brought to naught by the laying down of the French "Dunkerque" with her 26,500 tons and her 33 cm. guns, and this constitutes the blow which France dealt to the idea of naval disarmament. France must have known that her decision on the question of principle could not fail to have the most serious effect on the construction plans of her Mediterranean rival.

The Franco-Italian Naval Discussions 1931

Discussions between France and Italy were resumed from time to time in the hope of arriving at an agreement concerning the amount of light naval fighting forces that both countries would concede, but without any success.

Italy demanded complete parity with France, while the latter insisted on a considerable superiority of light naval forces as compared with Italy and thus refused to extend to the light naval forces the parity established in the Washington Treaty in respect of capital ships and aircraft-carriers. After lengthy negotiations through the intermediary of the United Kingdom, it appeared that an agreement had been reached with the Franco-Italian Treaty of March 1st, 1931, when France withdrew from the agreement already arrived at. Her obvious intention was to leave in suspense the agreement with Italy and thus to keep the Treaty of London indefinite until the general Disarmament Conference, in order to retain means of bargaining and pressure as against the great Naval Powers in respect of the entire disarmament question. If the Treaty of London had been concluded with Franco and Italy and if the ratio of armaments had thus been fixed between the five great Naval Powers in respect also of the light naval forces, it would have been much easier to settle the problem of naval disarmament at the general Disarmament Conference.

The Disarmament Conference and the Question of Navies 1932/33

No progress whatever was made with the solution of the problem of naval disarmament also in the course of the Disarmament Conference. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the then Prime Minister, had submitted to the Conference on March 16th, 1933, his famous Draft Disarmament Convention, the second part of which, in Section II, Clause 2, dealt with naval armaments.

The British Draft Convention which, according to the unanimous decision of the representatives of all States, was to be regarded as the basis of the Convention to be concluded, did indeed merely state that the provision of the Washington and London Treaties shall continue to apply to the Contracting Parties. The text of the British plan thus gave these States the possibility of extending their Navies within the limits of those Treaties. On the other hand, after carefully studying the entire chapter, it may be concluded that, not the text, but the principle underlying this section aims at a far-reaching stabilisation of all naval armaments at their present level for the proposed short transitional period.

The final settlement was postponed till 1935 when a Conference of all Naval Powers was to be held. In view of the stabilisation tendency underlying the chapter on Naval Armaments, there might have been some justification for concluding that the Contracting Parties of Washington and London would also help as far possible to bring about the equilibrium aimed at in the MacDonald draft by adapting their new constructions to the limitation demanded of the other Naval Powers until the conclusion of the Conference proposed for 1935. They would have best contributed to this aim by continuing to refrain from increasing their new constructions beyond their present extent. Hitherto they had deliberately refrained from taking full advantage of the possibilities provided by the Washington and London Treaties, in order that the work of the Disarmament Conference might not be unfavourably influenced by enormous building programmes. The long start gained by the Navies of the five Parties to the negotiations in Washington and London over the navies of the other Powers had hitherto enabled them and would continue to enable them to exercise such restraint without danger.

This conduct was also in accordance with the provision laid down in Article 23 of the London Treaty which they had concluded and which specially refers to the possibility of a "more general agreement limiting naval armaments to which all would become parties". This could not refer to any other agreement than the Convention to be concluded at the Disarmament Conference.

Only France, by the construction of the battle cruiser "Dunkerque", thus creating a new type of vessel with the maximum fighting power, deliberately departed from this general line which was undoubtedly of the greatest importance for the success of the disarmament negotiations; this gave an alarm signal to the experts in all admiralities throughout the world.

The first reading of the Naval Chapter of the MacDonald draft, which took place in the General Commission on May 25th and 26th, 1933, clearly showed the serious differences existing in respect of naval armaments.

We can hardly be astonished that all the proposals of the five signatory Powers of the Treaty, of Germany and the small naval Powers could not bring about any agreement.

When it became more and more obvious during the long drawn-out negotiations that the Geneva Conference would never be able to carry out its important task of bringing about the speedy and effective disarmament of the heavily-armed States on account of the tactics adopted by the delegations of those States, the Admiralties removed their main interest from Geneva to the scene of the Naval Disarmament Conference planned for 1935. It was now of importance rapidly to lay the foundations in order to go to this future Conference "well equipped" in the true sense of the word. And so the race in naval armaments began.

The Naval Conference in London 1934/1936

a) The Preliminary Discussions

The discussions preliminary to this Conference began on June 18th, 1934. Only a few days after the curtain had fallen over the last act of the tragedy of the Disarmament Conference in Geneva the British Government took the initiative in opening up afresh the question of naval armaments. There arrived in London one after the other Roosevelt's special ambassador, Norman Davis, and the American Admiral Standley, a Japanese delegation, Pietri, Minister of Marine, in the company of Monsieur Barthou, the then French Minister for Foreign Affairs, and an Italian naval expert.

In the meantime conditions had, at least in the opinion of the three leading participants, undergone a complete change since the year 1930. The view put forward by the American Government was that Japan had thrown over since the year 1931 the system, so finely conceived, of balance of power in the Pacific, and had violated by her campaign of conquest in Manchuria and by penetrating into the interior of Mongolia the obligations into which she entered in 1922 in regard to China and that thus the conditions were no longer valid under which the ratio had hitherto been conceded to her. Japan, on the other hand, contended that in view of the greatness of the tasks that she had undertaken in consequence of the extension of her influence in the Far East the ratio hitherto in force was very far from satisfying her needs. There was undoubtedly a connection between all these matters and the conference of high military and political personages, surrounded with such great secrecy, that was arranged by the British Government in the spring of the year 1934 on the high seas in the neighbourhood of Singapore. The questions discussed concerned no doubt the expansion of that naval base, which is almost as important for the Far East as Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Haifa, Suez, Aden, and others are for the Near East and the Mediterranean.

In the profound depths of this struggle for the trident there blaze the problems of the space occupied by the Pacific Ocean, for this is the real matter in dispute, in connection with which the threads of naval strategy and of pure politics intersect each other. The naval stations are strategically as important as whole squadrons of great fighting ships, and the naval balance of power in the Pacific is a problem from which emanate all the tensions that keep those parts of the world in perpetual unrest. Although the solution of the problem has hitherto been postponed by compromises and treaties none of the parties was really contented, and the party who came off worst or felt that he was at a disadvantage always signed with the secret reservation that he would bring forward new wishes when the agreements and treaties expired or were renewed. The treaties could, therefore, never completely banish the forces that were grouped round them.

Japan felt, at any rate, strong enough to take a decided stand, and demanded to be treated generally on terms of complete parity with the Anglo-Saxon powers, and deliverance from the "Fetters of the Washington Treaty". The Japanese Ambassador in Washington, Saito, declared over and over again that public opinion in Japan would no longer tolerate that America should prescribe to Japan the number of ships the might possess, or that America "should ride about in an elegant Rolls-Royce limousine while assigning a cheap Ford car to Japan". The propelling motive of the Japanese naval policy, namely, to ensure a dominant position on the seas in the Far East, manifested itself clearly enough in the energetic tone of the Japanese programme. This endeavour was furthered also by Japan's demands for an all-round tonnage that would allow each country to construct its navy in accordance with its special needs, to have smaller ships, to abolish aircraft-carriers by means of which air attacks could be carried out across wide expanses of ocean against the thickly-populated country, so extremely sensitive to bombing attacks, and to retain submarines as a defensive weapon.

Washington replied with a brusque "No". Japan, it was pointed out there, had neither two ocean coasts to defend, as America had, nor an empire, as England had, dispersed over the whole globe, and did not need, therefore, such a large number of defensive ships. Japan naturally rejected this view of the matter as being arbitrary, but nevertheless there is something to be said for it from the technical aspect. America and even England can never risk concentrating her whole fleet in the Pacific during a war, each country must in all circumstances distribute its fighting forces in such a manner that attacks in home waters can be ward off. The American argument that a Japanese fleet of equal strength according to treaty provisions would be superior in Chinese-Japanese waters to an American fleet that had crossed the Pacific Ocean, was met with the Japanese retort that the same would apply if the Japanese fleet came across the ocean to the Panama Canal—and in theory the Japanese are undoubtedly in the right. What is overlooked, however, is that Japan has hardly any interest to protect in Central America, whereas America has quite important interests in Eastern Asia, in the form of the Chinese market, to defend.

The central point of the Franco-Italian naval rivalry was the Italian demand for equality. Paris replied to the Italian demand for absolute parity with the strongest continental naval power, namely, France, that that country's extensive over-sea possessions necessitated a distribution of the French fleet, so that absolute parity would render the Italian naval forces superior to the French Mediterranean fleet. France also sees in this situation a menace to possibly necessary transports of troops from her Northern African colonial empire to the home country as a danger to her requirements of food-stuffs and important raw material for war purposes. She is able to supply these needs to a very great extent at home, whereas in case of a conflict Italy is infinitely more dependent on supplies from foreign countries.

Italy has certainly not yet forgotten the expressions with which Hanotaux, the former French Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Pelletan, the former French Naval Minister, once triumphantly declared: "Bizerte prend l'Italie à la gorge", and "La Corse perce au cœur de l'Italie".

Opposition continued to exist between London and Washington in regard to the maximum tonnage of battleships and of cruisers. The Americans founded their preference for ships of a large type and with an extensive radius of action on the small number of naval bases in their sphere of influence. The English, on the other hand, wished to force down the tonnage figures, because, owing to their extended sea-routes and their more numerous naval bases, they laid greater weight on the construction of smaller, but faster ships. Between England and France, also, notwithstanding agreement "in principle", there was not unanimity on the question of submarines, the abolition of which England—and also America—continued to advocate. The French Naval Minister, Pietri, had furthermore put forward the principle that: "The French fleet is equalled nowhere qualitatively; what we want is more tonnage, especially in the larger type of war-ship, for a navy without line-of-battle ships is like an army without infantry."

There were thus fundamental points of difference on all sides, which were not mitigated by the fact that the preliminary discussions under French leaderships were introduced by the determination on the part of all the participants concerned to increase their armaments, a determination that was fairly strongly accentuated. The new building programmes were, it is true, in some cases drawn up on the almost shamefaced pretension that the existing treaties left room for new constructions. In reality, however, each party undoubtedly wished to appear at the Conference with the highest possible effective force of ships ready and in building that was exempt from further reduction. Equality of security was the slogan flung into the debate by the American delegate, by means of which it was intended to announce that it was not only bare tonnage figures and calibres that were determinative for the fighting value of the fleet, but also the distance from naval bases, etc. Equality of security was not, therefore, intended to mean that the naval strength of each power should be the same as that of another, but that the strength must be graduated in accordance with the greatness of the responsibility devolving on each power when all its interests were taken into account.

The political value of the various forces was thus decisively appraised in the preliminary discussions.

These were broken off in the middle of July, and postponed until October. In the meantime the British Government sent Sir Maurice Hankey, the secretary of the Imperial Defence Committee, and secretary general of the Naval Conference of 1930, on a tour to the Dominions, with instruction to negotiate with their various governments, in connection with London's armament policy, concerning mutual measures of Imperial defence, and especially of naval questions. And at the end of August Japan demonstrated, with a naval parade in the Bay of Tokio, in which 161 vessels of war, totalling 850,000 tons, her determination to become a naval power.

The negotiations with the United States and Japan were resumed in London on October 20th. They were preceded by an official declaration in Tokio on the 16th respecting the instructions given to the Japanese delegation, in which it was stated that Japan intended to give notice of withdrawal from the Washington Treaty, but hoped and wished that this could be replaced by a new agreement. It was also announced that Japan would furthermore claim the right to take the measures necessary for her security and for the maintenance of peace in the Far East. It was stated finally in the Tokio declaration that should the Conference yield no result Japan would consider herself compelled to look to her own self-defence according to her own judgment, though with an absolutely peaceful aim, and animated, as heretofore, by the wish to be on the best terms with the other powers.

Notwithstanding the somewhat optimistic statements by Sir John Simon, the then Foreign Secretary, in the House of Commons on October 22nd, the opposing views could not be reconciled, and even the well-rounded words with which the negotiations were closed before Christmas could not hide the fact that they had not fulfilled their main purpose.

What was anticipated soon occurred: On December 29th, 1934, a note issued in Tokio that Saito, the Japanese Ambassador in Washington, handed to the American State Secretary Hull, and that Matsudeira, the Japanese Ambassador in London, handed to the Foreign Office, denounced the Washington Treaty, and thus also the Treaty of London.

It was stated in a declaration issued by the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the same day that the Japanese Government was as a matter of course ready, even though it had denounced the two treaties, to continue friendly discussions with the other naval powers with the object of concluding a just and appropriate new naval agreement.

The two show-pieces of naval disarmament, the Treaties of Washington and London—which signified, as a matter of fact, not disarmament, but rather a stabilisation of armaments—that had to be held up so often as consolation for the sterility of Geneva in the domain of armaments on land, were thus submerged in the general armament turmoil, and lapsed on December 31st, 1936. The then President Harding of the United States had celebrated the close of the Washington Conference in February, 1922, in a positively dithyrambic speech, and amid universal applause declared: "The obligations solemnly undertaken today mark the beginning of a new and a better era and the progress of mankind... Those among us who are alive ten years hence and longer will probably see the public opinion of the nations strengthened by the experience with this Treaty in the wish to submit to the Divine will instead of occupying itself with war and the means of destruction..." That was spoken still in the spirit of the time immediately after the war, and Wilson, the professorial ideologist, was reflected in those words. The concluding words spoken by the American State Secretary Stimson at the end of the London Conference were nevertheless also animated with very considerable optimism. They were: "We believe that disarmament in itself augments security, and so we hope that the world will attain in times to come in fresh Conferences an ever increasing security by means of ever greater disarmament."

And what has come of all this? A heap of ruins, from which the danger of a gigantic competitive armament arose. The "struggle for mastery on the seas", as the English Admiral Lord Beatty once observed, went on with enhanced vehemence.

At the end of the year 1933 there appeared in the annual report published by the Navy Department in Washington the declaration by Naval Secretary Swanson that America could no longer afford to take the lead before the other powers in disarming. There were added the following words, which retain today their full gravity for the attitude assumed later by Germany: "Our armament weakness in no sense serves the cause of peace. It rather endangers that cause, for an equalised armament is a support for diplomacy, and thus an important factor in the peace policy, whereas excessive weakness becomes an allurement for an aggressive war, and is productive of violations of rights."

When Swanson wrote those words the United States were already engaged in carrying out a large building programme that

The English battle-cruiser "Hood"

The largest warship in the world
 In commission since 1920
 Displacement: 46,200 tons
 Engine Power: 151,000 HP
 Speed: 31 seamiles
 Armament: eight 38.1 cm. and twelve 14 cm. guns, two 12 cm. and four 10.2 cm. anti-aircraft guns, four light 4.7 cm. guns and 19 machine guns, 6 torpedo tubes
 Aircraft on board: 1 fighting and 1 observation plane
 Crew: 1341
 Length: 262 m.; beam: 32 cm.
 Draught: 9.6 m.
 Armour: up to 305 mm.

The French line-of-battle ship "Bretagne"

Launched: 1913
 Displacement: 22,189 tons
 Speed: 23 knots
 Length: 166 m.; beam: 27 m.
 Draught: 8.9 m.
 Crew: 1130
 Strongest armour: 400 mm.
 Armament: ten 34 cm. guns, fourteen 13.8 cm. guns, eight 7.5 cm.
 anti-aircraft, five 4.7 cm. anti-aircraft, eight machine guns,
 four 45 cm. torpedo tubes

The English battle-cruiser "Renown"

Launch: 1916 (re-built during and after the war)
 Displacement: 32,000 tons
 Speed: 31.5 knots
 Length: 229 m.; beam: 31.1 m.
 Draught: 9.6 m.
 Crew: 1200
 Strongest armour: 279 mm.
 Armament: six 38.1 cm. guns,
 twelve 10.2 cm. guns,
 four 10.2 cm. guns, four 4.7 cm.
 anti-aircraft and 16 machine guns,
 two 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes,
 four aircraft on board

The French battle-cruiser "Dunkerque"

Launch: 1935; Displacement: 26,500ts.
 Engine power: 125,000 HP; Speed:
 30 seamiles; Armament: eight 33 cm.
 and sixteen 13 cm. guns, twelve 10 cm.
 and sixteen 3.7 cm. anti-aircraft guns,
 40 machine guns;
 6 torpedo tubes, 4 flying boats
 Length: 212 m.; beam: 31.5 m.
 Draught: 8 m.
 Weight of armour: 7000 tons
 Strength of armour: up to 275 mm.
 Crew: 1381
 In its construction the ship greatly resembles the English war-ship
 "Nelson". The battle-cruiser
 "Strasbourg", laid down in 1934 will be of similar dimensions

Leading Maritime Powers

The American line-of-battle ship "West Virginia"

One of the most modern and one of the largest battle-ships of the United States

Displacement: 31,000 tons

Speed: 21.1 knots

Strongest armour: 457 mm.

Length: 183 m.; beam: 29.7 m.

Draught: 9.3 m.

Crew: 1407

Armament: eight 40.6 cm., twelve 12.7 cm. guns, eight 12.7 cm. anti-aircraft, 11 machine guns, two 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes, 3 aircraft on board

Displacement: 33,000 tons

Engine power: 133,800 HP

Speed: 21 seamiles

Armament: twelve 35.6 cm. and twelve 12.7 cm. guns, eight 12.7 cm. anti-aircraft guns, four light 4.7 cm. guns, 2 machine guns, 3 aircraft on board

Crew: 1565

Length: 190.2 m.; beam: 29.6 m.

Draught: 8.8 m.

Armour: up to 356 mm.

The Japanese line-of-battle ship "Fuso"

Launch: 1914

Displacement: 29,330 tons

Speed: 22.5 knots

Length: 192 m.; beam: 28.7 m.

Draught: 8.7 m.

Strongest armour: 305 mm.

Armament: twelve 35.6 cm. guns, sixteen 15.2 cm. guns, eight 12.7 cm. anti-aircraft, 26 machine guns, two 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes, 3 aircraft on board

The Japanese line-of-battle ship "Mutsu"

Displacement: 32,720 tons

Engine power: 46,000 HP.

Speed: 26 seamiles

Armament: eight 40.6 cm. and twenty 14 cm. guns, eight 12.7 anti-aircraft guns, 4 machine guns, 8 torpedo tubes, 3 aircraft on board

Crew: 1340

Length: 201 m.; beam: 29 m.

Draught: 9.1 m.

Armour: up to 330 mm.

The Italian line-of-battle ship
"Andrea Doria"

Launch: 1913
 Displacement: 21,555 tons
 Engine power: 24,000 HP
 Speed: 21 seamiles
 Armament: thirteen 30.5 cm., sixteen 15.2 cm. and thirteen 7.6 cm. guns, six 7.6 cm. and two 4 cm. anti-aircraft guns, 8 machine guns, 2 torpedo tubes, 1 aircraft on board
 Crew: 1250
 Length: 176 m.; beam: 28 m.
 Draught: 8.6 m.
 Armour: up to 280 mm.

The English battle ship
"Queen Elizabeth"

Launch: 1913
 Displacement: 31,100 tons
 Speed: 25 knots
 Length: 195 m.; beam: 31 m.
 Draught: 10 m.
 Crew: 1180
 Strongest armour: 279 mm.
 Armament: eight 38 cm. guns, twelve 15.2 cm. guns, eight 10.2 cm. anti-aircraft, four 4.7 cm. anti-aircraft and 15 to 19 machine guns, two 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The Italian heavy cruiser "Trento"

Launch: 1927
 Displacement: 10,000 tons
 Speed: up to 38 knots
 Length: 194 m.; beam: 20.6 m.
 Draught: 5.4 m.
 Crew: 835
 Armament: eight 20.3 cm. guns, sixteen 10 cm. anti-aircraft, two 7.6 cm. anti-aircraft, four 4 cm. anti-aircraft and 8 machine guns, eight 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes, 3 aircraft on board

The Soviet Russian line-of-battle ship
"Marat" (after re-construction)

Displacement: 23,606 tons
 Armament: twelve 30.5 cm. guns, sixteen 12 cm. guns, six 7.5 cm. anti-aircraft and 4 machine guns, four 45 cm. torpedo tubes, 2 aircraft on board
 Speed: 24.6 knots
 Crew: 1230

Congress had sanctioned in the summer, and a few weeks later the Vinson-Trammel Bill, with the greatest increase of the navy that had ever been seen, was laid before Parliament.

"An American navy second to none". That was Swanson's demand with which America proceeded to further negotiations.

b) The Results of the Naval Conference held from December 9th, 1935, to March 25th, 1936

Article 23 of the Washington Treaty and Article 23 of the London Agreement both stipulate that the Contracting Parties should meet again for a new Conference on naval armaments in 1935. The Washington Treaty makes this stipulation conditional on the Treaty's denunciation by one of the Contracting Parties is due form before December 31st, 1934. This condition is met by Japan's denunciation.

The prospects of a Conference for the limitation of naval armaments in 1935 were, for obvious reasons, somewhat dim when the year 1935 opened.

To clear up the position in Europe, England took the lead in negotiating with Germany. The negotiations culminated, after Hitler's speech of May 21st, 1935 in the Anglo-German Naval Agreement of June 18th, 1935. There has been a tendency, in drawing attention to the significance of the Agreement in other connections, to overlook the great value which England attached to the Agreement as an element in the efforts to bring about a Naval Conference. The English broadcast by the First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Bolton Eyres-Monsell, on June 19th, the greater part of which was reproduced in No. 134 of this publication, contained numerous references to this aspect of the Agreement.

"In the domain of naval armaments, as far as Great Britain and Germany are concerned, an end has finally been put to competitive arming". Thus wrote Sir Herbert Samuel, formerly British Minister for Home Affairs, in a copyright article at the end of June. Furthermore, Sir Samuel Hoare, First Lord of the Admiralty, declared in the House of Commons on the eleventh of March of this year that he regarded the Treaty as being of very great importance. "I believe" he said, "that there will be no more competitive arming between Germany and England." The Anglo-German Treaty has stayed such competitive arming as clouded the last five or six years before 1914. It is being carried out loyally by both parties. It is certainly a consoling fact that while almost the whole world was thinking of arming further, and conversed about the impossibility of restricting armaments, such an agreement could be arrived at between England and Germany. It was still hoped that this act of Adolf Hitler's, which definitely disposed of the antagonism once existing between England and Germany, might serve as an example for the other naval powers. It has unfortunately not been possible for the latter to come to such an understanding.

The effect of the Agreement on the French on the other hand was at first very different. The French Press indignantly demanded complete freedom of action in the matter of naval disarmament, and made it clear that under the circumstances France would have no particular interest in a Conference to limit naval armaments or even in discussion of the subject. England however continued to press her point. In August conversations in Paris soon showed that the atmosphere had become more favourable. The preparatory conversations with Italy which took place at the same time were equally satisfactory.

England was now in a position to approach the United States and Japan with a view to securing the co-operation of these States in the Conference. Her efforts were in the end successful: but it was not until October 24th that the official invitation was issued to the Signatory Powers of the Washington Treaty.

The general result of the preparatory negotiations and the substance of the invitation to the Conference were made known in a statement made by Sir Bolton Eyres-Monsell on October 24th in reply to a question in the House of Commons. The First Lord said that bilateral conversations had taken place between representatives of the Signatory Powers of the Washington and London Agreements to prepare the way for a Naval Conference. England had taken the initiative in arranging for these bilateral discussions, and had that day (October 24th, 1935) addressed communications to the United States, Italy, France and Japan enquiring whether the Governments of those countries were prepared to be represented at a Conference to meet in London on December 2nd. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom was also in touch with His Majesty's Governments in the Dominions on the subject.

The purpose of the proposed Conference, Sir Bolton continued, would be to secure agreement on as many aspects as possible of the question of naval disarmament with a view to the conclusion of an international agreement to take the place of the two naval treaties expiring at the end of 1936. It was hoped, he added, once agreement between the representatives of the original Signatory Powers was in sight, to extend the scope of the Conference so as to include representatives of other naval Powers.

The British Government's invitation was accepted by all the States invited. Even Japan agreed to waive the standpoint which she had maintained persistently throughout the year not to take part in a Conference unless parity of her aggregate naval strength with that of England and the United States was recognised beforehand. The holding of the Conference might now therefore be regarded as assured. In the meanwhile further discussions of experts had taken place. December 9th was finally fixed as the date for the opening of the Conference. Special interest attaches to the fact that representatives of the Dominions also took part in the Conference.

The Conference was opened on December 9th in the Locarno Room of the Foreign Office by Mr. Baldwin, Prime Minister.

When one thinks back to January 30th, 1930, and recalls the brilliant opening meeting in the House of Lords, when the King himself welcomed the numerous representatives of the five Powers that are now participants in this Conference, among them two Prime Ministers and numerous other Ministers, one can hardly imagine a greater contrast between then and today. The participating Powers had in so far adapted themselves to the prevailing atmosphere that—with the exception of the Americans, who had sent Norman Davis as special Ambassador and the deputy State Secretary Philipps—they had contented themselves with being represented by experts, and had entrusted the leadership of the delegations to their ambassadors in London. It is seldom that an international conference was inaugurated with less formalities than was this one. It was placed deliberately on a business footing. The general wish was to keep the outer frame-work as modest as possible, so as to arouse no special hopes and to prepare no disappointments.

Disappointments were all the more to be expected as at the same moment the navies of two of the negotiating powers were strategically drawn up in the Mediterranean, and were ready to strike. The Italian-Abyssinian war and the Mediterranean conflict between England and Italy that arose out of it had the result that Italy adopted an extremely reserved attitude in the Conference, and at a later stage declined altogether to sign the new treaty. Ambassador Grandi announced at the opening sitting that Italy was not inclined to be a party to a naval agreement while England took up an unfriendly attitude towards her, and the League of Nations upheld its sanctions policy. These were, moreover, not the only thunder clouds that gathered over the work of the Conference. A certain tendency towards conciliation that had finally led to an understanding between Washington and London was dissipating, and was being replaced by an almost sullen determination on the part of each country to ensure the fulfilment of its own demands. France, too, that was still under the ban of the Anglo-German Naval Treaty, was reluctant to enter into engagements that in her opinion imperilled her security. The Conference was also finally overshadowed by the vastly increased striving on the part of the Soviet Union for power on the sea as well as on land, and by Japan's expansion policy and the change in the disposition of the grouping of the Powers resulting from these two causes. In short, behind the discussions among the naval experts and constructors concerning the tonnage, calibres, and the thickness of armourplating, there were always present the political requirements of the powers in all parts of the world, which, to a certain extent, prescribed the course of events. The only gleam of light in this obscure atmosphere and the only contribution towards understanding and towards peace seemed to be the Anglo-German Naval Agreement.

These facts, moreover, were not affected in any way by the speeches delivered at the opening meeting by the representatives of the individual Powers, which, after eulogising the Washington and London Treaties, accentuated the wish and the intention to collaborate in the efforts of the Conference to arrive at an understanding that might lead to a reduction and a limitation of naval armaments. Apart from these assurances, however, very few concrete proposals were brought forward that might have furthered this aim and especially the clearing away of antagonisms.

Mr. Baldwin said: "The position of this country was explained in detail in a statement communicated to the Disarmament Conference at Geneva in 1932, and it remains the same today. Briefly speaking, his Majesty's Governments are prepared today, as they were then, to prolong the principles of the Washington and London Naval Treaties, with such modifications and adjustments as are expedient and necessary on account of altered international circumstances and the needs of individual Powers. They attach the greatest importance to a continuation of limitation in both the quantitative and qualitative field. They would like to see a reduction in the sizes of all the larger types of ships and of the guns which they carry, and they still press for the abolition of the submarine..."

Clearly we shall none of us get exactly what we want, but the essential is that we should agree during this Conference on certain limitations which, while giving each Power such latitude as it may reasonably claim for the fulfilment of its own particular needs, nevertheless relieve the public mind of the threat of a general race in naval armaments...

If it proves impossible to obtain agreement for the abolition of submarines, it is of vital importance to reach an agreement which will prevent their misuse.

Part IV. of the London Naval Treaty laid down rules for the treatment of merchant ships by submarines in time of war. These rules are already in force between the United States, Japan, and the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. But I am glad to be able to announce, as a result of the preliminary talks with representatives of other nations, that, once these rules have been incorporated in an instrument which will be distinct from the London Naval Treaty, the French and Italian Governments, who were unable to ratify the London Treaty as a whole, will be in a position definitely to accept such an instrument. We hope that this will be the signal for the acceptance of these rules by all the maritime Powers of the world, and that, by this means, unrestricted submarine warfare may in future be averted...

I am convinced that, if all the countries here represented will be prepared to yield a little of their maximum demands for the sake of the general good, an agreement should be possible between us which will not only permit a reduction to be made in the total tonnages of naval armaments throughout the world, but will also add to the general sense of world security. Our responsibility will be all the greater in that the hope of agreement with the naval Powers not here represented must necessarily depend on the result of our labours."

Mr. Norman Davis, the American representative, read firstly a letter, dated October 5th, 1934, in which President Roosevelt had set out the fundamental attitude of the United States towards the naval question, which was to be, to a certain extent, the guiding line for the American delegation in the preliminary conversations then held. It was stated in that letter: "I ask you, therefore, at the first opportunity to propose to the British and Japanese a substantial proportional reduction in the present naval levels. I suggest a total tonnage reduction of 20 per Cent below existing treaty tonnage. If it is not possible to agree on this percentage, please seek from the British and Japanese a lesser reduction—15 per Cent, or 10 per Cent, or 5 per Cent reduction..."

Only if all else fails you should seek to secure agreement providing for the maintenance and extension of existing treaties over as long a period as possible."

In the course of his own speech Mr. Norman Davis said: "On behalf of my Government I declare emphatically that the United States will not take the initiative in naval competition. We want no naval increase. We want limitation and reduction. Our present building programme, which is essentially one of replacement, is consistent with this desire. For 10 years we ceased naval construction. Under our present plans the strengths allotted to us by the London Treaty as at the end of 1936 will not be attained until 1942."

Monsieur Corbin, the French Ambassador, thereupon stated: "France has never ceased to show herself in favour of seeking a mutual arrangement for the general limitation of all armaments... The French Delegates will, therefore, continue now, as in the past, to co-operate loyally in every discussion of the different aspects of the naval problem..."

In accordance with the wish many times expressed by the French Parliament, they will, however, have to take fully into account the obligations falling upon their country as a result of its imperial responsibilities throughout the world, which cover an exceptionally extended seaboard and involve considerable distances...

In regard to the qualitative position France, as heretofore, advocates the acceptance of drastic limitation, and even a more considerable reduction of the maximum tonnages and gun calibres fixed by treaty.

From the quantitative point of view events have, on the contrary, shown that the problem of the limitation of naval armaments was much more complicated. It arouses legitimate anxiety. Because of the principle of interdependence which France has always upheld, it cannot be studied without raising the general problem of the three categories of armaments. Finally, its solution calls for the maintenance of reciprocal confidence, which is the first condition of general security...

In any case, it is necessary to take into account new factors, which make the present circumstances very different from those which existed when the previous Naval Conferences met and prevent us from binding ourselves except for a short period."

After brief statements had been made by Signor Grandi, the Italian Ambassador, and by the representatives of Australia, Canada, India, Ireland, New Zealand, and South Africa, the leader of the Japanese Delegation, Admiral Nagano, thus specified the attitude of his country: "The object of this Conference, we understand, is to conclude a new comprehensive treaty of naval disarmament with a view to regulating the naval strengths of the Powers concerned from the year 1937. Such a treaty, in the view of the Japanese Government, should be based upon the fundamental idea of setting up, among the great naval Powers of the world, a common limit of naval armaments to be fixed as low as possible, which they shall not be allowed to exceed; simultaneously, offensive forces must be drastically reduced and ample defensive forces provided, so as to bring about a substantial measure of disarmament, thus securing a state of non-menace and non-aggression among the Powers."

During the same evening Admiral Nagano supplemented these declarations in a statement to representatives of the press, in the course of which he said: "We aim at restoring the principles of non-menace and non-aggression among the Great Powers by the reduction, on as extensive a scale as possible, of the burdens raised by the race of armaments. We propose, therefore, as a premise, a common maximum limit of naval armaments among the main maritime Powers, because my Government is absolutely convinced that only the abandonment of the old system of ratios and the recognition of equality in the national defence of each country permits the hope that a just and appropriate treaty will be concluded. This common maximum limit must of course be on the lowest possible level if an effective disarmament is to be achieved.

We demand furthermore the complete abolition or a radical reduction of all ships of an offensive nature, such as aircraft-carriers, ships of the line (battleships) and class A cruisers, in order to avert the possibilities of attack.

In regard to the defensive units, such as the class B cruisers, the torpedo boats and the submarines, we are of the opinion that each nation should be free to organise its defence in a satisfactory manner by maintaining the units that best fulfil these requirements. On that account it is clear that we can never assent to the abolition of submarines."

In the circumstances described it was not surprising that the material result of the Conference was very inconsiderable. Japan withdrew early from the Conference, namely, on January 15th, 1936, when her proposals were rejected by the other Powers, though two observers remained in London. On February 27th the Italian deputation announced that its Government was not prepared, in the existing circumstances, to place its signature under the Treaty, but the delegation continued to take part in the discussions until the Treaty was signed. Only the United States of America, England, and France were thus signatories of the Naval Treaty concluded on March 25th, 1936, for six years.

It was, however, tacitly assumed that Italy also would join the Treaty at a later date. Furthermore, it was understood that the Treaty was to be supplemented by bi-lateral agreements on the part of Germany and Russia with England. The new Treaty differs from former naval treaties in particular in that it contains no quantitative restrictions. On the other hand, it prescribes limits of cost in the various classes of ships the cost of which had been limited hitherto by the Washington and London Treaties. The provisions, finally, are important that require the building programmes to be communicated annually in advance; by this means the possibilities of surprises in naval armaments being sprung are avoided.

The provisions in Article XIX of the Washington Treaty relating to fortifications and naval bases in the Pacific Ocean were discussed in the early stages of the Conference, but they were undoubtedly not referred to later. The proposal made shortly afterwards by England that the validity of the article should be upheld in the future was not accepted. The restricting provisions of this article thus also become inoperative as from January 1st, 1937. The countries bordering on the Pacific began to manifest, even before the end of the naval treaties, a keen interest in having bases for all eventualities. Japan, for example, had long been suspected by the United States, by Australia, and by New Zealand of fortifying former German islands that she held as mandates. The Japanese authorities have always denied that they had any such intention, but it may certainly be assumed that besides constructing naval bases at points under no restrictions, Japan has made all preparations to materialise at any moment the line of bases across the western Pacific that is already indicated. At any rate, the news circulated by the press at the end of March, 1936, that England was intending to fortify Hongkong has since then been confirmed.

Article XVIII also of the Washington Treaty, that forbids the transfer by the signatories of a war-ship under conditions that enable it to become a war-ship in the fleet of any other power, is now invalid, and will, it may be presumed, render good service to the smaller powers that are already beginning to arm feverishly.

On the other hand, no notice has as yet been given of an intention to terminate either the Four Power Pact of December 13th, 1921, that guarantees mutually the possession of islands in the Pacific Ocean, or the Nine Power Treaty concerning the maintenance of the open door in China. The importance of the latter Treaty has, however, been considerably impaired by the Japanese advance on Chinese territory, and also by the Japanese claim to have the exclusive right of determination in the Far East, and especially in China.

Sir Samuel Hoare referred, in the sitting of the House of Commons on March 11th, 1937, that has already been mentioned, to the importance of the Treaty of March 25th, 1936, in the following words:

"Lastly, there were the negotiations which led up to the treaty of 1936. The treaty had not yet been ratified by the British Government. He hoped, however, that enough naval Powers would ratify it to enable him to bring it to Parliament and to obtain Parliamentary approval for it. It was very easy to underrate the importance of the 1936 treaty. It was quite true that it failed to make a quantitative restriction. None the less, there were two kinds of race in armaments, one quantitative and the other qualitative, and looking back at past history, it was qualitative restriction that had been the most important. What had led to races in naval armaments in the past had been, in many cases, not so much the building of numbers of ships as the building of new types of ships that had suddenly, almost in a few moments, put out of date the existing fleets and involved all the other naval Powers in huge programmes of new expenditure. A satisfactory part of the 1936 treaty was that it brought about, if it were ratified by the naval Powers, a definite qualitative limitation. He was inclined to think that the more the naval Powers of the world studied it the more they would find that it was a most useful instrument for preventing an unnecessary race in great types and great sizes of ships in the future."

Although the new Naval Treaty, as far as its material result is concerned, falls considerably short of its two predecessors, it is hardly less important from the political standpoint. Like its two predecessors it exerts an influence, though to a lesser extent, on the building up of the naval force of the greater maritime Powers, and is thus an important factor in the distribution of strength in international politics. The Treaty shows also the change that the political views of the nations have undergone in the armament question. Almost all refuse to have their position in the play of political forces assigned for them by treaty obligations; all wish to retain a free hand. The nations agree merely on certain rules of the game. All have recognised the fact that the political development of the world does not remain stationary, and that each nation must itself determine what measure of armaments is necessary for the defence of its vital interests. The year 1936 thus provided all the maritime Powers with programmes for the building of warships that were very much augmented in comparison with those of previous years, though in view of the still existing obligations the programmes could in most cases be carried into effect only after January 1st, 1937.

Moreover, all depends of course on the coming into force of the Treaty, which is to take place when the other great naval powers—Italy, Germany, Russia, and especially also Japan—are included in it. The latest news indicate, however, that it is very doubtful if the last-named country will join the Treaty, and the negotiations that England has hitherto conducted with the Soviet Union are hardly likely to facilitate the entry of Germany, Poland, and the Scandinavian countries. Italy has, as a sequel to the Mediterranean Agreement of January 14th, 1937, with England, signed the Treaty.

In reply to a question from the British Government whether Japan would sign the naval treaty the Japanese Foreign Minister, Sato, communicated to Sir Robert Clive, the British Ambassador in Tokio, on March 28th, the decision of the Japanese Government concerning its choice of the gun calibre for large battleships. According to this communication "the Japanese Government sees no reason for altering its view as declared in the London Naval Conference, namely, that it cannot accept a qualitative limitation of new ships without a simultaneous quantitative limitation. It regrets, therefore, that it must inform the British Government that it cannot agree to the proposal to restrict the calibre of battleships to 35.6 without a simultaneous quantitative limitation."

It is thus perfectly clear that this attitude on the part of Japan may have consequences whose importance it is difficult to estimate, especially if the Japanese should, for example, not only retain the battleship calibre of 40.6 cm., but also possibly increase the size of their line-of-battleships over 35,000 tons. It is a moot question whether England would then follow the Japanese in this path, and it may be assumed, from Sir Samuel Hoare's latest observations in the matter, that she will not do so for the present, for according to Sir Samuel Hoare England will not overstep the limits set down in the new naval treaty. The Americans, on the other hand, confront such possibilities of development in a very different manner, and have already intimated that they would set up against the Japanese new constructions ships not only on an equality with them in every respect, but even superior to them. A certain limit is, of course, placed on such new constructions by the dimensions of the Panama Canal, for it was purely on this account that the maximum tonnage was fixed at 35,000 in the former treaties.

If an agreement is not arrived at with Japan in the course of fresh negotiations that will, it may be presumed, be initiated by England, the world may soon be faced with the grotesque fact that a dispute over an increase of 5 cm. in the calibre of ships' guns has been the occasion of renewed competitive armament by the naval powers and of new conflicts.

Before the armaments of the individual Powers are dealt with a brief comparison is set forth underneath between the provisions of the new London Treaty that directly affect the building policy and those of the treaties expiring on December 31st, 1936.

Comparison between the most important Provisions of the Treaties of Washington and London 1930 and those of the London Treaty of 1936.

Washington and London Treaties of 1930, valid until December 31st 1936	Treaty of London 1936, valid from January 1st 1937 to December 31st 1942
--	--

Limitation of the Total Tonnage and of the Number of Ships of the Separate Classes (Quantitative Limitation)

A. Battleships

When the Treaty provisions have been completely carried out the maximum permitted is:

U. S. A.	525,000 tons
United Kingdom	525,000 "
Japan	315,000 "
France	175,000 "
Italy	175,000 "

Maximum number for:

U. S. A.	15 ships
United Kingdom	15 ships
Japan	9 ships

France and Italy have exclusively the right to deal at will with the proportion of battleship tonnage allotted to them, with the restriction that the qualitative provisions of the Treaty must be observed.

The carrying out of the Treaty provisions was arranged in Washington in such a manner that in the first place a greater number and a higher maximum tonnage could be obtained. England was permitted to start building two ships in 1922, France and Italy were to build each 35,000 tons in 1927 and in 1929. From 1931 all the signatories of the Treaty might begin replacement building systematically and at a specified rate. Old ships were to be scrapped as these new ones were ready, so that the Treaty provisions should be carried out completely by 1942.

In the London Treaty of 1930 U. S. A., England and Japan agreed not to build for replacement between 1931 and 1936, and so many older ships were scrapped by those countries that the numbers fixed as ultimate aim were attained by 1932.

No limitation whatever.

There exists, however, an understanding between U. S. A. and England, though without arrangement by treaty, that the ratio of strength for U. S. A. : England : Japan shall be maintained at 5 : 5 : 3.

Washington and London Treaties of 1930, valid until December 31st 1936

Treaty of London 1936, valid from January 1st 1937 to December 31st 1942

B. Aircraft-carriers

The total tonnage permitted to:	No limitations.
U. S. A. is 135,000
United Kingdom . . . 135,000
Japan 81,000
France 60,000
Italy 60,000

C. Cruisers

Maximum tonnage permitted to:
U. S. A.:
Cruisers class A, with a gun calibre of more than 15.5 cm.	180,000
Cruisers class B, with a gun calibre of 15.5 cm. or less	143,500
Total	323,500

United Kingdom:
Cruisers class A . . .	146,800
Cruisers class B . . .	192,200
Total	339,000

Japan:
Cruisers class A . . .	108,400
Cruisers class B . . .	100,450
Total	208,850

The number of heavy cruisers from this tonnage may not exceed for:

U. S. A.	18
England	15
Japan	12

In this case also there were transition provisions. England, for example, was permitted to retain the four cruisers of the "Hawkins" class, with 19 cm. guns, independently of the stipulated number of 15 heavy cruisers, until 1936.

No limitation.

There exists, however, a tacit agreement between U. S. A. and England that the former will observe the building pause for heavy cruisers and for light cruisers over 8000 tons only as long as England does not increase the number of her cruisers beyond 70.

D. Destroyers

Maximum tonnage permitted to:	No limitation whatever.
U. S. A.	150,000
United Kingdom . . .	150,000
Japan	105,000

Not more than 16% of this tonnage may be used for destroyers over 1500 tons.

10% of the tonnage stipulated for destroyers may be used for B cruisers instead of for destroyers. On the other hand, 10% of the stipulated B cruiser tonnage may be transferred to destroyer tonnage.

E. Submarines

Maximum tonnage permitted to:	No limitation whatever.
U. S. A.	52,700
United Kingdom . . .	52,700
Japan	52,700

Washington and London Treaties of 1930, valid until December 31st 1936

Treaty of London 1936, valid from January 1st 1937 to December 31st 1942

Qualities of the individual Ship of the various Types in Respect of Displacement and Gun Calibre

(Qualitative Limitation)

A. Battleships

Maximum tonnage permitted	35 000
Largest gun calibre permitted	40.6 cm.

Two classes of battleship:

Class A:
Maximum size . . .	35,000 tons
Maximum size . . .	17,500 tons
Largest gun calibre permitted	35.6 cm.

If one of the signatory powers of the Washington Treaty does not agree to this calibre by April 1st 1937 the largest admissible calibre remains 40.6 cm.

Smallest gun calibre permitted	25.4 cm.
--	----------

Classe B:
Maximum size . . .	8000 tons
Calibre limitations as in Class A.

Building restriction for the zone between 17,500 and 8000 tons and the minimum calibre of 25.4 cm. to hold good for six years.

B. Aircraft-carriers

Maximum size permitted for new constructions . . .	27,000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted for ships of more than 10,000 tons . . .	20.3 cm.
for ships of less than 10,000 tons . . .	15.5 cm.
Maximum size permitted for new constructions . . .	23,000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted . . .	15.5 cm.

C. and D. Cruisers and Destroyers

A Cruisers:
Maximum size permitted	10,000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted	20.3 cm.
B Cruisers:
Maximum size permitted	10,000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted	15.2 cm.
Destroyers:
Maximum size permitted	1850 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted	13 cm.

The class of light surface vessels was created. It comprises surface war vessels with the exception of aircraft-carriers, small war vessels (s. and F.), or auxiliary vessels (s. and G.) with a displacement of between 100 and 10,000 tons carrying no gun with a greater calibre than 20.3 cm.

This class comprises three sub-classes:

Sub - class A: Vessels with a greater gun calibre than 15.5 cm.

Sub - class B: Vessels of more than 3000 tons, with guns whose largest calibre is 15.5 cm.

Sub - class C: Vessels of less than 3000 tons, with guns whose largest calibre is 15.5 cm.

A building pause of six years was agreed upon for all vessels belonging to sub-class A, and for vessels in sub-class B whose displacement is over 8000 tons.

Washington and London Treaties of 1930, valid until December 31st 1936

Treaty of London 1936, valid from January 1st 1937 to December 31st 1942

E. Submarines

Maximum size permitted 2000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted 13 cm.
Each of the three signatory powers might build three boats.

Maximum size permitted 2000 tons
Maximum gun calibre permitted 13 cm.

F. Small War-craft

No limitation is placed on surface fighting vessels of between 600 and 2000 tons, if

- a) they carry no larger calibre than 15.5 cm.,
- b) they carry not more than four guns with over 7.6 cm. calibre,
- c) they possess no torpedo armament,
- d) their speed does not exceed 20 knots.

Permissible small war-craft are surface war-craft, with the exception of auxiliary craft (s. and G.), with a displacement of between 100 and 2000 tons, that

- a) carry no greater calibre than 15.5 cm.,
- b) that have no torpedo armament,
- c) attain a speed of not more than 20 knots.

G. Auxiliary Craft

Surface craft in the navy that are not built as fighting ships and will not be used for fighting purposes, are subjected to no limitations, if

- a) they carry no gun with a calibre exceeding 15.5 cm.,
- b) they carry no more than four guns with a calibre exceeding 7.6 cm.,
- c) they have no torpedo armament,
- d) their speed does not exceed 20 knots,
- e) they are not armour-clad,
- f) they are not built as mine-layers,
- g) they are not equipped for air-craft to be landed on them,
- h) they have not more than one catapult for air-craft in the line of the ship, or one at each side,
- i) they are able, with any means whatever, to put not more than three air-craft in activity at sea.

Admissible auxiliary craft are naval surface vessels with displacement over 100 tons that are normally not used as fighting ships, and are not built as such, when

- a) they carry no gun with greater calibre than 15.5 cm.,
- b) they carry not more than eight guns with greater calibre than 7.6 cm.,
- c) they have no torpedo armament,
- d) they are not armour-clad,
- e) their speed does not exceed 28 knots,
- f) they are not primarily equipped to be used by air-craft at sea,
- g) they carry not more than two catapults for air-craft.

H. Small Vessels

Surface fighting ships of the navy with displacement less than 600 tons are subjected to no limitation.

Admissible small vessels are surface naval vessels with displacement less than 100 tons. They are subjected to no limitation.

Washington and London Treaties of 1930, valid until December 31st 1936

Treaty of London 1936, valid from January 1st 1937 to December 31st 1942

Age Limits

Vessels of the following types are regarded as being superannuated when the number of years given in the same line with them have elapsed since their completion:

- | | |
|--|--|
| a) Battleships 20 years | a) Battleships 26 years |
| b) Aircraft-carriers 20 " | b) Aircraft-carriers 20 " |
| c) Ships between 3000 and 10,000 tons | c) Light surface vessels of sub-classes A and B |
| I) when laid down before January 1st 1920 16 " | I) when laid down before January 1st 1920 16 " |
| II) when laid down after December 31st 1919 20 " | II) when laid down after December 31st 1919 20 " |
| d) Ships of less than 3000 tons | d) Light surface vessels of sub-class C 16 " |
| I) when laid down before January 1st 1920 12 " | e) Submarines 13 " |
| II) when laid down after December 31st 1919 16 " | |
| e) Submarines 13 " | |

Security Clauses

a) In regard to the number of battleships and of aircraft-carriers and in regard to the qualitative restrictions for cruisers:

If one of the signatory powers considers that altered circumstances compel it to deviate from the provisions set down, a conference on the matter must be summoned.

b) In regard to the other limitations:

If the security of one of the Treaty powers is, in its opinion, impaired by new constructions by a power that did not sign the Treaty, it may increase its total tonnage. The other signatory powers will, however, thereby be entitled on their part to take measures to increase their tonnage to the same extent in the same types of vessel.

Deviation from the regulation is permitted in case of unforeseen entanglement in war, and in the case that powers which did not sign the Treaty build ships immoderately.

Validity

The provisions concerning battleships and aircraft carriers and the qualitative provisions concerning cruisers are valid only for France and Italy. All the provisions are valid for U.S.A., United Kingdom, and Japan.

The Treaty is valid provisionally only for U.S.A., England, and France.

The fastest

The American destroyer "Aylwin"

Launch: 1935/36
 Displacement: 1356 tons
 Engine power: 41,000 HP
 Speed: 36.5 knots
 Range: 6000 seamiles
 Armament: five 12.7 cm. anti-aircraft, four 1 cm. anti-aircraft and 8 machine guns, eight 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The French torpedo cruiser "Le Fantasque"

Launch: 1933/34
 Displacement: 2569 tons
 Engine power: 74,000 to 100,000 HP
 Speed: 37 to 45.2 knots
 Range: 2500 seamiles
 Armament:
 five 13.8 cm. guns,
 four 3.7 cm. anti-aircraft guns,
 nine 55 cm. torpedo tubes
 4 bomb-throwers

The Italian large destroyer "Antonio Pigafetta"

Launch: 1928—30
 Displacement: 1628 tons
 Engine power: 50,000—71,000 HP
 Speed: 38—44 knots
 Armament: six 12 cm. guns, four 3.7 cm. anti-aircraft and
 8 machine guns,
 six 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes,
 50 mines on board

The Japanese destroyer of the first class "Amagiri"

Launch: 1929—31
 Displacement: 1700 tons
 Engine power: 40,000—50,000 HP
 Speed: 34 knots
 Range: 4000 seamiles
 Armament: six 12.7 cm. guns,
 4 machine guns,
 nine 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The English flotilla-leader "Hardy"

Launch: 1936
 Displacement: 1455 tons
 Speed: 36 knots
 Armament: five 12 cm. guns,
 7 machine guns,
 eight 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The French cruiser "Emile Bertin"

Launch: 1933
 Displacement: 5886 tons
 Engine power: 102,000—123,000 HP
 Speed: 34—39.8 knots
 Range: 6000 seamiles
 Armament: nine 15.2 cm. guns,
 four 9 cm. anti-aircraft, eight 3.7 cm. anti-aircraft and
 8 machine guns,
 six 55 cm. torpedo tubes,
 2 aircraft and 200 mines on board

Battle Ships in the World

The English flotilla-leader "Codrington"

Launch: 1929
Displacement: 1540 tons
Engine power: 39,000 HP
Speed: 35—38 knots
Range: 5900 seamiles
Armament: five 12 cm. guns,
7 machine guns,
eight 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The French heavy cruiser "Gloire"

Launch: 1935
Displacement: 7729 tons
Speed: 32.5 knots
Armament: nine 15.5 cm. guns, eight 9 cm. and eight 3.7 cm.
anti-aircraft guns, and
8 machine guns

The English destroyer "Hyperion"

Launch: 1936
Displacement: 1350 tons
Engine power: 34,000 HP
Speed: 35.5 knots
Range: 6000 seamiles
Armament: four 12 cm. guns,
7 machine guns,
eight 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes

The Italian light cruiser "Armando Diaz"

Launch: 1932
Displacement: 5008 tons
Speed: 37—40.7 knots
Armament: eight 5.2 cm. guns, six 10 cm. and eight 3.7 cm.
anti-aircraft, and 8 machine guns,
six 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes,
mines, 2 aircraft on board

The American light cruiser "Marblehead"

Launch: 1923
Displacement: 7050 tons
Engine power: 90,000—105,000 HP
Speed: 34.8 knots
Range: 10,000 seamiles
Armament: eleven 15.2 cm. guns, four 7.6 cm. anti-aircraft,
two 4.7 cm. anti-aircraft,
four 1 cm. anti-aircraft guns,
six 53.3 cm. torpedo tubes,
3 aircraft on board, and 30 mines

The survey of the navies of the world, which the British Admiralty submits to Parliament each year as a Blue Book and which was published this year on February 27th, gives the following figures of completed warships: United Kingdom 382, U.S.A. 357, Japan 256, France 233, and Italy 309. The survey gives the following figures for vessels under construction: United Kingdom 94, U.S.A. 91, Japan 36, France 38, and Italy 30; in addition, vessels planned for which no building plan has yet been published: U.S.A. 3, Japan 5, and France 26 (including 7 more large submarines).

A comparison with the previous year shows that the general acceleration in warship construction which, was at that time noticeable has further increased.

B. The Building Policy of the Naval Powers and their Building Proposals for the next few Years

United Kingdom.

Until the Abyssinian crisis England undoubtedly made greater efforts than any of the other leading naval Powers to restrict her naval armament to the minimum extent that, in the opinion of her responsible statesmen, seemed compatible with the tasks of such a great world empire. The Mediterranean conflict showed, however, that England had carried this policy too far, and that an exaggerated economy in expenditure for armaments carried out for numbers of years cannot but have detrimental political consequences for a great Power. The new situation that arose in the Mediterranean, the failure of the League of Nations in the Abyssinian question, and the very meagre outcome of the London Treaty of March, 1936, thus combined to bring about a change in the British naval armament policy. England had, up till the year 1936, taken advantage only in a hesitating manner of the possibilities in respect of the light war-ship classes offered by the treaties for the renovation of the fleets. It is true that the actual tonnage in the light cruiser, destroyer, and submarine classes exceeded very considerably by the end of the year 1936 that fixed for England according to the old treaties, but it included a very high percentage of out-of-date vessels.

In order to remedy this drawback at the earliest possible moment it was decided to accelerate the laying down of a large number of light war vessels. Three supplementary estimates were sanctioned in the year 1936 that provided, among other items, for the additional construction of 1 aircraft-carrier, 2 light cruisers, 16 destroyers, and 4 submarines. In order to raise the number of cruisers and destroyers advantage was taken towards the end of the year of the so-called "Sliding clause" of the London Treaty of 1930, which permits a Power to increase the size of its navy if extraordinary political circumstances justify it in taking such a step. The British Government informed its co-signatories that it intended to retain the 5 cruisers of C class and 40,000 destroyer tonnage that it ought to have scrapped by December 31st, 1936.

The number of the crews of the British navy is to be raised by March 31st, 1937, by 6000 to 7000 to a total of 101,000.

The naval estimates for the year 1936, including those introduced supplementarily, amounted to £81,300,000.—, being an increase of £16,400,000.— over those of the preceding year.

It is already clear that England intends not only to renovate her fleet within the scope of treaties already in force, but also to strengthen it numerically in the light cruiser and destroyer classes. Although the fundamental equality of the English and the United States navies was confirmed after the conclusion of the London Treaty of 1936, in letters exchanged by Eden and Norman Davis, the Americans will probably take no exception to the raising of the number of English cruisers from 50 to 70. The number of 70 cruisers accords with an English demand of long standing, and it may be assumed that the British cruiser fleet will be expanded to this extent in the course of the next few years. On the other hand, it seems to be possible that England will not increase the number of her battle-ships for the present, but will simply renovate those now in existence.

U. S. A.

Congress empowered the Government, by the Vinson-Trammell Bill of 1934, to build up the American fleet to the full extent permitted by the naval treaties. This programme has been systematically carried out, and the following was the situation at the end of the year 1936:

In the classes comprising battle-ships, aircraft-carriers, and cruisers the full number of vessels permitted by the treaties has been constructed or is in building. Only in the case of destroyers and submarines has full advantage not been taken of the amount of tonnage authorised for new constructions, as in both classes there are still in commission very many out-of-date though still serviceable vessels. As their total tonnage still considerably exceeds the limits permitted by treaty, out-of-date destroyers to the extent of 30,000 tons and out-of-date submarines to the extent of 20,000 tons must be withdrawn from service. The destroyer tonnage to be withdrawn from service would have been greater by 59,000 tons if England had not invoked the "Sliding clause" of the London Treaty, and announced that she was retaining in service beyond December 31st, 1936, out-of-date destroyers with a total of 40,000 tons, and 5 cruisers of C class. This announcement justifies the United States in following the same procedure, and its government has informed England and Japan that it intends to avail itself of this right.

The new constructions contemplated for the year 1937 have already been authorised and laid down, as the budget year 1937 began on July 1st, 1936. They are included in the classification under A., with the exception of two new battle-ships, whose construction might not commence until after January 1st, 1937. The United States had declared that it would for the present build battle-ships only if other naval Powers constructed such vessels. When, therefore, England announced that she would lay down two battle-ships for 1937 the United States followed suit. The ships were to be of 35,000 tons, with a maximum gun calibre in all probability of 40.6 cm., unless Japan had declared by April 1st, 1937, her agreement with the calibre limit of 35.6 cm. In the case of Japan expressing such agreement the latter calibre would come into force. In the meantime, however, Japan has announced that she does not agree to the restriction of gun calibres to 35.6 cm.

In regard to the naval air armaments the number of planes is to be brought up to 1692 by June 30th, 1937. In the year 1942 the number is to be about 1910.

The number of the crews in the whole navy is to be raised by June 30th, 1937, from 93,500 to 100,000, and the naval corps from 16,000 to 17,000 men.

The naval estimates for 1937 amounted to 592 million dollars, corresponding almost exactly with those of the preceding year.

There is no indication at present that the United States intends to increase the actual extent and strength of its fleet as authorised by treaty, unless under compulsion. The two new battle-ships newly laid down merely replace out-of-date vessels.

Japan.

Japan also has availed herself of almost all the tonnage accorded to her by the old naval treaties. When the ships in building are completed there will remain still available only a not out-of-date tonnage in the destroyer class to the amount of about 5500 tons.

On the invoking by England of the "Sliding clause" of Article 16 of the old London Treaty in respect of 40,000 destroyer tonnage, Japan declared that she intended to use the right thus accruing to her to augment her out-of-date tonnage by 28,000 tons in retaining 11,059 tons of out-of-date destroyer tonnage and 15,598 tons of out-of-date submarine tonnage. The reason for this procedure is probably that Japan has not 28,000 tons of out-of-date destroyer tonnage. What Japan proposes to do to counter-balance the longer retention in service by England of the 5 C cruisers has not yet been announced.

Nothing certain is known concerning Japan's further building intentions. It seems to be certain, however, that Japan also will take in hand the construction of large war ships in the year 1937. The statements as to their number vary between two and four, while no exact information concerning the size and the maximum gun calibre of these ships is forthcoming. It may be assumed, however, that the new Japanese battle-ships will not differ essentially in their leading features from those of the other great naval Powers.

It is stated in the press that the view is held in authoritative Japanese naval circles that the Japanese fleet must be enlarged by 200,000 tons by the year 1942, in order that it may be equal to the international situation. The realisation of this programme would, however, necessitate the new construction of from 30,000 to 40,000 tons per annum. The Japanese press points out further that the submarine arm must before all things be strengthened, and according to information proceeding from an English source the Japanese intend to bring the number of their submarines up to 90. For the rest, the chief importance is attached to light cruisers, fast mine-boats, and medium aircraft-carriers. These numerous light fighting craft are to serve mainly to secure the connections with the Asiatic mainland and the waters between the Japanese islands.

France.

France has used the first decade since the Washington Treaty to create for herself an imposing fleet of cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. On the other hand, she hesitated for a long time to devote to new constructions the battleship and aircraft-carrier tonnage accorded to her by the said Treaty. Since the year 1932, however, she has been building systematically in the battleship domain. The Navy Minister declared in December, 1936, that France intended to put 5 battleships, each of 35,000 tons, in commission by the year 1943. It seems that no decision has yet been taken in respect of the building of aircraft-carriers, but there can be no doubt that France will lay down vessels of this class also during the next few years.

The new constructions provisionally planned for the year 1937 are:

- 1 light cruiser of 8000 tons,
- 2 destroyers of each 1850 tons,
- 4 destroyers of a newer type, each of 1000 tons,
- 7 submarines,
- some gun-boats and small war-vessels.

The figures show clearly that France intends to apply primarily to the augmentation of her heavy fighting forces the funds voted for her sea power, though without quite neglecting the light armaments.

The expenditure provided for in the navy estimates for 1937 amounts to 4,400,000,000 francs, which is an increase of about 30 per Cent over that of the preceding year.

Italy.

The expansion of the Italian navy was greatly interrupted by the Abyssinian enterprise, but is now being resumed with forceful energy. Up to the present nothing definite has been published concerning the building plans for 1937, but there is no doubt that Italy is determined to maintain a naval force corresponding with her needs. The extent of the new construction undertaken for the expansion of this naval power and the building pace are, it is very probable, greatly influenced by French measures in this domain. Some indication of the extent of the enlargement of the Italian fleet in the course of the coming year is given by the announcement that the number of the men employed on naval vessels will be raised from 51,800 to 60,000.

The new-construction battleship tonnage accorded to Italy until the end of 1936 by the Washington Treaty was entirely used up in 1934 by the laying down of two battleships of each 35,000 tons. On the other hand, Italy has not, up to the present, built any aircraft-carriers.

Russia

Soviet Russia has re-joined the circle of great naval Powers during the past few years, and has done this in a manner that has almost escaped public attention. Until 1932 the Soviet Union had contented itself with renovating the ships of the Tsarist navy that were still in existence, but in that year it commenced building new ships, and has augmented these activities from year to year. The new constructions comprised destroyers, torpedoboats, and especially submarines. It can be stated without exaggeration that Russia has at her disposal today the strongest submarine fleet in the world! But apart from this Russia's rapid rise to the position of a naval power of importance in the world is amazing.

Orloff, the commander-in-chief of the Russian navy, declared at the meeting of the Moscow Council Congress in 1936 that since the year 1933 the number of Soviet Russian submarines had been increased seven fold, the light war vessels three fold, and the maritime flying-boats five fold. In respect of the naval construction policy he stated:

"The Soviet government intends to complete in the near future a second imposing naval building programme, that comprises ships of all classes and equipped with the finest technical resources."

What ships the Soviet authorities have primarily in mind was revealed during the Anglo-Russian naval treaty negotiations, when the Soviet Union disclosed its intention to build first of all 2 battleships of 35,000 tons each, with 40.6 cm guns, and 7 heavy cruisers of 8000 tons each, with 18 cm guns!

It would be interesting to know within what period Russia proposes to complete this programme, and what will be her following naval construction policy.

Reflections on General Naval Policy in 1936

The Straits Convention of Montreux, of July 21st, 1936

Besides the London Naval Treaty other agreements were arrived at in the year 1936, and other negotiations were conducted that are of importance for the general naval policy of the maritime countries.

In the first place the new Dardanelles Treaty of Montreux may be mentioned, by means of which Turkey recovered the right to arm at will the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus. The Treaty was concluded with Turkey by Bulgaria, England, France, Greece, Japan, Yugoslavia, Roumania, and the Soviet Union. It is especially important also because it regulates anew the provisions concerning the passage of warships through the Dardanelles.

The fight for the Straits—by which are meant the Dardanelles, i.e. the straits between the Mediterranean and the Sea of Marmara, the Sea of Marmara itself and the Bosphorus, leading from there to the Black Sea—is one of the oldest problems in modern European history. The reciprocal action of geography and politics is nowhere so obvious as in the narrow connecting channel between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. The Russian Empire, whose access to the sea was impeded on all sides by great geographical obstacles, after the conquest of Azov by Peter the Great at the end of the 17th century, never lost sight of Byzantium as the key position to the Black Sea, the outlet to the world and a gateway for the invasion of South Russia, and every settlement of the question of the Straits was never more than an armistice in the struggle carried on at times with military and at other times with diplomatic means between Russia and her various rivals in the Mediterranean, especially between England and Russia, though France also could have no interest in placing the key to the Dardanelles in Russian hands.

Since the foundation of the British Empire in India and the simultaneous extension of Russian rule to the northern and eastern shores of the Black Sea, the freedom of the Straits has been the constant anxiety of British eastern policy. The Straits constantly occupied the central point of the Eastern Question, i.e.

the dissolution of the European possessions of the Ottoman Empire into their natural, national component parts, which was favoured by Russia and hindered by England.

The rivalry of the two Great Powers was bound to come to a head as soon as the Black Sea ceased to be a mare clausum, a Turkish inland sea, which it had been since the end of the 15th century. This took place in 1774 when Russia succeeded in gaining the right in the Peace of Kutchuk Kainardji to sail merchant ships under the Russian flag over the Black Sea. The year 1774 is therefore also regarded as the birth year of the freedom of the Straits for merchant ships. For the first time the Ottoman key turned in the Dardanelles lock.

From that year the efforts of Russia and of the Tsars were directed towards the conquest of Constantinople, the Byzantium of old, and the Straits, not only in order to realise an old political dream, but also to secure free access to the Mediterranean as an economic necessity, at any rate by the unhindered passage of Russian warships and the closing of the passage to the ships of other nations. This endeavour on the part of Russia, however, was bound to arouse not only the resistance of Turkey, who found her possessions threatened, but also to bring England upon the scene, since she regarded this vast increase in the strength of the Russian Empire, together with the simultaneous rise of a new Great Power in the Mediterranean as a disturbance of European equilibrium and a threat to the sea route to India.

Thus 1798 saw the start of the great game of the opening and closing of the Straits. From 1774 to 1923 no fewer than fourteen European treaties were concluded settling the passage of the Straits differently according to the existing constellation of political power, in some of which the English view prevailed that the Straits should be open, while in others a "settlement" was reached in the sense of a restricted freedom according to the importance of the victory won by the Russians in their wars against the Turks and according to the liberty granted to the Russians by the other Great Powers to make the most of a victory. The sufferer in this struggle was always Turkey, the "sick man" on the Bosphorus, who nevertheless for decades obtained substantial advantages and to some extent remained alive by constantly altering the clauses of his testament.

The last remains of her sovereignty were forfeited by Turkey in the dictated peace of Sèvres in 1919 at the end of the Great War. Nevertheless, the century-old Russian dream regarding the possession of this territory, which was on the point of being realised in the Great War under the Secret Treaty of March 18th 1915, was brought to nought by the collapse of the Empire of the Tsars. And when the brilliant victory of the Turks over the Greeks frustrated England's dream as to at any rate an internationalisation of the Straits with British right of intervention and possibly even a Middle Eastern Empire which would provide the link between the Eastern Mediterranean and India and, after Gibraltar and Suez, would bring the last means of exit from the Mediterranean into her power, England again assumed the role of the guardian of European equilibrium and the Straits acquired even greater importance in view of the experiences of the Great War for which an eloquent testimony was provided by the enormous loss of ships and men at Gallipoli.

In the meantime General Mustafa Kemal, the liberator of Turkey, to whom the nation subsequently gave the name Atatürk, the father of the Turkish people, in two years of violent struggle against internal and external foes, had shattered the cracked piece of Sèvres porcelain. The Ottoman Empire with all the unworthy elements of its decadent period disappeared and, under the leadership of Kemal, a Turkey arose, renewed politically and morally, as a national State restricted to Asia Minor and Eastern Thrace. The dictated peace of Sèvres remained what it deserved to remain, a scrap of paper.

On July 24th 1923 it was replaced by the Peace Treaty of Lausanne, which finally put an end to the state of war and reconstructed the foundations of friendly and economic relations between England, France, Italy, Greece, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Japan and Turkey, while an additional agreement, as the last remains of the dictated peace of Sèvres, established a new statute for the freedom of the Straits, which was also signed by Soviet Russia and Bulgaria. It again proclaimed the principle of the freedom of passage and shipping and compelled Turkey, in order to safeguard this position, to demilitarise and disarm the Straits to a depth of 15–20 km. on both banks. The only exception was Constantinople and its immediate surroundings, where Turkey was allowed to maintain a garrison of 12,000 men, an arsenal and a shipping base.

The strength of a fleet belonging to an external State and entering the Black Sea in peace time was limited to three ships of 10,000 tons each and was in no case to exceed the navy of the strongest riparian State. In a war in which Turkey did not take part ships of the belligerents could pass without restriction. Turkey was to be entitled to prevent shipping only if she herself took part in the war and in the case of an enemy fleet. In order to supervise these provisions a Straits Commission was formed consisting of representatives of England, France, Italy, Japan, Bulgaria, Greece, Roumania and Turkey.

The main Powers, however, realised that the disarming of such an important connecting route was a serious disadvantage even for the reduced territory of Turkey. Her national defence was impaired by this open gap. In order to offer her a certain amount of compensation, England, France, Italy and Japan undertook in Article 18 of the agreement to ensure that certain measures would be taken in a war in which Turkey herself might be implicated. This protection and its execution, however, again depended on corresponding decisions of the League of Nations.

It is well known that though the Moscow Government signed the Lausanne Treaty and the Straits Convention, it never recognised them; for a better understanding of further events it is necessary to turn back the pages of post-war history fifteen years.

The Lausanne Conference began on November 20th 1922 without the participation of the Soviet Union. It was only in December that M. Chicherin, then Foreign Commissary, contrived to arrange that a representative of Russia should be called in at any rate for questions of vital interest to the Soviet Union, and therefore in particular for the question of the Straits. His participation was, however, restricted to certain points. The Soviet Russians had in numerous declarations renounced all claim to continue the imperialistic policy of Tsarism against Turkey. From the point of view of Moscow the sacrifice of the century-old Russian dreams of the Dardanelles seemed a very small matter. The new authorities in Moscow remembered the words of a diplomat from the time of Peter the Great that the role of Russia in Turkey was very much simpler than was generally assumed: Russia must be either the greatest enemy or the greatest friend of Turkey. The world political constellation offered Bolshevik Russia the alternative of friendship with Turkey. It was on this basis that the Russo-Turkish Treaty of Friendship was concluded in Moscow on March 6th 1921. Turkey waived her Trans-Caucasian conquests, which she was unable to hold, and Moscow gave up the goal of Constantinople, the acquisition of which would never have been possible against the will of the Western Powers. It was the time of the most determined anti-Soviet policy in Paris and London.

In the question of the Straits, Chicherin proved to be more Turkish than the Turks. In a statement on December 4th he said: "There must be lasting guarantees for the maintenance of peace in the Black Sea and in the Near East; that is to say, the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus must be permanently closed both in peace and war to warships and aircraft. The Russian Government, and its allies (the Soviet Republics), basing their argument on the fact that the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus belong to Turkey, insist on the re-establishment of the full rights of the Turkish people over Turkish territory and waters. They insist further on the fact that the Turkish Government will only be in a position to defend the Straits and the Sea of Marmara if it is entitled to maintain a war fleet and to apply to such defence all the technical accessories of modern warfare. From the economic point of view and from that of defence, such a solution establishes the only possible guarantee for the most vital and elementary interests of Russia and her allies (the Soviet Republics). One need only recall the occupation of Odessa, Nikolaiev, Kherson, Sebastopol, Batum and other ports of the Black Sea by the Allies. It was only the passage of the Allied naval forces through the Straits which enabled the armies of Denekin and Wrangel to be supported in their fight against the Governments of Russia and her allies."

Chicherin did not refrain from giving the true reasons for Moscow's interest in the closing of the Straits. His arguments were in the strongest opposition to those of Lord Curzon, the British representative and President of the Conference, who desired to secure the "freedom of the seas", while it was clear to the Bolshevik Commissary of Foreign Affairs that the British wanted in all eventualities to maintain the necessary freedom of operation in the Near East and against the Soviet power. The Turks, though wishing the Russian representatives to take part in the work of the Conference, were not prepared to insist on this demand when they observed that it could only place them in a worse position as regards the Entente. Curzon came to an agreement over Chicherin's head with the Turkish negotiator Ismed Pasha as to the formula for the opening of the Straits for all merchant ships and Turkish agreement to refrain from fortifying the banks of the Sea of Marmara. It was during this time that Curzon sent his so-called ultimatum to the Soviet Government (May 8th 1923) which almost led to the breaking off of the new relations between London and Moscow. In view of the new dangers which threatened from England, the Soviet Government could do no other than sign the Straits Convention on July 14th 1923. In a statement on July 21st, however, Chicherin said: "The Soviet Government reserves the right in future to raise the question of a modification of the Straits Convention. As a precaution it declares that the Soviet Republics will be compelled to raise the question of its suspension should it be proved in practice that their economic and national defence interests are not sufficiently safeguarded."

For Bolshevik Russia it was no longer a question of obtaining a free passage through the Dardanelles, but of preventing others from entering the Black Sea. In the question of the Straits she occupied a defensive position which was to serve her own security and which she thought would be best safeguarded if war ships were not allowed to pass through the Dardanelles and also if Turkey, with whom she was on friendly terms and who was dependent on her help, guarded the Straits.

France and England again stood on the anti-Russian side at Lausanne as on previous occasions. The old fronts were reconstructed, but their mottos were reversed. Neither London nor Paris was willing to sacrifice such an important route as the Dardanelles for reasons of Russian security. The British interests in the Mediterranean and the French policy of alliances in South-Eastern Europe demanded the opposite of what the Soviet Union required.

Turkey was obliged for the time being to accept this last restriction of her sovereignty without any prospect of seeing her sovereignty restored in the near future either by a free act or by a new decision of the Guarantor Powers. On the other hand, the Lausanne decisions brought the young Republic up against the most urgent foreign political task: the revision of the Straits Convention. To this end Atatürk devoted his entire internal and external policy: in internal policy, by continuing to strengthen the Ottoman Empire which had collapsed in 1919 by means of internal reforms and a consolidation of national sentiment; in foreign policy, by constantly improving the military and international political position of the State. This last objective was served primarily by the Agreement of Friendship concluded with the Soviet Union in 1921, and further by the development of relations with the Balkan States which ultimately led in 1934 to the conclusion of the Balkan Pact. In so far as the Turkish position became stronger, while the international situation became constantly more confused, the time was bound to approach when Turkey would think it a favourable moment to put forward her claim. The decisive event was the advance upon Abyssinia by Italy, who had always been, either openly or secretly, one of Turkey's opponents in the Mediterranean. The Anglo-Italian opposition in the Mediterranean could not but favour the Turkish plan, and when England approached the other Mediterranean Powers in January in order to bring them into a common front against Italy, Turkey linked up the declaration of her agreement with the announcement of her Dardanelles claim.

When, at the beginning of 1936, the law on the application of financial and economic sanctions against Italy was submitted to the Kamutay—the Turkish National Assembly—for approval, Dr. Aras, the Foreign Minister, gave the reasons for the Turkish attitude in the question of sanctions. On this, as on many previous occasions, he referred to the Turkish demand for the rearmament of the Dardanelles. He again expressed the hope that the "allied and associated Powers" would show comprehension for this need, and gave it to be understood that Turkey would take independent action as soon as any danger arose.

While units of the British home fleet still lay at anchor in Gibraltar and the other British naval bases in the Mediterranean and feverish activity was being displayed for the military strengthening of those bases, while Italian transport ships with dimmed lights and with more and more troops and ammunition were traversing the Suez Canal and the Anglo-Italian difference which had arisen out of the war in Abyssinia was drifting towards a further danger point in which the agreement of mutual assistance between England and the other Mediterranean Powers threatened to involve the latter, the Turkish Government was preparing a fresh surprise for the Signatories of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne.

In a note handed in on April 11th 1936 in London, Paris, Rome, Tokio, Moscow, Sofia, Athens, Belgrade, Bucharest and Geneva, the Turkish Government demanded by means of negotiations the revision of the Straits Convention of Juli 23rd 1923.

This note is of great interest from various points of view; it puts an end to the illusions of the post-war period and states frankly and not without irony that experience of security guarantees within the framework of the League of Nations and of the collective system of international Powers had been so bad that the Turkish Government preferred henceforward to provide by her own means for her own territory, namely for the Straits and for the former capital Constantinople.

"In 1923, when Turkey agreed at Lausanne to sign the Straits Convention prescribing freedom of transit and demilitarisation, the general situation of Europe, from the political and military point of view, presented an aspect totally different from that of to-day.

Europe was progressing towards disarmament, and the political organisation of Europe was to be based solely on the unchanging principles of law embodied in international engagements. The land, naval and air forces were much less formidable and were showing a tendency towards decrease. At that time, Turkey signed the restrictive clauses of the Straits Convention. She had the assurance given her by Article 18, which added to the guarantee afforded by Article 10 of the Covenant of the League of Nations an undertaking that the signatories and in any case four great Powers conjointly undertook, by all the means decided upon for that purpose, by the Council of the League, the defence of the Straits if threatened.

Since then, the situation in the Black Sea has come to present an aspect of concord which has been reassuring in every respect. Uncertainty has gradually arisen, however, in the Mediterranean; naval conferences have shown a tendency towards re-armament, and the naval shipyards will soon launch upon the seas vessels of a power never previously attained. In the air, the curve of increase has shown a swift upward turn, and continental and insular fortifications are constantly being multiplied.

During this complete change of conditions the only guarantee intended to guard against the total insecurity of the Straits has just disappeared in its turn, and while the Powers most closely concerned are proclaiming the existence of a threat of general conflagration, Turkey finds herself exposed at her most vulnerable point to the worst dangers without any counterpart for this disquieting insecurity.

In response to the urgent demands addressed to her, Turkey accepted the demilitarisation of the Straits, then wholly occupied by foreign forces, after having very fully considered, in the existing conditions, the value of the minimum guarantees granted to her in order that the demilitarisation of the Straits and of the contiguous zones should not constitute an unjustifiable danger to the military security of Turkey.

To Article 18 of the Convention, which provided a guarantee of security indissolubly bound up with the body of clauses regulating the regime of the Straits, the signatories attached such importance that they solemnly affirmed that the guarantee in question formed an integral part of the clauses regarding demilitarisation and freedom of transit.

This means that without an effective, practical and efficacious assurance, Turkey's sovereignty could not have been diminished over a portion of her territory the security of which is indispensable to that of the country as a whole.

It is also evident that if this guarantee becomes inoperative or uncertain, the equilibrium of the whole Convention is overthrown, to the prejudice of Turkey and to that of European peace.

Political crises have made it clear that the present machinery for collective guarantees is too slow in coming into operation and that a delayed decision is likely in most cases to cause the advantage of international action to be lost. It was for this reason that Turkey in 1923, like many other Powers at the present time, could not be content with the collective guarantee which would be ensured to her by the Covenant on her becoming a member of the League of Nations; that she considered the collective guarantee of all the signatories of the Straits Convention insufficient; and that only the conjoint guarantee of the four great Powers seemed to her calculated to ensure in the conditions then existing the minimum of security indispensable for her territorial integrity.

But, if this minimum itself it weakened or rendered problematical by political and military circumstances entirely different from those which existed when the security was given, the Government of the Republic cannot, without being guilty of serious negligence, expose the whole country to an irreparable coup de main.

The position of the guarantors of the security of the Straits vis-a-vis the League of Nations, the particular circumstances which render doubtful, to say the least, the effective military collaboration of these guarantors to secure the object assigned to them—these factors have upset the general economy of the Convention of 1923.

It cannot be said to-day that the security of the Straits is still ensured by a real guarantee, and Turkey cannot be asked to remain indifferent to the possibility of a dangerous failure to act.

Besides these considerations it should be added that the Straits Convention mentions only a state of peace and a state of war, Turkey being a neutral or a belligerent in the latter case, but does not provide for the contingency of a special or general threat of war or enable Turkey in such a case to provide for her legitimate defence.

It is amply proved to-day, however, that the most delicate stage of danger from without is this very stage of a threat of war in which a state of war may arise unexpectedly and without any formality.

This omission may in itself render the guarantees contemplated ineffective, whatever their value.

From the beginning of its existence the Turkish Republic has followed a policy of peace and understanding, the carrying-out of which in every field has necessarily imposed upon her sacrifices, often heavy sacrifices.

The Turkish Government has shown in the many circumstances which have arisen in the last decade, a spirit of conciliation, of loyalty to her engagements, and of sincere attachment to the cause of peace, which has been appreciated by all the Powers. Turkey is entitled to claim for herself the security which she has always ensured to others.

Circumstances independent of the will of the Lausanne signatories have rendered inoperative clauses which were drawn up in all good faith, and as the issue at stake is the existence of Turkey herself and the security of her whole territory, the Government of the Republic may be led to take before the nation the responsibility incumbent upon it by adopting the measures dictated by the imperative necessity of circumstances.

In view of the above considerations, and rightly holding that the provisions of Article 18 of the Straits Convention relating to a joint guarantee of the four great Powers have become uncertain and inoperative and that they can no longer in practice shield Turkey from an external danger to her territory, the Government of the Republic has the honour to inform the Powers which took part in the negotiations for the conclusion of the Straits Convention that it is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to arriving in the near future at the conclusion of agreements for regulation of the regime of the Straits under the conditions of security which are indispensable for the inviolability of Turkey's territory, and, in the most liberal spirit, for the constant development of commercial navigation between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea."

The note cleverly based its arguments on the Lausanne agreement. It stated that Turkey had only signed that agreement after the Guarantor Powers had guaranteed the joint defence of the Straits. But the new situation in the Mediterranean had created a state of affairs which, "to say the least, rendered doubtful" the effective military collaboration of these guarantors to secure the object assigned to them. The threat to the security of the Straits had, however, upset the general economy of the Convention of 1923.

Though there was no formal connection between the Straits Statute of Lausanne and the new phase of Mediterranean policy, the displacement in the political emphasis of the relations between the Mediterranean Powers brought about by the Abyssinian conflict created a new position which was bound to throw a different light also on that Statute.

The impression caused by the note was in general favourable especially as the Foreign Minister, Dr. Aras, had prepared the Powers concerned.

In doing so he left little doubt that the Conference was faced by a direct alternative: either the fulfilment of Turkey's demands in a new agreement or Turkey's withdrawal from the Lausanne Convention.

If the Conference had refused the demand, the result would presumably have been that Turkey would have seized her rights, declared herself "mistress in her own house", fortified the Straits without the agreement of the Contracting Parties, and autonomously settled the question of the passage of ships.

The endeavour of the Powers to keep the revision of treaties within "legal" limits, therefore, only left them the possibility of complying with Turkey's demands.

Turkey was specially supported by the Soviet Union and favourably judged in France, while England made the best of a bad business.

Italy, as a logical consequence of Mussolini's policy, took no part in the negotiations. She made her participation dependent on the raising of sanctions and of the agreements of mutual assistance to which they had given rise, which had in the meantime been put out of force by France and Greece.

It thus came about that no opposition was raised to the actual Turkish demand for refortification and remilitarisation. If these had been the only questions, the Conference, which began on June 22nd at Montreux, would have lasted at most a few days. But there was again the question of the right of passage.

In the draft of a new Straits Convention submitted by Turkey on June 22nd, the following demands were made:

Fortification of the Straits, abolition of the Straits Commission, prohibition of passage of foreign vessels in larger units than 14,000 tons and for other purposes than visits of ceremony, the restriction of foreign naval strength present at the same time to 28,000 tons, maximum stay in the Black Sea 15 days, previous notice of one month and prohibition to fly over the Straits. The same passage conditions were to apply to riparian States but were to be extended to include battleships. This meant, in short, that Russia would have in practice freedom of passage, while foreign Powers would be severely restricted, as was pointed out with special satisfaction by the French press (see "Temps" of July 9th).

The price demanded from England was therefore not small, and this at first stiffened the British attitude, finally led to two crises and almost caused the Conference to fail.

A further reason was the Franco-Russian attempt to arrange the new statute in such a way that the alliance between Moscow and Paris would gain. In the very first phase of the negotiations, as a result of the intervention of the Franco-Russian alliance, the discussion went over to the subject of general treaty and alliance policy, in order, when a favourable opportunity occurred, that this hotly contested treaty regarding the Straits Convention, with the danger which it involved for peace, might be declared to be "legitimate", while the free passage in both directions should be guaranteed not only on a decision of the League of Nations, but also in the service of that pact as a "part of the League obligations".

The "Temps", in its final article of July 17th, pointed out with undisguised joy that the new regime placed no obstacle in the way of the normal play of the agreements of mutual assistance concluded with the Soviet Government. The passage was free for merchant ships which in this manner ensured supplies for countries connected by special pacts. The Soviet Union thereby obtained particularly great satisfaction and any cooperation provided for in the Franco-Russian pact was entirely guaranteed.

England for a time maintained her resistance to this plan. In her opinion it was unreasonable to expect Turkey to carry out the provisions of treaties of which she was not a party, for instance, in the case of the Franco-Russian pact, to allow the fleets of both Powers to pass and then to turn her guns on a pursuing fleet.

The Anglo-Russian difference was composed by a formula of compromise, in the preparation of which the French representative Paul Boncour took the greatest part. Under the shadow of the Franco-Russian pact of mutual assistance he energetically supported his Russian colleague Litvinov without giving too much offence to the British. M. Boncour's work is in particular Article 19 of the new treaty which deals with the neutrality of Turkey in case of war. In this case foreign warships enjoy the same rights of passage under the same conditions as in time of peace. An exception is made for the ships of the belligerents themselves, to whom the passage is prohibited. This principle, and therefore also the neutrality of Turkey, are however subject to two important restrictions. A right of passage is also to be considered as guaranteed in the case of the exercise of League action. The view was thus accepted that neutrality forms no obstacle to action taken under the League Covenant. But this is not the only reference to the League of Nations. The Straits are also to be opened in order to bring assistance to an attacked State with which Turkey is connected by a "pact of assistance within the framework of the League of Nations". The aim of the second clause is therefore that the fulfilment of provisions of a pact binding Turkey to mutual assistance "within the framework of the League of Nations" also suspends the neutrality of Turkey.

In order therefore that the Franco-Russian pact may have effect in the Black Sea, Turkey would have to accede to a regional pact connecting her with France or with the Soviet Union. This might be done through the connection with Roumania which is allied with Turkey and with France. But Titulescu, who seconded Boncour so energetically at Montreux that he left the Conference in a fit of temper at the British resistance and rushed off to Bukarest, was soon afterwards removed from his office. The Tatarescu-Antonescu Government is less violent in its diplomatic actions. The Turco-Russian alliance of 1921 is also not very suitable as a connecting link, as it was neither concluded within the framework of the League of Nations nor registered with the Secretariat. France would therefore herself prefer to conclude a pact of mutual assistance with Turkey and has already put out feelers in Ankara in this sense. In the meantime Italy, who has not acceded to the treaty and therefore does not consider herself bound by its provisions, has again become more active in the Balkans and endeavoured, after reaching the "Peace in the Adriatic" by means of the Yugoslav-Italian Treaty of Friendship, to conclude a similar treaty with Ankara in the Eastern Mediterranean and the Near East where she has extraordinarily important economic and political interests to defend.

The reasons for this collapse on the part of England may be due to various considerations; in the first place that she was finally alone in her resistance; in the second place that she was faced by the alternative of either opposing the Russians together with a reconciled Italy or of making the agreement into an instrument of anti-Italian policy. It may also be that she expected that the Turkish Government would presumably not join the Franco-Russian system of pacts and in that case the automatic nature of this system would only come into play after Turkey had at least taken a share in determining who was the "aggressor" in a particular case and thus decided which belligerent Power was entitled to send its ships through the Straits. Lastly, as the Times correspondent wrote from Montreux on July 14th, in the present state of affairs in Europe it is difficult to imagine a war in the Black Sea in which Turkey would remain neutral.

But if Turkey is one of the belligerent Powers or if she feels herself menaced by the danger of war, she can at her discretion open or close the Straits to all foreign warships.

According to the Montreux Convention, in peace time the external States may not send any battleships, aircraft-carriers and submarines into the Black Sea. They may send light surface vessels and auxiliaries of a total not exceeding 30,000 tons and for a maximum period of three weeks into the Black Sea. Under certain conditions the maximum tonnage is raised to 45,000 tons. No one external State may have at the same time more than two-thirds of the total admissible tonnage in the Black Sea.

The right of passage of the Black Sea States is subject in peace time only to the restriction that their aircraft carriers may not pass the Dardanelles at all and that submarines must navigate on the surface and may only pass if they have been built outside the Black Sea and are proceeding to their ports in the Black Sea for the first time or if they are proceeding to shipyards outside the Black Sea for repairs.

The Straits Convention of Montreux of July 21th, 1936 thus undoubtedly represents a great success both for Turkish and Russian diplomacy. Russia has obtained for herself the greatest possible freedom of movement in using the Straits and at the same time greatly restricted the possibility of intervention by States not bordering on the Black Sea. Russia's naval and strategical position has thereby been greatly improved. The possibilities which this Convention offers to Russia in case of war strengthens Russian influence in peace time, especially in the Mediterranean, while its aggregate military effect will also be felt in the Baltic and Pacific, particularly when the development of the Russian navy, which has been announced, has become a reality.

Turkey has broken the last fetters of the Treaty of Lausanne. Her position under the new statute is extraordinarily strong and she will no doubt be courted to an increasing extent by the Powers concerned. The State of Atatürk has remained the victor in this, for the present, last fight for the Straits.

The Agreement on the Humanisation of Warfare in respect of Merchant Ships

The Submarine Treaty of November 16th, 1936

A further agreement which England in particular was anxious should be reached is the agreement on the humanisation of warfare in respect of merchant ships in accordance with the provisions of Part IV of the London Naval Agreement of 1930. It was signed on November 6th, 1936 by the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Japan, France and Italy and some time later by Germany and also by Russia.

This agreement has a very stormy previous history, in which the difference in interests and intentions became obvious. At the first Hague Peace Conference of 1899 when the submarine was still in its initial stages, Russia put forward the proposal that submarine warfare should be entirely forbidden. A number of States — including Germany and England — agreed provided the provision was universally applied, but France, America and Austria-Hungary caused the proposal to fail. At the second Peace Conference in 1907 the subject was not again referred to. Thus submarines were recognised under international law as an admissible means of warfare and were considered mainly as capable of blockading and defending ports. Their classification as war vessels could not be doubted in accordance with existing rules — war flag, military crew, State property. With the increasing possibility of their use and their increasing seaworthiness the experts began to study in detail the role they would play in warfare in respect of merchant ships. Though it might be doubtful in about 1914 whether the advocates of this role entirely overlooked the results for their own case and were quite clear as to the method of warfare which submarines would be obliged to use, the Great War threw all the desired light on this subject.

The great naval Powers, in particular Great Britain who had the greatest interest in suppressing unrestricted submarine warfare in respect of merchant ships on account of her very extensive maritime trade and her dependence on supplies by sea, repeatedly attempted to bring about a collective prohibition. The first attempt at the Naval Conference in Washington in 1922 failed. The second, made at the London Naval Conference in 1930, obtained the agreement of America and Japan, but France and Italy declined to sign Part IV, Article 22, of the Agreement (and to restrict numerically their submarines and other light forces). Great Britain, therefore, continued to try to obtain the adhesion of these two Powers, and Germany's voluntary statement, in connection with the German-English naval agreement of June 18th 1935, that she would conform to the above-mentioned provisions "without regard to the attitude of other Powers" presumably did much to smooth the path.

The decision of the German Government is entirely in accordance with the principles and suggestions of German policy as expressed in the speech by the Leader and Chancellor on May 21st, 1935. This detailed statement of German peace policy not only expressed the willingness of Germany to enter into reasonable armament agreements, but far-reaching and clearly defined proposals were made for the humanisation of warfare, the prohibition of bombardment and of the use of poison gas, and the abolition of the submarine arm.

When, therefore, the British Government requested Germany to accede on the basis of the protocol signed in London on November 6th by the naval Powers concerned, Ambassador von Ribbentrop on November 23rd addressed the following note to the British Foreign Secretary on behalf of the German Government:

"In a communication of the 9th inst. the Royal British Ambassador in Berlin transmitted to the German Minister of Foreign Affairs copy of a protocol signed in London on November 6th, 1936, regarding the rules of submarine warfare in accordance with Part IV of the London Agreement of April 22nd, 1930, and expressed the hope on behalf of his Government that the German Government would accede to the rules in question.

These rules are as follows:

'1. In their action with regard to merchant ships, submarines must conform to the rules of International Law to which surface vessels are subject.

2. In particular, except in the case of persistent refusal to stop on being duly summoned, or of active resistance to visit or search, a warship, whether surface vessel or submarine, may not sink or render incapable of navigation a merchant vessel without having first placed passengers, crew and ship's papers in a place of safety.

... For this purpose the ship's boats are not regarded as a place of safety unless the safety of the passengers and crew is assured, in the existing weather conditions by the proximity of land, or the presence of another vessel which is in a position to take them on board.'

In connection with the German-British naval negotiations, the German Government stated in the summary of the discussions between the German and British naval experts on June 23rd, 1935, that it was prepared to accede to the regulations regarding submarine warfare in Part IV of the London Naval Agreement.

I have accordingly the honour to state on behalf of my Government that the German Government accedes to the above rules and regards them as binding upon itself as from this date."

The view taken by British naval circles as to the effect of this agreement is shown by the following remarks by the "Naval and Military Record" in an article on November 5th, 1936:

"No country in the world has more to gain than England from a prohibition of unrestricted submarine warfare. But can we really believe that any Power fighting for its existence would sacrifice a certain victory, such as Germany expected from unrestricted submarine warfare, on account of a scrap of paper emanating from peace time?

The principal disadvantage of any attempt to humanise warfare lies in the restrictions which such regulations place upon a State which, in opposition to another State, cannot reconcile unrestricted warfare with its honour. Any attempt to reduce the terrors of war by a restriction of the arms used is no longer harmless but will have a disastrous effect on the 'honourable belligerent'."

In connection with this opinion of the Naval and Military Record it must be pointed out that, in accordance with the experience in war, the observance of the provisions of the agreement in practice means that the submarine arm will not be used in warfare in respect of merchant ships, since such warfare would subject the submarines to intolerable risk in accordance with the provisions for surface vessels (arming of merchant vessels, submarine traps etc.).

The future will have to show whether this agreement will be a test of momentary political agreement rather than a test of humanity. Nevertheless, its conclusion, in view of the tremendous rearmament also at sea, is a small ray of light, and it is only to be hoped that the desire which it expresses for more humane warfare and for the defence of unprotected non-belligerents may find its counterpart in general observance in other branches of warfare, such as bombing and gas attacks from the air and the bombardment of open towns.

The Naval Negotiations between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union

Immediately after the London Treaty was signed in 1936 the United Kingdom began her endeavours to conclude supplementary agreements, on the basis of that Treaty, with as many countries as possible that had not taken part in the London negotiations. The United Kingdom attaches such great value to agreements of this kind because she hopes they will prevent any power from deciding suddenly to carry out naval armaments that could not be controlled, and that must necessarily disturb the existing condition of naval armaments in such a manner that one of the parties to the London Treaty would feel compelled to appeal to the "Security clause" of the London Treaty, and repudiate its treaty engagements. This would, of course, involve the collapse of the whole treaty structure erected with so much toil.

England's efforts were naturally directed in the first place towards arriving at a naval armament agreement with Russia, the future naval armaments of that country being the greatest factor of international insecurity in the domain of naval policy. The negotiations culminated in October, 1936, in a draft treaty that created extreme surprise throughout the world and occasioned in some cases no little disquietude. In this draft treaty Russia was permitted to commence building immediately 2 battleships of 35,000 tons each, with the maximum gun calibre of the London Treaty (35.6 cm. or 40.6 cm.), and 7 heavy cruisers of 8000 tons each, with 18 cm. guns. This concession ran counter to the provision in the London Treaty suspending the building of heavy cruisers. The provision of the draft treaty is also open to criticism which releases the Soviet Union from the obligation to communicate to its co-signatory its new construction plans for its naval forces in the Far East, especially as it is not stipulated in the draft treaty that ships intended for service in the Far East must be built there. Russia is thus, for example, in the position to carry out in the Baltic, without being subject to any control, new constructions "destined for the Far East", and to leave them there "in trial trip conditions" as long as she chooses, without being called to account for breach of treaty. In these circumstances the later provision that ships of the Far East fleet may not be employed in the Baltic is pure theory.

It remains to be seen if the Anglo-Russian Treaty will be concluded in the form of the published draft. It must arouse apprehension in all the countries immediately interested in Russian naval armament, and it is with those countries in particular that England is negotiating in the hopes of inducing them to join the London Treaty, namely, Germany, the northern countries, Poland, and Turkey. It is easily comprehensible, when the obligations imposed by naval strategy are considered, that these Powers must make their attitude in the negotiations with England dependent mainly on the outcome of the Anglo-Russian Treaty. It is, therefore, conceivably possible that too great compliance on the part of England towards Russia may seriously impair the efficacy of the London Treaty.

The Mediterranean Agreement (Gentlemen's Agreement) between the United Kingdom and Italy of January 2nd, 1937

It was a happy New Year's message which surprised the world on January 2nd, 1937, when in the Victoria room of the Palazzo Chigi in Rome an agreement was signed by the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Ciano, and the British Ambassador Sir Eric Drummond, which made a break with the past and, though it did not entirely remove, nevertheless mitigated the tension created between the two countries in the Mediterranean by the Abyssinian conflict and subsequently by the Spanish civil war.

The official communiqué of the British and Italian Governments on the conclusion of the Mediterranean Agreement reads as follows:

"The following is the text of the Declaration signed at Rome on January 2nd by the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs and the British Ambassador relating to assurances in respect of the Mediterranean:

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Italian Government:

"Animated by the desire to contribute increasingly, in the interests of the general cause of peace and security, to the betterment of relations between them and between all the Mediterranean Powers, and resolved to respect the rights and interests of those Powers;

"Recognize that the freedom of entry into, exit from and transit through, the Mediterranean is a vital interest both to the different parts of the British Empire and to Italy, and that these interests are in no way inconsistent with each other;

"Disclaim any desire to modify, or so far as they are concerned, to see modified, the status quo as regards national sovereignty of territory in the Mediterranean area;

"Undertake to respect each other's rights and interests in the said area;

"Agree to use their best endeavours to discourage any activities liable to impair the good relations which it is the object of the present declaration to consolidate.

"This declaration is designed to further the ends of peace and is not directed against any other Power."

Before this joint declaration, signed on January 2nd, in Rome, was made, two notes were exchanged in Rome by the British Ambassador and the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, which were worded as follows:

a) Note by the British Ambassador to the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs:

Your Excellency,—The Royal Italian Government may perhaps be aware that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was asked in the House of Commons on December 16 whether he would lay upon the table of the House the precise terms of the guarantee given to his Majesty's Government by the Government of Italy concerning the occupation of the Balearic Islands by Italian subjects.

To this question Mr. Eden replied that the assurances to which reference was made were given verbally. He proceeded to state that his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Rome, acting on instructions, informed the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs on September 12 that "any alteration of the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be a matter of the closest concern to his Majesty's Government".

M. Eden continued that taking note of this communication, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs had assured Mr. Ingram that the Italian Government had not, either before or since the revolution in Spain, engaged in any negotiations with General Franco whereby the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be altered, nor would they engage in any such negotiations in the future. This assurance, the Secretary of State added, was subsequently reaffirmed spontaneously to the British Naval Attaché in Rome by the Italian Ministry of Marine, and the Italian Ambassador in London had on several occasions given to the Secretary of State similar verbal assurances.

In view of these assurances, his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom assume that, so far as Italy is concerned, the integrity of the present territories of Spain shall in all circumstances remain intact and unmodified. They would, however, be grateful if your Excellency saw your way formally to confirm the accuracy of this assumption, and I have accordingly the honour to inquire whether your Excellency could supply me with such confirmation.

I avail myself of the opportunity to convey to your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

b) Count Ciano to his Majesty's Ambassador:—

Your Excellency,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's note of to-day's date in which you draw my attention to a question asked in the House of Commons on December 16 last, and the reply given by Mr. Eden, on the subject of the assurances given verbally by the Royal Italian Government concerning the status quo in the Western Mediterranean. You reminded me that in taking note of the communication made by his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires on September 12 I assured Mr. Ingram that the Italian Government had not, either before or since the revolution in Spain, engaged in any negotiations with General Franco whereby the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be altered, nor would they engage in any such negotiations in the future.

I have consequently no difficulty, on behalf of the Royal Italian Government, in confirming the accuracy of his Majesty's Government's assumption—namely, that, so far as Italy is concerned, the integrity of the present territories of Spain shall in all circumstances remain intact and unmodified.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

It is obvious that this agreement, which renders possible a reduction of the fighting units in the Mediterranean, is the result of prolonged careful work by the diplomacy of both countries. Its significance becomes clear when one remembers the position in the Mediterranean at the beginning of 1936. Italy was engaged in a by no means easy colonial war, dependent for all her supplies of war material on the sole route of the Suez Canal, economically threatened by the sanctionist measures of half a hundred League States among whom England, in particular, was endeavouring to concentrate all available military and political strength in the Mediterranean, the Red Sea and the Suez Canal, from the home fleet, the Indian and even Australian squadrons to the pacts of assistance with France and countries bordering on the Eastern Mediterranean. Out of fear of an Italian flank attack on the Sudan or from Lybia on Egypt, the military forces in that country were enormously strengthened by the construction of vast military and air camps on the Anglo-Italian frontier. it was a position which seemed to involve even the gravest possibilities.

Mussolini declared on several occasions that in conquering Abyssinia he had no intention whatever of encroaching upon British interests. Again during the war he repeatedly stated that Italy had no political interests in the Sudan or in Palestine and that he regarded Egypt as an independent country. He also gave numerous assurances that Italy would respect British and Egyptian interests on the Tana Lake. After the occupation of Addis Abeba he went even further and stated that Italy now belonged to the satisfied nations and that, consequently, even the smaller Mediterranean countries had nothing to fear. He also stated that British apprehension of the establishment of a black colonial army was unfounded. Again, in the Spanish crisis, Mr. Eden was able to inform the House of Commons on December 16th, 1936, that Mussolini had on various occasions made reassuring statements regarding his Spanish policy and the intentions attributed to him in respect of the Balearic Islands.

On the other hand the Duce naturally made his conditions, of which the raising of sanctions was the most urgent. Immediately after this demand came the cancellation of the agreements of mutual aid and the reduction of British forces in the Mediterranean. Lastly there was the recognition of the conquest of Abyssinia in some form or other in order to secure the vital routes connecting up with the new Empire. At the same time it was clearly to be understood that he was not thinking of reducing the military armament of Italy, as she must be more strongly armed than before precisely on account of the Abyssinian war.

In his great Milan speech on November 1st, 1936, Mussolini again stretched out the hand to England in order to bring about an agreement and to restore Anglo-Italian relations to their natural basis of free recognition of mutual interests in the Mediterranean.

At this time the United Kingdom had already taken the initiative since June for the raising of sanctions. On July 8th she withdrew the home fleet from the Mediterranean and on July 27th recognised the uselessness of further maintaining the agreements of mutual assistance. After the Milan speech she withdrew the Indian Legation guard from Addis Abeba on November 24th and finally, on December 21st, by converting the British Legation into a Consulate General, recognised the Italian possession de jure at any rate de facto, while a similar step was also taken by the French Government.

The United Kingdom however left no doubt as to the limits to which any agreement could not go. On June 18th Mr. Eden had stated in the House of Commons that the British Government had decided permanently to maintain a stronger defensive force in the Mediterranean than before the beginning of the war. This statement was repeated on July 9th by Sir Samuel Hoare who at the same time expressed the hope that the British Navy which had been in the Mediterranean 300 years would remain a further 300 years. On September 23rd after returning from his tour of inspection in the Mediterranean, which followed upon the journey of King Edward VIII to Turkey, Greece and Yugoslavia, Sir Samuel Hoare supplemented the above statements by adding that there could be no question of giving up Malta or of renouncing the further development of the naval bases in the Mediterranean. In the Treaty with Egypt of August 26th, 1936, the United Kingdom also took care to provide that she continued to dominate the Suez Canal from a military point of view and that she might take strategic measures towards the Lybian frontier.

The treaty contains nothing on the agreement which was frequently announced in connection with the negotiations, in respect of the demarcation of zones of interest, a limitation of the naval armaments on both sides and the fortification of bases. On the contrary, it is worded in such a way as not to prevent the two States from further developing their positions of strength. Sir Samuel Hoare expressed the British point of view in this direction when he said that Great Britain had learnt from the Abyssinian conflict that her opinion would only be respected by other countries if she could base her determination on actual power.

In this state of affairs it is immediately evident that there could be no question of the agreement restoring the old position, but on the contrary of legalising a new position, without striving for a general settlement of Anglo-Italian relations. In this respect the agreement will still be subject to some severe tests. For it is evident that the status quo to which reference is made has fundamentally changed in the Mediterranean. No solution has yet been reached for all the problems which will necessarily arise in practice.

In the meantime, Italy acceded on January 14th to the London Naval Agreement of March 25th, 1936, but has not yet acceded to the highly important new Straits Convention of July 21st, 1936, by which the other riparian States promoted by treaty the penetration of the Soviets into the Mediterranean. In the Spanish question the final settlement is still lacking, though the agreement makes the impression that the United Kingdom has adopted the Italian standpoint that the erection of a Bolshevik constitution is out of the question. This is however contradicted by a sentence in Mr. Eden's statement in the House of Commons on January 19th: "There is no word, no line, no comma in the Anglo-Italian Declaration which could give any foreign Power a right to intervene in Spain, whatever the complexion of the government in any part of that country."

The Italian standpoint was again laid down in connection with the agreement by the "Giornale d'Italia" in the following words: "The erection of a Communist base in Spain must necessarily cause a displacement of the entire Mediterranean system which consists not only of territorial possession, naval bases and shipping routes, but is also determined by the character and aims of political factors of power which meet in or are firmly fixed in the Mediterranean. In this respect the clear, realistic policy of Italy has no other desire than what every country would do that is anxious to defend its national order and culture."

Mussolini's triumphal journey through Lybia and the speeches which he made on that occasion on the African tasks of Fascist Italy with their echo in the Islam and Arab world again led to a violent press campaign between the two countries and the continuance of questions regarding Abyssinia in the House of Commons. It must be remembered that Abyssinia is still a Member of the League of Nations and it cannot be foreseen when this grotesque situation will come to an end. The rigorous new armament programme with which the British Government surprised not only the British people but also the rest of the world in the middle of February aroused great mistrust especially in Italy where it called forth the determination for further rearmament. The Fascist Grand Council, at a meeting on March 1st, taking the view "that any possibility of a limitation of armaments should be definitely excluded", replied with a programme in five points for the arming of people and economy.

Nevertheless, the agreement was instrumental in overcoming a position which was not without danger and in building a bridge, though a tottering one, between the two States. An acute conflict was overcome, not by regional pacts or pacts of mutual assistance, but by a direct bilateral settlement, in which the United Kingdom again applied her old principle of making the best of it in matters concerning vital interests of her Empire.

Mr. Eden, in the above-mentioned debate in the House of Commons on the significance of the agreement, or the Declaration as he still called it, said: "This declaration is neither a treaty nor a pact, but it marks, we hope and believe, the end of a chapter of strained relations. It marks no departure in policy by His Majesty's Government. It neither calls for nor embodies any concession from us, neither, of course, does it involve any modification of any one of our existing friendships. But that this declaration has been of service to an appeasement in the Mediterranean there can be no manner of doubt."

Peace in the Adriatic

A further stage in Italian Mediterranean policy

With a speed and smoothness which must have surprised even those who were informed of the secret diplomatic preliminary negotiations between Rome and Belgrade, the visit of Count Ciano, the Italian Foreign Minister, to the capital of Yugoslavia led on March 25th, 1937, to the signature, ratification and putting into force of a Treaty of Friendship between Italy and Yugoslavia.

"In the conviction that it is in the interest of both countries and of all other countries to secure a new foundation for mutual relations by means of a sincere and permanent friendship and to inaugurate a new era in the political and economic relations of the two countries; in the confidence that the maintenance and consolidation of a lasting peace between Italy and Yugoslavia form an important factor for European peace, the Prince Regent, on behalf of His Majesty the King of Yugoslavia, and His Majesty the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia have concluded an agreement.

(1) The two countries undertake to respect their common frontiers on land and in the Adriatic, and if either should be the object of an unprovoked aggression by one or more Powers the other will abstain from all action calculated to benefit the aggressor.

(2) In case of international complications, and if the two countries are agreed that their common interests are or may be threatened, they undertake to inform each other of the measures to be taken to safeguard them.

(3) The two countries reaffirm their will not to resort to war in their mutual relations as an instrument of their national policy and to resolve by pacific means all differences and conflicts which may arise between them.

(4) The two countries undertake not to tolerate in their respective territories activities directed against the territorial integrity or existing order of the other, or of a nature calculated to disturb their mutual relations.

(5) In order to give a new impulse to their commercial relations, in harmony with the amicable relations thus established, the two countries agree to intensify and expand the present exchange of goods and services and to investigate the possibilities of closer economic collaboration. A special agreement to this end will be concluded with a minimum of delay.

(6) The two countries agree that nothing in this agreement should be considered as contrary to the international obligations of the two countries, these obligations being public.

(7) This agreement is concluded for a term of five years. If it is not denounced six months before the lapse of this time it will be tacitly prolonged year by year.

(8) The agreement enters into force with the exchange of ratifications which will be made at Belgrade as soon as possible."

By this agreement, Italian policy has reached a second stage in its attempts to remove certain tension and discordance in the Mediterranean in so far as they concern Italy. This also is the fruit of a long process of rapprochement which started immediately after the conclusion of the Abyssinian campaign and received its last impulse through Mussolini's Milan speech.

The constant tension in the Adriatic formed part of the unsolved questions the number of which was not reduced but rather increased by the Peace Treaties of 1919. It would lead us too far if we endeavoured here to describe the constant changes in the eternal struggle between Italy and Yugoslavia for the possession of the Adriatic or at any rate for the greater zone of influence in that sea. This struggle continued from 1919, when the Italians did not receive the assurances in this area which were given them in the Secret Treaty that led to Italy's entry into the war on the side of the Allies, until March 25th, 1937. After 17 years of differences more or less imminent with danger, of hostilities and misunderstandings which at times assumed threatening shape for the peace of Europe, and after an unsuccessful attempt made on January 27th, 1924, to reach a permanent understanding in the Adriatic Treaty of Rome, the former embittered rivals in the Adriatic have now made a break with the past. The new understanding is not merely an act of political will. It is no artificial construction, for it is based on natural conditions, on the proximity of the two States and on the far-reaching economic and political relations which that involves.

The unified, strengthened and independent Yugoslavia thereby obtains the advantage that the only opponent which may be considered dangerous on her seven frontiers now disappears. On the other hand, as a result of the friendship of Yugoslavia, Italy also obtains substantial advantages firstly through the Adriatic appeasement which is undoubtedly identical with the strategical security of the east coast of Italy, and secondly through the freedom of movement of supplies of raw materials and foodstuffs from the zone of the Adriatic to the Black Sea.

These advantages will, however, undoubtedly be only fully felt when an Italo-Roumanian and an Italo-Turkish agreement have become realities.

The agreement will also doubtless have a tranquillising effect on the position of Albania, since her political and economic independence is now released from a pressure to which she was hitherto subjected by the rivalry of the two Powers.

One of the facts which has no doubt substantially contributed to the détente between Rome and Belgrade is the fundamental change which has in the meantime taken place in the political constellation round the Adriatic, since Italy's gaze has been more and more turned from the contested Adriatic to the Mediterranean problems.

A further proof has been given of the value and utility of the method of approaching and clearing up sore points by direct methods while excluding any disturbing influences from outside. This outstanding example again makes it clear that direct understanding is alone capable of removing dangerous material of conflict from the world and thus of doing valuable service to universal peace. It is therefore only to be hoped that the fear which the French paper "La République" sees in "the threatened spread of the era of bilateral negotiations like an oil-stain" may continue to be realised. For in particular this orderly method of always acting within the limits of what is possible and attainable should justly find recognition even among the advocates of collective action and the partisans of indivisible peace, since any improvement of relations between States signifies an appeasement and reduction of the total risk. All schemes of collective assurances have hitherto suffered from the defect that they have petered out in an unending dispute as to questions of method or have befogged the debated questions.

In any case Italy can look back with pride on the military and diplomatic successes of the year 1936 which began in such a fateful manner.

The occurrences in the year 1936 have shown once more that the naval power of the various countries still plays a dominating rôle in high politics, and this fact has been recognised in the past year by the responsible statesmen of a large number of countries to an extent unequalled for a long time past. The conclusions drawn from the fact of this recognition find expression in the considerable augmentation of the naval armaments of most of the naval Powers. It is, however, fairly obvious that in the case of some countries the limit is overstepped within which a justification for the development of a naval force can be admitted. The naval armament augmented beyond this limit no longer corresponds with the country's natural requirements, and can serve only pure striving for power.

Statements by the Leader and Chancellor ADOLF HITLER on the Problem of Colonies and Raw Materials

I. Extracts from the Reichstag Speech of January 30th, 1937

During the last hundred years a number of new nations have been created in Europe which formerly, because of their disunion and weakness, were of only small economic importance and of no political importance at all. Through the establishment of these new States new tensions have naturally arisen. True statesmanship however must face realities and not shirk them. The Italian nation and the new Italian State are realities. The German nation and the German Reich are likewise realities. And for my own fellow-citizens I should like to state that the Polish nation and the Polish State have also become realities. Also in the Balkan nations have reawakened and have built up their own States. The people who belong to those States want to live and they will live. The unreasonable division of the world into nations that have and nations that have not will not remove or solve that problem, no more than the internal social problems of the nations can be solved through more or less clever phrases.

For thousands of years the nations asserted their vital claims by the use of power. If in our time some other institution is to take the place of this power for the purpose of regulating relations between the peoples, then it must take account of natural vital claims and act accordingly. If it is the task of the League of Nations only to guarantee the existing state of the world and to safeguard it for all time, then we might just as well entrust it with the task of regulating the ebb and flow of the tides or directing the Gulf Stream into a definite course for the future.

But the League of Nations will not be able to do the one or the other. The continuance of its existence will in the long run depend on the extent to which it realises that the necessary reforms which concern international relations must be carefully considered and put into practice.

The German people once built up a colonial Empire without robbing anyone and without violating any treaty. And they did so without any war. That colonial Empire was taken away from us. And the grounds on which it was sought to excuse this act are not tenable.

First: It was said that the natives did not want to belong to Germany. Who asked them if they wished to belong to some other Power? And when were these natives ever asked if they had been contented with the Power that formerly ruled them?

Second: It is stated that the colonies were not administered properly by the Germans.

Now, Germany had these colonies only for a few decades. Great sacrifices were made in building them up and they were in a process of development which would have led to quite different results than in 1914. But anyhow the colonies had been so developed by us that other people considered it worth while to engage in a sanguinary struggle for the purpose of taking them from us.

Third: It is said that they are of no real value.

If that is the case, then they can be of no value to other States also. And so it is difficult to see why they keep them.

Moreover, Germany has never demanded colonies for military purposes, but exclusively for economic purposes. It is obvious that in times of general prosperity the value of certain territories may decrease; but it is just as evident that in times of distress such value increase. To-day Germany lives in a time of difficult struggle for foodstuffs and raw materials. Sufficient imports are conceivable only if there is a continued and lasting increase in our exports. Therefore, as a matter of course, our demand for colonies for our densely populated country will be put forward again and again.

II. Extract from the Proclamation to the Party Congress at Nuremberg on September 9th, 1936

National Socialist Germany, with immeasurable efforts within the framework and boundaries of her own country and capacity, has worked and endeavoured to the best of her ability to mitigate the distress and ensure the life of the nation for the future. How simple it is for the statesmen of certain other countries, whose criticisms are nothing but hateful and superficial attacks, to solve the economic problems of their countries, compared with the difficulties encountered by Germany. What need have others to talk of distress when they possess, for instance, fifteen to twenty times as much land per head of the population as we in Germany? What need have they to talk of difficulties when they have at their disposal all the raw materials of the world?

The problems of our national economic subsistence are infinitely difficult.

1. The 136 persons per square kilometer in Germany — even with the greatest effort and the most ingenious utilisation of the existing space — cannot find their entire subsistence from their own soil. What the German peasant has accomplished in these last ten years is unique and unheard of. What the National Socialist State has accomplished in the cultivation of the last heath and moor in Germany is unsurpassable.

Nevertheless, there is still a gap in some spheres of our national subsistence. It is all the more difficult to make good this deficiency by imports from abroad as we are unfortunately lacking in a number of important raw materials in Germany.

2. German economy is therefore compelled to cover the lacking foodstuffs and raw materials by industrial exports, which, especially as the imports of foodstuffs are unavoidable, must take place in any circumstances.

It is, however, regrettable that the rest of the world, thanks to a wanton, unintelligent and even unnecessarily spiteful treatment of these problems, has no comprehension of the essence and immensity of these tasks. For in order to purchase a unit of value of fat for Germany, several units of value of exports must be supplied. But as in matters of food there is not, as some foreign statesmen unfortunately seem to think, any question of evil intentions, but rather of vital tasks, the export must in all circumstances take place as a condition for this import.

It is therefore a sign of a most lamentable lack of reasoning power to reproach for its cheap exports a nation which, in the absence of a proper economic territory of its own, is obliged at all costs to pay with its exports for the foodstuffs which it lacks.

When, therefore, a British politician states that Germany does not require colonies because she is able to purchase her raw materials from abroad, this suggestion is as brilliant as the question of the well-known Bourbon Princess who, when the mob of revolutionaries were howling for bread, asked with surprise why, if they had no bread, they did not eat cake. If the German nation and the German State had not been bled white for fifteen years and deprived of all their international savings, if they had not lost all their capital abroad, and, above all, if they still possessed their own colonies, we should have found it easier to master these tasks.

The retort that colonies would not be of much use to us is futile. A Government which under the conditions in Germany achieves such undeniable economic results would also be able to administer colonies productively.

German economy, like every sound national economy, aims primarily at utilising as much as possible our own possibilities for the economic subsistence of our people, in order in the second place to take part with its own economy which is in itself sound, in the world economy. As the National Socialist State is under no circumstances prepared to restrict its population but is on the contrary determined to increase this natural fertility of the nation, we are compelled to consider and reflect upon the future results of this development. A substantial increase in the yield of the soil is impossible; a substantial increase in exports in the near future is scarcely possible.

It is therefore the duty of the National Socialist State and its economic administration to consider very carefully what necessary raw materials, fuel, &c. can be produced in Germany herself. The foreign exchange thus saved must in future be used as additional means for providing food and purchasing the materials which can in no circumstances be produced in the country. I now announce this as the new four-year plan:

In four years Germany must be entirely independent of foreign countries for all materials which can be in any way produced by German capacity, by our chemical and machinery industry and by our mining industry.

The reconstruction of this great German raw material industry will, after the rearmament, give useful national economic employment to the great numbers who are set free. We hope in this way to be able in many respects to increase further the national production, especially in the internal circulation of our economy, in order that in this manner the receipts from our exports may be reserved primarily for the supply of foodstuffs and for the raw materials which are still lacking.

I have just issued the necessary order for putting this vast German economic plan into operation. It will be carried out with National Socialist energy and efficiency. Nevertheless, Germany cannot renounce the settlement of her colonial claims. The German nation's right to live is just as great as that of the other nations!

Germany and the Colonies

In a number of statements by the German Government and by leading statesmen of the Reich—the text of which is reproduced in this number—the Powers have been informed that the present distribution of colonial possessions, in particular Germany's exclusion from the possession of colonies, cannot be regarded as satisfactory. This statement has been sufficient to bring about a worldwide discussion of the "German colonial question". The countries which since the War have administered the German colonial possessions in the form of mandates have naturally taken part in this discussion with particular zeal. This has not always been done "sine ira et studio", though views of extreme objectiveness and farsightedness have been expressed in addition to those of an opposite nature. The desire for deliberate misunderstanding—which is represented, for instance, among a certain group of the British Conservatives—is fortunately rare, while in some statements—such as that of the French Minister for the Colonies—a certain lack of knowledge of the problem under discussion is the simple explanation of remarks which are otherwise difficult to understand. On the whole the colonial discussion of the past year has promoted understanding of the German colonial problem in the world. Many questions have been put and answered outside Germany. Many have remained unanswered. It may be useful for the further treatment of the colonial question if some aspects are explained from the German point of view.

I

Sometimes an attempt is made to regard the colonial question purely from an economic point of view. Undoubtedly this facilitates the beginning of a discussion. Sooner or later, however, purely psychological difficulties arise which have political roots and which cannot be avoided. We will therefore endeavour to clear up some of these difficulties before dealing with the colonial economic aspect.

The German Reich lost its colonial possessions through the Treaty of Versailles, after an objective examination of colonial rights and needs had been promised in Wilson's fourteen points. The seizure of the German colonies was based on the proved incapacity of Germany to colonise. As against this dual statement of facts, the German nation had the sentiment that its confidence had been abused and its honour violated. The incompatibility of Wilson's statement of the colonial problem with the actual result of the Versailles Peace Conference is obvious from the text and needs no further comment. It is, moreover, not denied by opponents of German colonial rights; as a rule it is merely passed over in silence. The alleged incapacity of the Germans as colonisers is at present no longer taken seriously by those who used it in 1919 to defend the seizure of the German colonial possessions in their own minds and in the minds of their people. We have no doubt that the statesmen who drafted the Versailles Treaty would now be glad if it were forgotten, provided this did not affect the present territorial status quo. This brings us to a psychological problem of great importance. To forget deception and the violation of honour is always easier for the perpetrator than for the one who has been deceived and whose honour has been violated. To assure the latter that the violation of his honour was not seriously meant but only used for purposes of propaganda in order to defend the seizure of his possessions, is perhaps the best way to increase the "psychological difficulties". Naturally Mr. Amery and Sir Henry Page-Croft in making such statements express a great truth. The representatives of the British Empire, politicians and officers, who—contrary to the provisions of the Congo Act—carried on and concluded colonial warfare in Africa, were quite able, even at that time, to appreciate the colonial achievements of the Germans. The honourable testimony of the English Colonel Meinertshagen may suffice to prove this. But since the War was alleged to be carried on by the western Powers from entirely disinterested motives, a reason had to be found for adding the German colonial possessions in Africa to the already rich British, French, and Belgian colonies. The reason invented was the incapacity of the Germans to colonise. At present the feeling of fairness which exists, especially in England, is endeavouring to remove the misconception which was mainly created and disseminated by the British. Many people are affirming that the German colonies were as well administered as the British. It is even admitted that they were better administered than the colonies of some other States. The Germans understand the friendly intention of such statements; but they do not forget that statements to the contrary (sometimes even by the same persons) helped to expropriate the German colonial empire. For it is still very rare to find any readiness to give up both the argument and the expropriation.

II

We will now consider the economic aspect. Are colonies valuable or not? It is sometimes affirmed that colonies are merely an economic burden and play no part in the economy of great modern States. The Leader and Chancellor, in reply to those who express this view, asked why they were not prepared to return the colonies if their administration represented such a great burden and brought no profit. We ask ourselves the question how persons of importance and experience come to take the view which gave the Leader an opportunity to make this fitting reply.

An economic district possesses value not only in itself, but in the connections in which it is placed. A country that is poor in coal will develop its water power sooner than a country plentifully supplied with coal. A country possessing extensive tropical coastal districts will rarely lay out plantations in the inaccessible interior of the country. There are some countries which possess a considerably greater proportion of tropical colonial territories than they can exploit according to their population and economic needs. This statement implies no criticism of the colonial achievements of the countries in question. In order to be objective, we will take an example from a territory to which there is no German claim whatever. The economic prosperity of Java, with its population of 42 millions in an area barely a quarter the size of France proves very much for the colonising capacity of the Dutch. The colonial territories than they can exploit according to their Netherlands possessions proves that the colonising power of a relatively small European country to exploit and administer fully a tropical territory fifty-five times the size of the mother country has hitherto proved insufficient. It is due, not to existing possibilities, but to historical and political development that a square mile of New Guinea is practically valueless as compared with a square mile of Java at its present purchase value. Let us take another example, again from a territory to which Germany has no claim. If we look in South America for the least developed and most thinly populated territories, apart from deserts and high mountains, we shall find them in the interior of Brazil, i. e. in a country which is only fully developed in the areas near the coast and has as yet no economic need of the forests in the interior; and apart from that, characteristically enough, in the few colonial territories possessed by European Powers in South America. We find here Netherlands Guiana with a population of 1.1 per square kilometre, French Guiana 0.5, and British Guiana 1.3. If these territories were the only tropical countries in the possession of these colonial Powers, they would undoubtedly be developed to a much higher measure of economic capacity. The present position of the Guiana colonies of three European States proves to us that the colonising power and economic interests of these Powers have not been sufficient to promote their entire colonial empire in an equal manner. After the obligation to care for the development of colonial territories and to regard their possession as a sacred trust for the good of the natives has been so frequently stressed, especially by the British, it is not superfluous to refer to the above facts. We should like again to emphasise the fact that in so doing we are by no means questioning the colonising capacity of the nations concerned, but are merely pointing out that the area of their colonies is too great for them to be developed to the same extent as certain territories have been developed. Trinidad, in the immediate vicinity of British Guiana, has a population of 80 per square kilometre. These examples will suffice. They show clearly enough that there are really colonial territories which are more or less worthless—to their present owners.

III

Do the former German colonies belong to this group? They do not come into consideration as territories for the permanent settlement of white races. Neither the Cameroons nor Togoland nor New Guinea have districts suitable for this purpose. In German East Africa, as in the high districts of Kenya, there are certain possibilities of white settlement; but they are comparatively few. It may be assumed as a fact that South West Africa does not offer great possibilities for white settlers. The former German colonies, therefore, need not be taken into consideration as areas of settlement for the white races; this is true of their present owners for two reasons, in the first place because the territories are unsuitable, and in the second place because the western European colonial countries have a lack, and not a surplus, of people willing to become settlers. (The position is different in the case of Japan's share in the former German South Sea possessions. Here there is a desire for and at the same time a suitability for settlement, so that Japan has had considerable success in colonising the small island territory of the Mariannes.)

Consequently, with this Japanese exception, the value of the former German colonies still remains to be examined merely as producers of raw materials for their present owners.

As regards mineral raw materials, only the South Sea island Nauru with its rich phosphate deposits has a high value. It is still difficult to foresee whether the recently started gold production of East Africa is capable of development, while the gold production of South West Africa has not fulfilled the hopes formerly placed in it. The diamond production had to be considerably checked. As South Africa has abundance of gold and diamonds, the production of the mandates is not of considerable importance for the British possessions in Africa. It is true that the question arises as to whether there are still undiscovered mineral resources in the mandated territories. This question cannot be answered as the geological exploration has remained in a very backward state. But this fact alone is significant, since it goes to prove how slight is the need for real economic development of the mandated territories on the part of their present owners.

As regards vegetable raw materials, the former German colonies produce primarily palm kernels and palm oil, cocoa, timber, sisal, and tanning materials. Their climate and soil offer similar conditions for such production as the neighbouring possessions of Great Britain, France, and Belgium. A comparison between the quantities produced by the mandated territories and the neighbouring colonies (Gold Coast, Nigeria, French Equatorial Africa, Belgian Congo, Kenya, and Uganda) is extremely instructive. It appears, for instance, that the export of tanning bark which after 1919 was somewhat higher in the former German East Africa than in Kenya and Uganda, has since declined slightly, while Kenya and Uganda have now reached more than four times the export value of German East Africa. The advance in production from 1933 to 1934 alone is greater for Kenya and Uganda than the annual average for the mandated territory from 1931 to 1935. As regards oil fruits and oil seeds, merely the average annual fluctuation in the constantly increasing export from Nigeria has been greater in the last ten years than the total annual production of Togoland. Here also the increase from 1931 to 1932, and from 1934 to 1935 is greater than the total export from the Cameroons in the same years. The Cameroons and Togoland together attain about one-tenth of the quantity exported from Nigeria. The position is somewhat more favourable in respect of cocoa. Here again the increase in production is considerably greater in the British west coast colonies than in the Cameroons and Togoland. But this is hardly due to the administrations of the mandates, for powerful German private initiative has been developed particularly in respect of cocoa plantations in the West African mandated territories. The position as regards the utilisation of the tropical timber resources is also extremely characteristic. Here also the total annual exports from the Cameroons are at present smaller than the annual fluctuations of French Equatorial Africa. These examples will suffice. It cannot be denied that the total exports of all important products from the mandated territories are of no consequence as compared with the annual fluctuations in the production and export of a single neighbouring colonial territory. This means that the mandated territories are actually of very small importance for their owners; their present economic value is small. It seems natural to inquire into the reasons for this. The conclusion is either that the former German colonies are in an incomparably worse position than the neighbouring colonies of other Powers in respect of soil, climate, and conditions of work, or that their development has been astonishingly neglected by the mandatory Powers. In this connection, South West Africa, which is undoubtedly less favoured by nature, can be partially excluded, but there is no reason whatever to assume that the Cameroons and Togoland are worse colonial territories than the Gold Coast, Nigeria, French Equatorial Africa, and the Belgian Congo. There is no reason to believe that German East Africa has substantially fewer possibilities than Kenya and Uganda, or that the north of New Guinea is less fertile than the south and west. Thus only the second assumption remains, namely that the mandatory Powers, in view of their wealth in land and their small requirements of additional colonial production, have neglected the mandated territories in comparison with their own colonies. This fact is not without importance also in view of the constantly emphasised obligation of the mandatory Powers to look after the economic development of the mandated territories and their native populations.

IV

The political public of the colonial Powers includes many persons who have little political and economic imagination. They cannot imagine that an object which is worthless for them may be of value to others. They cannot imagine that countries whose economic development is of no significance for them may be of significance to others. They cannot imagine that production figures which are small for those who live in abundance may be of importance—even at their present admittedly low level—to those who have no possibility of producing tropical oils and fats, cocoa, sisal, copra, cotton, and tropical wood. In particular, they cannot imagine that the quantity of production can be considerably increased if such increase is necessary.

It is not easy to state potential values and to give reasons for such statements. When it is known to what extent opinions vary, for instance as to the possible density of settlement and economic capacity of Australia or Brazil, caution is necessary in estimating the development in tropical Africa. Nevertheless the comparative figures of neighbouring colonies inevitably lead to the conclusion that actual possibilities would enable the present production to be trebled. At the same time it must again be stressed that from a geological point of view the mandated territories are for the most part terra incognita. The few years of German rule before the War were scarcely enough to carry out properly the geographical exploration of the territories. The example of the copper production of Katanga with its revolutionary effect on the copper supply of the world, and the further example of the South African platinum deposits, prove that a number of surprises in respect of mining may still be expected in Africa. Though the present economic value of the mandated territories can be regarded as small for the present owners, their development value must be gauged quite differently.

We will now deal with a number of statements which recur frequently and also bear witness to a certain lack of political imagination. They are remarkable for the simplicity of the thought that lies behind them. The question is asked: What is the use of laying out fresh plantations when other countries obtain such a surplus from existing plantations that a considerable portion of the crops must be destroyed? Why further coffee plantations, when Brazil is obliged to burn thousand and thousands of bags of coffee? Why new cotton fields when the United States are compelled by the lack of outlet constantly to restrict the area under cultivation? Why erect expensive plant in order to produce tropical timber when the forests of the northern temperate zone are by no means exhausted? These questions are comprehensible. But the questions that can be asked on the opposite side are sometimes overlooked. Why create new protected industries in the countries of America and the British overseas possessions that are rich in raw materials, when the old European industrial districts are in a position to cover industrial needs? Everybody is aware that the free world economy of before the War has collapsed; but in the colonial discussion it seems sometimes to be assumed that this free world economy still exists or can be re-established at short notice. The fact that a man of great economic experience and wide knowledge of the world, such as Sir Frederick Leith-Ross reverts to the old formula that the countries which are poor in raw materials must purchase their materials from the rich countries merely proves to what extent political feeling may be lacking in some quarters.

The question is often asked as to what States or groups of States bear the blame for the disturbance in world economy. It is a futile question, for all individual measures which are made responsible for this can be traced back directly or indirectly to the Great War. But one fact must be affirmed, namely that the old stronghold of British trade, the inviolability of private property, was destroyed not by Germany but by the Allies under British leadership. Not least, it is the experiences of the War and of the blockade which was continued after the armistice, together with the constantly recurring attempts to use economic dependence in order to exercise political pressure, which have compelled the countries that are poor in raw materials to be especially watchful and to introduce those trade restrictions of which the rich countries complain. A portion of the special German difficulties can, however, be traced back directly to the end of the War. It is sometimes overlooked what heavy losses in supplies of food and raw materials were suffered by Germany as the result of the cession of territory in Europe.

Sir Samuel Hoare stressed the decisive difference between the haves and the have-nots in the international discussion. This differentiation will only disappear from the field of international politics when settlements have been reached.

Three methods are proposed for settling the existing difference. There are observers in the countries that are rich in raw materials who give the have-nots the kind advice to restrict the increase in population by artificial means, and even, if possible, to reduce their population; a proposal that gives evidence of special Christian love of one's neighbour. There is a second group of opinions to the effect that attempts must be made to improve the possibility of supply of the have-nots out of the surplus territories. In this connection the question of the means of payment is generally overlooked. Loans cannot be more than a temporary makeshift. The increase in the purchase of raw materials by the Great Powers that are lacking in them is only possible under the present structure of possessions in the world, if the Great Powers that are rich in raw materials are willing to accept payment in the form of goods which they can produce on their own soil. There is no readiness to do so, for this would imply a very considerable change in the economic and social structure of the countries that are rich in raw materials. In order to avoid an increase in the economic differences, only the third way remains open: a change in territorial possessions, in the case of Germany by the return of her colonies.

Here we must revert to our argument as to the relative value of the colonial territories producing raw materials. We pointed out that the old German colonial territories, with few exceptions, had no considerable economic value for their present owners. It would be incorrect to conclude from this fact that the same territories are as valueless for a country that is poor in raw materials. For countries that are compelled to restrict imports, even small alleviations in their balance of payment are of importance. In asking what value the possibility of importing cocoa, sisal, or tanning materials has for a country whose principal problem is the supply of iron and copper, it is overlooked that every reduction in payments for less valuable raw materials is to the benefit of the supply of more important materials. Moreover such questions are based only on the present position of the colonies. They overlook the possibilities of future development and the exploration of further land. In particular they overlook the fact that a great part of the development of new raw materials is based (apart from the wider uses of coal and lime) on the extraordinarily increased possibility of using and transforming the raw material, wood. The possibilities afforded in this connection by the tropical forests can scarcely be overestimated.

VI

What is the result of all this for the future of the former German colonies if they were to be given back by their present owners? In the first place, the necessity of a greatly increased rate of economic development as compared with the past fifteen years. In this connection, economic, administrative, and financial questions, and not least scientific and medical questions of considerable importance will be raised. While the capacity of the Germans for developing a colonial administration has only been denied in the course of war propaganda, we are not aware that the services of German science in the exploration of the tropics from a geographical, geological, botanical, medical, and anthropological point of view have ever been doubted. The great German explorers of Africa in the nineteenth century—Rohlf, Nachtigal, Schweinfurth—are well known. It is less well known that the geographical exploration

The Lie regarding Colonial guilt

"Finally, the Allied and Associated Powers are satisfied that the native inhabitants of the German colonies are strongly opposed to being again brought under Germany's sway, and the record of German rule, the traditions of the German Government, and the use to which these colonies were put as bases from which to prey upon the commerce of the world, make it impossible for the Allied and Associated Powers to return them to Germany, or to entrust to her the responsibility for the training and education of their inhabitants."

"Germany's dereliction in the sphere of colonial civilization has been revealed too completely to admit of the Allied and Associated Powers consenting to make a second experiment and of their assuming the responsibility of again abandoning thirteen or fourteen millions of natives to a fate from which the war has delivered them."

... and its Destruction

In the House of Assembly on Thursday afternoon the following resolutions were moved by the Hon. Member Mr. August Stauch, and finally adopted:

„That in the opinion of this House:

(1) that the Bluebook of the Union of South Africa: "Report on the Natives of South-West Africa and Their Treatment by Germany. Prepared in the Administrator's Office, Windhoek, South-West Africa, January 1918. Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of His Majesty, August, 1918. London: Published by His Majesty's Stationery Office" having been brought up in war time had the significance of a war-instrument and that the time has come, to put this instrument out of operation and to impound and destroy all copies of this Bluebook, which may be found in the official records and in public libraries of this Territory;

(2) that the Administration be requested to make representations to the Union Government and to the British Government to have this Bluebook expunged from the official records of those Governments;

(3) that the Administration be requested to take into consideration the advisability of making representations to the Union Government and the British Government to impound and destroy all copies of the Bluebook, which may be found in the public libraries in the respective Countries and with the official Booksellers mentioned on the Title-Sheet of the Bluebook, namely: — His Majesty's Stationery Office and E. Ponsonby Ltd., Dublin."

..... and the Truth

"It cannot be denied that Germany in many respects transferred her methodical spirit, her orderly qualities and her characteristic discipline to her former colonies and to a great extent promoted the development of the territories now under mandate."

of the German colonies before the War was better organised and made more rapid progress than that of the colonies of neighbouring Great Powers. The achievement of German scientists in transferring the science of forestry to tropical territories is well known. (It is sufficient to refer to the part taken by German advisers in creating a well ordered science of forestry in British India and the Netherlands Indies.) Nothing need be said of the achievements of German tropical medicine. German successes in combating malaria and sleeping sickness speak for themselves.

All nations with colonial possessions have benefited from the achievements of German research workers in this sphere. Since the War, German scientists have worked in this field with all the restrictions arising out of the fact that they have no tropical stations at their disposal. The re-establishment of a German field of work in the tropics for German scientists might have a value going far beyond actual territorial boundaries.

If the justice of the German desire for the re-establishment of a colonial field of work is recognised, and if the necessity for an intensive development of such colonies is realised, the need naturally arises of considering the native question with the greatest thoroughness. If the view is adopted that care for the welfare of the natives is an essential part of any colonial development—and this view is at present taken by all the colonial Powers and shared by Germany—a survey of the colonial history of the past four centuries arouses painful feelings. The first centuries of European colonial rule in other parts of the world are filled with revolting and senseless cruelty. Germany, as the youngest of the colonial Powers, is fortunate in having had no share in the unhappy and immoral native policy of those times. She was able to benefit from the collective experience of other Powers and, in acquiring her colonies—with very few exceptions—to avoid the mistakes previously made by other colonial Powers. The natives were, however, not asked whether they wished to belong to the German Empire any more than the natives in the possessions of all other colonial Powers. When the German colonies were transferred to the mandatory Powers, an attempt was made only in very few cases—and after the corresponding influence had been exerted—to obtain the opinion of the natives. So long as the white races exercise colonial care over the black racés, it will be difficult to attempt to introduce complete self-determination on the part of the natives. Any attempt to prevent the transfer of the mandates on the grounds that the natives have not voted for it, calls into question the basis of all previous colonial Empires.

It is stated in some quarters that, though there is no reason to criticise Germany's native policy before the War, a positive native policy on the part of National Socialism is unthinkable. This is due to a misapprehension of the biological views of National Socialism. Germany is at present of the opinion that no greater injustice can be done to a race than to compel it to shape its existence in the mould of a foreign race. New Germany is aware that races are of different kinds and values and that it will be necessary to make clear distinctions between the forms of existence of the black and the white world. Settlements of the native question cannot be found round the conference table. The German nation is observing with sympathy and attention the attempts of other colonial Powers to solve this question. It has thus an opportunity of learning very different methods of treatment. Hitherto we have not seen either ideal or uniform solutions. The natives are treated differently in the Union of South Africa and in the British Protectorates, in Kenya and Uganda, in British West Africa and in French West Africa. In some colonies the barriers between the races have been removed, while in others they have been maintained. The German observer cannot avoid the conviction that the more lasting solutions are to be found in colonies where clearer views are held as to the difference of race. There is no reason to doubt the seriousness and thoroughness of a German examination of the colonial racial question.

There is a last consideration. If we set aside all the reasons hitherto put forward to exclude Germany from colonial possessions, there still remain reasons which are unwillingly expressed. They are not uttered by official Government representatives; only outsiders sometimes express them. They lie within the sphere of what may be called imperial "Realpolitik". They relate to the political and military dangers which the German colonies might involve for other possessions. Here again we cannot refrain from a historical reference. Thanks are due not least to Bismarck that, in the period when Africa was divided up, the Congo Act came into being. Anyone who knows the number of German protectorate troops in the year 1914 will realise that Germany had no intention of breaking the Congo Act. What reason is there to believe that Germany would in future militarise her colonial possessions?

A. The Colonial Question as a Political and Legal Problem

An Historical Retrospect in Documents

The Seizure of the German Colonies

The Legal Basis for the Conclusion of Peace:

The Agreement of November 5th, 1918, prior to the Peace

From the Note from State Secretary Lansing to the German Government, on November 5th, 1918

"The Allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January 8th 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in the subsequent addresses."

What Wilson promised:

Point 5 of the 14 Points from the address to Congress on January 8th, 1918

"The only possible programme is:

5. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

We have no jealousy of German greatness and there is nothing in this programme that impairs it. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world, — the new world in which we now live, — instead of a place of mastery."

An authentic interpretation of Point 5 from the Memorandum by Colonel House of October 29th, 1918 (Lyons broadcast)

"The stipulation is that in the case of the German colonies the title is to be determined after the conclusion of the war by 'impartial adjustment' based on certain principles. These are of two kinds:

1. 'Equitable' claims:
2. The interests of the populations concerned.

"What are the 'equitable' claims put forth by Britain and Japan, the two chief heirs of the German colonial empire, that the colonies cannot be returned to Germany? Because she will use them as submarine bases, because she will arm the blacks, because she uses the colonies as bases of intrigue, because she oppresses the natives. What are the 'equitable' claims put forth by Germany? That she needs access to tropical raw materials, that she needs a field for the expansion of her population, that under the principles of peace proposed, conquest gives her enemies no title to her colonies.

"What are the 'interests of the populations'? That they should not be militarized, that exploitation should be conducted on the principle of the open door, and under the strictest regulation as to labor conditions, profits and taxes, that a sanitary régime be maintained, that permanent improvements in the way of roads, etc., be made, that native organization and custom be respected, that the protecting authority be stable and experienced enough to thwart intrigue and corruption, that the protecting power have adequate resources in money and competent administrators to act successfully.

"It would seem as if the principle involved in this proposition is that a colonial power acts not as owner of its colonies, but as trustee for the natives and for the interests of the society of nations, that the terms on which the colonial administration is conducted are a matter of international concern and may legitimately be the subject of international inquiry and that the peace conference may, therefore, write a code of colonial conduct binding upon all colonial powers."

(The full text is given by David Hunter Miller in „My Diary at the Conference of Paris“, Vol. II, pages 69—80.)

"Peoples and provinces are not to be bartered"

The 4 Points of the Address to Congress of February 11th, 1918

The principles to be applied are these:

First, that each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent.

Second, that peoples and provinces are not to be bartered from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now for ever discredited, of the balance of power; but that

Third, every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival states; and

Fourth, that all well defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages.

" not upon the bases of material advantages"

From the speech in Mount Vernon of July 4th, 1918

These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace:

2. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the bases of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the bases of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

"No special or separate interest"

From the speech in New York on September 27th, 1918

1. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standards but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

2. No special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the bases of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

And the Result:

The Versailles Conditions of May 7th, 1919

Art. 119. Germany renounces in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

The results of this renunciation, i. e. the seizure not only of German State property, but also of private movable and immovable property and capital, are given in detail in Articles 120 to 127, 156 to 158, 246, 257 to 260, 297 and 438.

Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations

1. To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

2. The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who, by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandatories on behalf of the League.

3. The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

4. Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognised subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory.

5. Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the Mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order or morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League.

6. There are territories, such as South West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilisation, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory, and other circumstances can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

7. In every case of mandate, the Mandatory shall render to the Council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

8. The degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.

9. A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

Article 23

Subject to and in accordance with provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the Members of the League:

a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for, men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organisations;

b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;

c) will entrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

d) will entrust the League with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunitions with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest;

e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all Members of the League. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914—1918 shall be borne in mind;

f) will endeavour to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

Germany's Struggle for a Just Colonial Peace

I. Before May 7th, 1919

Dr. Solf, Secretary of State of the German Colonial Office, on August 20th, 1918 in the "Deutsche Gesellschaft" Berlin.

Gentlemen, we have a report to-day of one of the most important statements of British policy, Mr. Balfour's speech in the House of Commons. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs formally announces Great Britain's claim to the annexation of our colonies, and does not hesitate to give moral reasons for this claim. This is necessary in England. For this purpose he deals not only with our colonial methods, but enters widely into questions of high policy, takes a moralising trip through the world and in conclusion proclaims the British creed the object of which is to represent England's right to world domination as self-evident while morally destroying Germany's claim to be a Great Power.

Gentlemen, Balfour's charge against Germany demands a reply. To be silent would be to assume joint responsibility for the defamation of our Fatherland. I will therefore deal with some of the points in Mr. Balfour's speech, in so far as they are contained in the telegraphic summary. . . .

I now come to Mr. Balfour's remarks about the colonies which I quote in extenso:

"We have extended our territory, we have taken Germany's colonies, and I do not think that anyone who has really studied German colonial methods will be surprised when we say that there is a great improvement."

He then proceeds as follows:

"Shall we give back the colonies to Germany and thus enable her to erect submarine bases on all the great commercial routes of the world and place world trade at her disposal? German rule in the colonies would mean tyrannical rule over the natives and the setting up of great black armies in Central Africa."

Gentlemen, in other words, England conquers a country, asserts that she can rule it better than its legal owner and deduces therefrom a claim to its annexation. With such arguments it would be possible to declare a British Monroe doctrine for the world.

I should like to put the following questions:

Does the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs know nothing of the decimation of the coloured population in various African colonies through the action of the Entente, or of the compulsory levies in British East Africa which have been admitted in the House of Commons, or of the enormous armies of labourers and soldiers from British and French colonies? Has he asked his colleague in the British Colonial Office what it means to wage war with natives against natives? Has he any idea of the immeasurable damage to the colonial mission of all civilised nations which must be caused by bringing black men to Europe and using them to fight against white men?

Does Mr. Balfour seriously doubt that the fate of the whole of Africa would have been better, if England had not failed to observe the Congo Act? Has he forgotten that Germany is the only belligerent Power that has expressly included among its war aims the abolition of militarism in Africa?

Is Mr. Balfour at present prepared to make the same promise for Great Britain and definitely to break with French methods and Churchill's plans? Gentlemen, I do not expect a reply to these questions. Mr. Balfour's speech should not merit a statesmanlike explanation. The khaki elections throw their shadow before them. The short history of our colonies shows that we neither desire to carry on, nor have carried on, an aggressive policy either in Africa or in the South Seas. We do not seek for supremacy and predominance, we want an adjustment among the colonial States. We desire a settlement of colonial questions on the principle that colonial possession must correspond to the economic strength of the European nations and their worthiness, as proved by history, to protect the coloured races entrusted to them. Economic capacity alone is not a sufficient title. To colonise is to carry on missionary work. The States which endeavoured to act on this principle before the War and which respected humanity even in coloured peoples have acquired the moral right to be colonial Powers.

Germany had acquired this right before the War. The gesture of liberation which makes the annexation of the German colonies plausible as a work of God, is blasphemy. It appears to Mr. Balfour to be quite natural to give moral justification for the robber instinct of British imperialism.

It is so natural to him that he does not notice how ridiculous it is in one breath to stigmatise Germany's effort at general supremacy, and to make a confession of unveiled annexationist policy in Africa and Asia.

Dr. Solf, Secretary of State of the German Colonial Office, in an article in the journal "Das neue Deutschland".

I have defined our colonial programme in public speeches as follows: the recovery of the German protectorates and their development into a strong and economically productive structure, while at the same time preventing the danger which threatens the peace of Europe from the planned militarisation of Africa. This wording indicates the main bases for the continuance of our colonial policy. They are partly of a political character: we must have a share in the domination of territories outside Europe if we are not to glide down to the level of the smaller Powers, and, by means of our own possessions especially in Africa, we must avoid the danger that has been made clear by the present War that future wars might be waged against us with mass armies of a lower race. The reasons which compel us to continue our colonial activity are also of an economic character. It becomes clearer from day to day, even to the most pessimistic, that we must secure an adequate share of the raw materials essential for our economic existence. Our enemies openly threaten a blockade of raw materials. Even if we succeeded in averting this menace on the conclusion of peace, we should be permanently dependent on the grace of foreign Powers without any possibility of obtaining a part of the most necessary raw materials in our own territory. Consequently, the open door and freedom of trade in overseas countries, in spite of all the value we shall continue to attach to them in future, will not alone suffice. On the other hand, we are not thinking of cutting off the colonies from foreign trade, just as, in opposition to the French and Portuguese, we have hitherto never known a differential treatment of foreign persons and goods in our protectorates.

In view of my past in respect of colonial policy, in particular my attitude to the treatment of natives and the missions, I do not need to point out that, in addition to cogent political and economic reasons, there are equally cogent and important cultural reasons. There is agreement between ourselves and the enemy camp that the rule set up by civilised nations over wide territories in Africa and the South Seas cannot and may not be withdrawn without inflicting damage on the native population and without their falling back into chaotic conditions. This rightly leads up to the task of maintaining the rule of the advanced races with the object of gradually leading the backward peoples of these territories to a higher stage of intellectual and moral development. It is the right and duty of each of the great civilised States to take part in this task with which civilisation is faced. We do not want to shirk co-operation in this sphere and we cannot tolerate that other States keep us from it out of jealousy or disfavour. Our enemies are well acquainted with the cultural aspect of the colonial problem. It even forms the arsenal from which they are accustomed to take what they consider to be the most effective weapons against the restoration of our colonial empire. Everything that the British rightly brought forward for years in a press campaign against their present allies, the Belgians, and the acts of cruelty with which Leopold of Belgium and his Congo Government were charged, is now transformed and applied to us to an increased extent. How many English, French and even Belgian writers have written variations on the theme that the civilised nations could not take it upon themselves to allow the Germans, who had carried on a brutal policy of extermination and exploitation against the natives, to have a further opportunity of practising their dreadful colonial methods. These are the writings of the Congo League with a fresh title and a fresh binding. These accusations are as unfounded as they are lacking in originality; their originators, in so far as they know our colonial work, are deliberately disseminating false information. We need not be afraid of comparison with any other colonial State, including Great Britain, and we can energetically repudiate the criticism of our enemies and the conclusions which they draw.

From the point of view of politics, the relationship of the physical forces of the States, and from the point of view of economic policy, the relationship of their needs and economic capacity, must be taken as a basis for the distribution of the colonial territories of the world among the Powers wishing to take part in them; similarly, from the point of view of cultural policy, the cultural capacity of the various States must be taken as a gauge of their right to co-operate in the education and advancement of the native races. It is sufficient to refer to the excessive possessions of France, Portugal, and Belgium in order to show that the present distribution is not in accordance with these standards. We demand that, in the conclusion of peace, there should be a redistribution more in accordance with the above standards, and are convinced that this will lead to an equilibrium in the colonial sphere which will remove future possibilities of conflict and thus serve the cause of the desired world peace.

Statement by the German Government, on January 14th, 1919 (WTB).

In the Entente press, propaganda is being carried on in order to deprive Germany of her colonies. In this connection the Government of the Reich points out that for the future peace both the Allies and Germany have accepted unconditionally Mr. Wilson's proposals for settling the colonial questions. These ensure a free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims. The Government of the Reich takes the view that colonies are indispensable for the German nation. A peace which would deprive Germany of her colonies would be unjust and would leave behind it permanently a feeling of violence.

Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, German Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Interview by the Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Daily News, February 2nd, 1919.

At the present time the die is being cast in Paris regarding the German colonies. Our enemies are engaged in dividing among themselves the German protectorates which they have seized to the detriment of essential interests of the white race. A Reuter's telegram, which is however unconfirmed, even reports that President Wilson has requested the Australian Government to state its legal grounds for the occupation of the German colonies in the South Seas.

Germany cannot admit that her property be disposed of without her consent. She does not recognise any legal grounds for the spoliation committed. She demands her share in the new arrangements for the rule of the white race over the tropical territories and in the distribution of their products.

The fifth of President Wilson's fourteen points states that one of the tasks of world peace is a free, open-minded and impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, in which the interests of the native population must have an equal place with the justified demands of the Government whose legal claim to colonial sovereignty is to be established. During the Paris discussions, if we are correctly informed, the President then expressed the principle that the colonies should be placed under international control. Before accepting the armistice conditions, Germany recognised President Wilson's fourteen points, and the Entente also accepted these points, in particular No. 5, without any restrictions. Germany assumes that the principle of the international control applies to the colonies of all Powers of the European sphere of culture.

It is true that England tried, by means of a calumnious Blue Book, to represent German colonial rule as intolerable; this attempt must fail in view of the testimony given by the first minds of England as to the colonising sins of their own people. We Germans are far from wishing to deny that during the bare generation that Germany has carried on a colonial policy mistakes occurred; we merely affirm that they do not remotely approach the devastations caused by other colonising nations at the beginning of their activity. We can refer to a large number of testimonies from foreign visitors who, shortly before the outbreak of the War, praised the German administration in the protectorates and held it up as an example.

The German nation has proved its capacity for colonising work in Asia and Africa. In any case, like any other great nation, it has a claim to a share in the products of the tropical zones and in the development of the territories from which they are obtained. In case all the tropical colonies were to be placed under international control, it would demand an adequate territorial share in the administration of the entire tropical colonial areas.

If, as the newspapers report on the Paris negotiations, France, England and Belgium are pursuing the plan of dividing the colonies among themselves, they are departing from the principles on which a League of Nations can be erected in the sense of President Wilson's messages. Quite apart from the breach of the Congo Act, the seizure of the German colonies by the victors would be equivalent to a legitimisation of violence against which the Entente is alleged to have waged war. It is not in the interest of the community of nations that England, as a result of every war in which she takes part, gathers in a rich harvest of colonial possessions, as she has succeeded in doing for two hundred years. It is not in the interest of the community of nations that France should constantly extend her colonial possessions, which she is even now incapable of administering from an economic and demographic point of view, in order to reserve them exclusively for her own financiers by keeping out the other nations. If France acquires the Cameroons and Togoland, so that the French and Belgian Governments together command almost the whole of Central Africa, it will be a bad thing both for the activity of other nations in this rich area of tropical production and for the natives of the territory.

The natural development of Central Africa urgently demands internationalisation. It is not clear why the soil of Africa should be divided up among European Powers who have no other title to it than a conquest which is contrary to international law, while other nations have at least the same interest as themselves in the development of the territories that have been divided up.

The dividing up of the plunder among Germany's enemies would be particularly odious in view of the fact that during the War they acted with particular harshness towards the German missions which had admittedly done very valuable work in raising the level of the natives. Just as Germany readily recognises the services of the French white fathers in East Africa, she must demand that her opponents should do justice to the work of her missions in the east and west of the Continent. Apart from the European belligerents, however, other nations also take part in missionary work in Africa. They must take care that the future of Christian missions and the free co-operation of their members are not jeopardised by a harsh nationalisation of African territory and its division into capitalistic zones of exploitation.

It is not the aim of German colonial policy that all tropical colonies should be placed directly under an international government authority; but we also consider the better solution would be an adequate allocation of the colonial territories to individual nations for administration under their own responsibility. But the administration of the individual States must be under a controlling authority of the League of Nations which opposes to the strong interest of exploitation by the mother country the humanitarian interest of a benevolent treatment of the native population.

Open Letter from the German Colonial Association to President Wilson, of April 20th, 1919.

Before the whole world, we address you the question: From what sources have you obtained your information about the German colonies? Was it from the British Blue Books of July 1916 and August 1918? We reject these as tendentious, and in part false. As you yourself have hitherto been unable to visit the German colonies, there remained the possibility of obtaining reports from unprejudiced experts in America and neutral countries as to conditions in the German colonies. Only persons who know the German colonies from their own thorough observation are entitled to judge our action against the natives. Did you adopt this method of obtaining correct and thorough information? We cannot think so; otherwise your judgment would have been different. But even among our enemies you could and can even now find experts (we may mention among the English Hamilton

German Treatment and Education of Natives

"Contrary to what has been frequently asserted during these past two years, public opinion in Germany as we have already seen in the matter of the putting down of the Herero rebellion in South West Africa has been very much alive to the responsibility of Germany towards her native wards. One has only to read the newspapers and reviews, and to look over booth lists, and to go through parliamentary debates during the past fifteen years, to realize that only in Great Britain among all the European colonizing Powers, has there been manifested as much humanitarianism and idealism as in Germany with regard to the establishment and maintenance of a just and enlightened colonial regime. At this moment it is exceedingly important that this statement be made by one who cannot be suspected of sympathizing with Germany in the present war or of trying to plead the German cause. The truth is the truth. Only on the truth can the future be built."

The American Herbert Adam Gibbon
in his book "The new Map of Africa", 1916

"The Germans have done real wonders in the sphere of education. . . . The education of the natives was violently interrupted by the Great War. . . . It will take some time before education is again on the level it had reached under the Germans."

and Sir Harry Johnston, among the Americans Roosevelt and Gibbons, among the French Paul Leroy and the correspondent of the «Dépêche coloniale»), who have openly expressed their conviction both before and during the War in our favour.

Many official German publications show how carefully our officials enter into the peculiarities of the coloured races, how strictly our judges condemn injustice and cruelty towards natives, how many schools for natives there are in the German colonies, how many millions were spent each year on the health of the natives, how many German doctors—at the head of whom was Robert Koch whom the whole of America has highly honoured—have gone to the colonies in order to investigate, to heal and to combat tropical diseases, to reduce infantile mortality and in short to raise the health and moral level of the natives. What a vast work has been accomplished by the German Christian missions in German (and also in foreign) colonies! But the best proof of our native policy is provided by the course of the war in East Africa. How would it have been possible for our protectorate troops, cut off as they were from Europe, to resist for four years the British, Belgian, and Portuguese troops which were many times their number, if the entire population had not helped them? If we were really the cruel torturers we were made out to be, the natives would certainly have attacked the small scattered troops and taken revenge on their oppressors. Nothing of the kind occurred, but the contrary was the case. Such fidelity cannot be gained by compulsory measures, however, strict; these natives kept faith with us to the end, because we had inspired them with confidence and they were cordially attached to us. Can any colonial Power in the world point to such success for their colonising activity? Certainly not.

In the German mother country also constant interest has been taken in the natives; a society for the protection of natives formed by the undersigned Association counts among its members the best names of German scientists, missionaries and friends of the colonies and has frequently exercised its influence with good effect. We Germans have a right to be proud and are only to be envied for what we have done for the natives of our colonies and for the way they have recompensed us in time of need.

In your speech in Paris on February 14th, Mr. President, you said: "The States will be sought out who have already shown that they are capable of acting conscientiously in this matter and, under their guidance, new light and new hope will be brought to the helpless peoples of the world." Have you convinced yourself, Mr. President, whether this judgment of English, French, Belgians, and Portuguese (for you could only have meant them) is really justified? Who broke the Congo Act, and who brought the war to Africa? Who used their colonies for European purposes? Not we, but those who used coloured soldiers in hundreds of thousands in the struggle against white men and thereby damaged for ever the supremacy of the white race. Who is to blame that in East Africa alone about three quarters of a million natives fell victims to famine and disease? It was not done by us Germans but by those who attacked our colonies. Have you, Mr. President, never heard of the acts of cruelty of the British on the Putumayo, in New Zealand, Tasmania, and Ireland, and of those of the Belgians in the Congo? Do you know how shamelessly Great Britain still exploits the Indian peoples? Do you know that about a million people die there of malaria every year, even now when, thanks to the activity of the Americans in the Panama Canal, we know that this disease is on the whole to be prevented? Have you read the judgments of Indian and Egyptian patriots with regard to the British administration? Are you aware that in Morocco, Senegambia, Northern Rhodesia, and recently in Egypt, bloody risings have broken out among the "helpless peoples" against those who, as you believe, are so pre-eminently called upon to guide these very peoples? Has no word come to your ears of the ill-treatment meted out by the French and applied by their black soldiers to the defenceless German military and civil prisoners? Have you read the publications of the German Colonial Office with their atrocious details? Certainly not. Otherwise you could not conscientiously praise these nations and could not hand over to them the defenceless natives in order to bring them "new light and new hopes".

In point 5 of your message of January 8th, 1918, you solemnly announced to the world your desire for "a free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims". Trusting in your word, Germany laid down her arms. Is this trust now to be betrayed? It must be doubly painful to every German that you in particular, Mr. President, should lend your ear only to our enemies while heaping unjust charges upon us. Ask neutral experts who have become acquainted without prejudice with conditions in the German and foreign colonies from their own experience and who can compare the two. If they, as we confidently expect, give us no worse certificate than the other colonising nations, then we demand that you, as an honourable man, should confess openly to the world: "I was mistaken, I was wrongly informed." Then, when this sole reason for withholding our colonies is removed, we demand that you should, at the eleventh hour, use the enormous influence which is placed in your hands in order that the German nation may not be for ever deprived of the colonies which are a vital necessity to them. We are confident that all your endeavours are aimed at the victory and majesty of right; the first principle of right is that the accused should also be heard. We demand nothing more from you than justice.

Broadcast to the British nation by General von Lettow-Vorbeck, May 1919.

For over four years a devoted group of brave white and black men under my command defended Germany's right to her colonies. We lost the fight but not the right.

I am a simple soldier and cannot talk to you of politics. But the colonies of my fatherland mean more than politics. They now mean life or death for our people. Let no nation be so unreasonable as to think it can be responsible for choking our seventy millions in the centre of Europe. We urgently require for our New Germany a space for our emigrants, settlers, teachers, and missionaries. We demand the return of our African territories in order to be able to feed our people and to obtain certain raw materials for ourselves.

I appeal to the intelligence and justice of the British nation. What would you have felt if you had been threatened with losing your colonies and being choked on your little island? That is how we feel to-day.

We are filled with shame and anger and can hardly believe that this crime is really planned against us. It is a crime that no nation could forget or forgive.

We have thousands of young men as restless and as adventurous as your own. We need our colonies as an outlet for their healthy, peaceful forces. The qualities required by a bold, determined colonist, are precisely those which, if misled, make an unscrupulous criminal or anarchist.

We have worked for many years to build up our few colonies and to develop them to the advantage of white and black. We are young as a colonising Power and have made our mistakes. But in the very last years before the War, you, who were our neighbours in Africa, did not stint your praise for what we had accomplished. In our African house, we kept the door open and all nations were welcome.

It has been said that we treated our natives badly. In this connection we are afraid of no comparison with any other nation. During the terrible last four years our faithful Askaris and black bearers fought for us, worked hard and suffered death, side by side with us to the last. Your own soldiers will tell you what careful treatment your own wounded white and black troops received from us. When our Fatherland collapsed and we were compelled to give up the unequal struggle in Africa, your officers said: "It is natural that you must get back your colonies; England has more than she can look after."

That is a proved truth and a self-evident justice. Must England, with her mighty world empire, envy us our few possessions? The colonies of the German nation cannot be regarded in this new epoch of the world as a military prize of victory or as a political pawn.

I speak in the name of those who fought with me, of the young generations whose sole hope lies in our overseas lands. Englishmen, play a fair game in this great crisis of history.

Restore our property to us and do not let yourselves be led by a short-sighted policy to commit a crime which is at the same time an act of folly.

I do not know whether this appeal and protest will reach your ears. But as I know that it is the cry of a whole nation, I also know that it cannot be suppressed, that it will be written in the book of history and will one day be heard.

General von Lettow-Vorbeck.

II. After May 7th, 1919

The German Reply to the Peace Conditions of May 7th, 1919

Part 1. General Remarks

The settlement of the colonial question is equally contradictory to a peace of justice. For the essence of activity in colonial work does not consist in capitalistic exploitation of a less developed human race, but in raising backward peoples to a higher civilization. This gives the Powers which are advanced in culture a natural claim to take part in colonial work. Germany whose colonial accomplishments cannot be denied, has also this natural claim, which is not recognized by a treaty of peace that deprives Germany of all of her colonies.

10. Colonies

Article 119 of the draft demands that Germany shall renounce all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions. This regulation is in irreconcilable contradiction to point 5 of the Address to Congress of January 8, 1918, in which President Wilson promises a free, sincere and absolutely impartial settlement of all colonial claims. The basis of every impartial settlement is that, before the decision, the parties should be heard and their claims examined. Article 119 at once rejects the German claims without even giving Germany a chance to put them forward.

Germany's claim to her colonies is, first of all, based on the fact that she has acquired them lawfully and has developed them by means of incessant and fruitful toil and at the cost of many sacrifices. Her ownership of them has been acknowledged by all the Powers. Whenever conflicts have arisen with other Powers over particular sections of territory, they have been settled by means of agreements or arbitration.

The possession of her colonies will be even more necessary for Germany in the future than in the past, since, if only on account of her low rate of exchange, she must be able to acquire from her own colonies, as far as possible, the raw materials necessary to her economic life. Her earning capacity having been reduced owing to the result of the war, she also requires the profits accruing from home production.

Moreover, Germany needs her colonies as a market for her industries, in order that she may be able to pay for raw materials with her own manufactures and may have a field of activity for commerce. Germany is looking towards these resources to meet the liabilities imposed upon her in the peace treaty.

Finally, Germany requires colonies in order to have territory where at least a part of her surplus population may settle, the more so as the result of the war increases the necessity for, and reduces the possibility of emigration.

As a great civilized nation the German people have the right and the duty to cooperate in the joint task which devolves upon civilized mankind of exploring the world scientifically and of educating the backward races. In this direction she has achieved great things in her colonies. This assertion, and the claim based upon it, are not affected by the fact that, in the administration of the German colonies, blunders and mistakes have been made such as are to be found in the colonial history of all nations. Germany has a moral claim to the right to continue her successful work.

The interests of the coloured population in these regions are based likewise upon Germany's right to remain in the possession of her colonies. The German administration has abolished the devastating and incessant predatory warfare between the tribes, the high-handedness of the chiefs and witch-doctors, the kidnapping of slaves and the slave-trade, and the accompanying insecurity of life and property. It has brought peace and order to the country, and has created the conditions necessary for the safety of intercourse and commerce. An impartial jurisdiction, taking into consideration the point of view and customs of the natives, offered protection from oppression and exploitation, even by the white man. The opening of the country, by means of roads and railways, to world intercourse and its own trade, and the promotion of the existing culture and the introduction of a new civilization have raised the economic life of the natives to a higher level. The administration endeavoured, at the same time, to protect the native population by means of far-reaching social provisions, especially by labour legislation and the control of the conclusion of contracts between white men and natives. The scientific investigation and the methodical fighting of human and animal diseases (malaria, smallpox, sleeping-sickness, rinderpest) in which first-rate German experts, like Robert Koch, took an active part, comprehensive sanitary and hygienic measures, and the erection of hospitals have had the most beneficial effects on the life and health of the natives.

A well-organized system of education, including vocational and agricultural schools, provided intellectual and practical education for the natives. The German colonies belonged to the most rapidly and most hopefully developing fields of activity of the Christian missions of both faiths.

From all this it is apparent that Germany has looked after the interests of her natives. She has, in particular, from the outset strictly refrained from militarizing her natives in any way, and she would, therefore, unconditionally agree to an international prohibition of militarization. Germany has hitherto taken a most active part in all international regulation of important colonial questions, such as the abolition of the slave-trade, the suppression of the arms traffic, the liquor traffic and the combating of sleeping-sickness. Even when there was no international obligation, Germany has always—in contradistinction to some other important colonial Powers—adhered to the principle of the open door in her colonies, according the same treatment to foreign subjects as to her own.

Numerous ante-war testimonials of foreign colonial writers of repute, as well as the loyalty of the natives in the German colonies during the war, especially in East Africa, bear witness to the sincerity and the great successes of German colonization.

For the above reasons, the demand of the enemy contained in Articles 119 and 125, that Germany renounce her colonies, is considered unjustified.

Without in any way abandoning or modifying her refusal to renounce her colonies, the following remark is added—with a proviso that it may be supplemented—regarding the conditions under which the cession is demanded:

The demand that all movable and immovable State property in the colonies is to pass into the hands of the mandatory powers without compensation, is unfair and is an unwarranted exception to the principle that Germany shall be credited with the value of the State property in the territories ceded by her. As to the question of debt, the draft of the peace treaty will not allow the ceded colonies or the mandatory powers to take over part of the debt of the Empire and of the Federal States. It ought, accordingly, to be demanded that the State into whose keeping the colonies pass should compensate Germany for all the expenditures which were incurred by the Empire for the benefit of the colonies in question and for their administration, and that the territories to be ceded should continue to be responsible for the liabilities incurred by them.

German private property is to be at the arbitrary disposal of the mandatory States. These may liquidate all property of Germans and of companies controlled by Germans; they may continue the war measures and introduce new measures of the same kind. Moreover, the mandatory States may, according to their own pleasure, drive the Germans from house and home, even if they have been resident there for years or have been born there, and may permanently debar Germans from taking up any activity in the country. Regardless of all principles of international and public laws, this regulation makes the German an outlaw as far as private right and personal liberty of movement are concerned.

The demand that Germany should compensate French subjects for losses suffered before the War, is in contradiction to the armistice agreement and is unfair in other respects as well.

The demand that Germany is blindly to submit, for all time, to the will of her opponents in regard to the subjects treated in the General Acts of Berlin and Brussels is likewise unfair to a degree.

Accordingly, the German Government arrives at the following conclusions in regard to the German protectorates:

1. For the formal treatment of colonial questions, the following proposal is made:

In No. 5 of the fourteen points of President Wilson's address to Congress of January 8th, 1918, an absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial demands is assured. An impartial adjustment implies the hearing of both parties before a decision is arrived at. Such a hearing has not taken place. In the light of that assurance, and particularly in the light of the principle that in the adjustment of colonial claims the interests of the Governments should carry equal weight with those of the population, the proposal is made that the colonial questions be handed over to a special committee.

2. The following proposal applies to the practical adjustment:

The demand contained in Articles 119 et seq. of the draft of peace, concerning Germany's renunciation of her oversea possessions cannot, in the opinion of the German Peace Delegation, be brought into harmony with the stipulations of the armistice, which are based on point 5 of the message of January 8, 1918, to the Congress of the United States. The German Government, on the contrary, considers her claim to the restoration of her colonial possessions just. Germany is ready, however, to administer her colonies according to the principles of the League of Nations—possibly as the mandatory of the latter—if a League of Nations is formed which she can enter at once as a member State, enjoying equal privileges with the other members.

Expert opinion of the Colonial Commission of the German Delegation to the Peace Conference

I. Cession of the German Colonies

A. Contents of the Draft

The conditions of peace require that Germany should renounce her rights and titles in respect of her oversea possessions in favour of the Allied and Associated Powers (Art. 119).

The whole settlement of the future of the German colonies is really nothing other than annexation. In the case of Togoland and the Cameroons, the fact is quite open; indeed, it is only faintly veiled by the interposition of the mandate system. That the system was introduced solely in order to cover the annexation is plain from the fact that it is confined to the German colonies, whereas the general principle on which the system is based would have to be applied to the colonies of other States if it were intended to be seriously carried out. It is also clear that sovereignty over the colonies is to be conferred directly upon the mandatory Powers, and not upon the League of Nations (Art. 257).

B. Principles of the Basis of Peace regarding Colonies

When they concluded the Armistice, the belligerent Powers agreed that the basis of the peace treaty, so far as colonies were concerned, should be an unbiassed, honourable, and absolutely impartial settlement of all colonial claims, governed by the strict observance of the principle that in dealing with all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations affected must carry as much weight as the reasonable demands of the Government whose legal title was to be determined (Point V of the Address to Congress of January 8th, 1918). This clause was obviously designed to lead to a general scrutiny of the existing colonial system; and that was how the German Government construed it. To serve the cause of world peace, and to meet the reformed conception of the nature of colonisation, any fresh settlement of the colonial system had to be dominated by the fundamental idea of a far-reaching internationalisation of colonial territories and a distribution of territory better adapted to the productivity and economic and cultural needs of the colonial Powers. The Allied and Associated Powers seem to have given up any such idea. If the German colonies alone are to be made the subject of this scrutiny, then, on the basis of the Armistice terms, Germany has an indefeasible claim in international law to have the aforesaid Point V scrupulously applied. Accordingly, the decision as to the future of the German colonies must be governed by the interests of their inhabitants and the legitimate claims of Germany. Besides, there can be no question that the old principle of "no annexations" applies equally to colonies.

C. The Conditions compared with the Basis of Peace

1. German Colonial Administration

The cession of the German colonies, demanded in the draft peace treaty, is incompatible with the Basis of Peace.

As regards the interests of their populations, these were fully secured under German administration. The natives are still at a definitely lower stage of human civilisation, and are therefore in need of the protection and guidance of a modern civilised State. The possession of protective powers over backward peoples carries with it the obligation to civilise and develop them. In administering its colonies, the German Government has been guided by this high conception of the true nature of colonisation. It has not itself economically exploited these territories in the sole interest of the mother-country, nor has it allowed anybody else to do so. After many difficulties, such as all colonial Powers have to overcome, had been dealt with, this fundamental principle came to be recognised with increasing clearness during the last decade before the war, and was adopted as the guiding rule for the practical activities of the local administrative authorities; as witness the speeches of responsible German statesmen, the colonial literature of Germany, and the character and results of her colonial administration itself. In the matter of care for the physical and moral welfare of the natives, the German colonial administration was equal to that of the best-governed foreign colonies. The experience it gathered, its insight into the needs of its subjects, and its high sense of responsibility, offer every guarantee of the conscientious treatment and development of the native peoples in the future.

In the German colonies, internal peace, the foundation of all further development, was established and assured. Government and the administration of justice were in the hands of a competent civil service, whose first care was the welfare of the natives. Their organisations, customs, and legal conceptions were to a wide extent preserved and respected. Military occupation was reduced to a minimum; only in the larger African colonies were there bodies of troops, and relatively small, while in none were there naval stations, fortifications to resist enemies from without, or any organisation for militarising the native population. The entire revenue was left in the hands of the colonies, and, in addition, the Reich subsidised them out of its own resources, in order to facilitate their development. No other colonial Power outstripped Germany in the struggle against slavery and the slave-trade, and against the traffic in arms and liquor. The engagement of labour for European undertakings, and the protection of the labourers from exploitation, were dealt with by far-reaching legislation, and were always a subject of special vigilance; forced labour was forbidden. The prevalent social diseases were everywhere successfully combated with all the resources of tropical medicine, and health conditions were steadily improved. Good Government schools and State-aided Christian missions, German and other, worked to raise the moral and intellectual level of the natives, and there were vocational and agricultural schools to spread technical knowledge. Remarkable work was done in opening up the territories by constructing harbours, roads, and railways. The food-supply was assured; the training of the natives to work and the exploitation of the resources of the soil by native cultivation and plantations were progressing excellently. All the colonies were open to all comers; there was complete freedom of trade and absolute equality of treatment for all nations. In all these fields of colonial activity, Germany worked with the utmost zeal and with powerful resources, in the right spirit, towards a clearly-conceived end. The result was to be seen in the rapid economic and cultural expansion of the German colonies, which, in those respects, kept at least abreast of the neighbouring foreign possessions.

The natives themselves were content with the German administration, with few exceptions, the special reasons for which are easy to explain. Risings ceased to occur during the last few years before the War. The attitude adopted by the natives during the War itself is irrefutable evidence of their loyalty and attachment. Whereas in some of the colonies of the enemy Powers, despite the large forces available, extensive risings had to be put down, the native population of the German colonies, apart from purely sporadic incidents, remained completely quiet and readily assisted in the defence of the territories, although they knew that the German Administration was in an extremely precarious position. This is especially true of German East Africa, which could never have defended itself at all but for the support of the natives. Furthermore, the German Government is convinced, and has evidence, that the great majority of the natives in all the colonies desire the restoration of German rule. Occasional voices may be raised against it; but everybody who knows how prone primitive folk are to give the answer that they think the questioner wishes to hear, and how easily they are influenced, will realise with what caution such statements must be regarded.

Both before and even, to some extent, during the War, a large number of expert opinions, including some from the Allied and Associated Powers, were expressed in recognition of the fine spirit of the German colonial administration, its efficiency in colonisation, and the results of its work up to that time. The negotiations between England and Germany shortly before the War on Central African questions make it clear that at that time the British Government was far from finding fault with Germany's colonial work. If an attempt is now to be made, by producing material of all kinds, to prove that Germany pursued a policy of oppression, exploitation, and maltreatment, not to say extermination, towards the natives of her colonies, and if decisions are to be taken on that basis, then there must first be an impartial investigation of the facts. It is not to be denied that mistakes were made and faults committed, both by individual officials and by the Administration as such; but the great majority of them occurred prior to the latest period of German colonial policy, and can therefore be of no decisive importance. Nor is it possible to judge of the system as a whole from isolated occurrences. Lastly, it is easy enough to point to similar mistakes in the enemy colonies. On the charges brought against its colonial administration, the German Government is prepared to appear before any tribunal or other authority whose impartiality and fitness to judge is assured.

As to the decision about South West Africa, unless the right of self-determination is to be grossly infringed, the wishes of the local white settlers, who have grown up with the country, cannot be overridden. Five sixths of them are German, and it is to their interest that the German connexion should be maintained, because that is the only way for them to preserve their national characteristics. In any case, that is the decision the population will take if it is given the opportunity.

2. The German Claims

a) Legal Title

Germany's claim to her colonies rests primarily on the fact that they were acquired in accordance with international law by treaty with the natives and by agreement with the interested Powers. The greater part of the territory previously belonged to none of the States which form part of the international community. The rest (the East African coastal strips, the Caroline Islands, and the New Cameroons) were acquired by purchase or exchange. In every case possession was taken with much less friction than in other colonies, where protracted wars of conquest took place. Germany's title to her colonies is therefore unassailable, and at least as good as the title of any other country to its oversea possessions. Apart from that, Germany can point to her thirty years of successful colonial work, which gives her a moral right to the return of her colonies. In this connexion, reference may also be made to the achievements of numerous German savants and travellers who were active in the scientific exploration of Africa and the South Sea Islands both before and after the partition of those territories among the colonial States.

b) Economic Necessity

Germany's aim in acquiring her colonies was an economic one. Economic, too, are the considerations that make the preservation of her colonial possessions a matter of life and death, in consequence of the loss of the war and the terrible stringency of the peace-terms.

1. Sources of Raw Materials

Germany is obliged to import food and raw materials, in order to feed and clothe her population and maintain the activity of industry, on which a large part of her people are entirely dependent for employment and food. Tropical and subtropical countries are of increasing importance as sources of supply. Before the War, they accounted for not much less than half Germany's total imports of 11,000,000,000 marks. In the territories controlled by the Allied and Associated Powers, German trade will in future have to contend with great difficulties, due to the transfers of sovereignty consequent upon the War and the effects of the economic War. This enhances the importance to Germany of her own colonies. True, they have so far provided only a small proportion of her imports; but that is due, not to any lack of capacity on their part, but to the fact that they were only in the early stages of economic development. In the future they may confidently be expected to yield large quantities of products of which Germany is in urgent need: their productive possibilities are assessed very highly by the best authorities. Moreover, to obtain supplies from her own colonies makes Germany's financial position easier, since they and the mother-country form a single monetary unit. Hence the cession of the colonies, which is now demanded, would deprive Germany of a large part of her economic development. It is in the best interests of the Allied and Associated Powers to ensure that Germany's needs in the way of food and raw materials from abroad are met, because on that depend the continuance of German industry and the whole economic life of the country, without which it will be impossible for Germany to meet the financial obligations imposed upon her.

2. Markets

As an industrial country, Germany also needs her colonies as markets for her exports, from which alone she can obtain the means to make the foreign payments involved by her imports of raw materials and the reparations required by the Peace Treaty. As they are progressively opened up and their production increases, the German colonies will acquire a greater capacity to absorb manufactured goods, and in the comparatively near future will become important markets for German industry—the more important because Germany's trade relations with a considerable proportion of her old clientèle have been interrupted by the War.

3. Settlement Territories.

In the future the emigration question will again become important for Germany, because the home country will no longer be able to provide all its inhabitants with food and work. This effect would be exceedingly pronounced if the territorial and economic terms of the Allied and Associated Powers were carried out; but in any event the difficult conditions brought about by the loss of the War would compel many thousands of Germans to seek a living abroad. Access to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, to which the areas hitherto generally preferred for emigration belong, will be made difficult, if not impossible, for Germans. On the other hand, Germany's own colonies stand open to them. True, only a comparatively small number of Germans have hitherto gone to live in them; but that will be altered by the pressure of the home country's economic difficulties. Even in the tropical colonies, the highlands, which are suitable for permanent settlement, and in which there is room for plenty of Europeans provided they only expect to make a living, will be largely resorted to. The objections that have been made in the past to white settlement in the tropics will yield to the threat of poverty and hardship in the home country. In this way the colonies can provide a safety-valve against over-population at home.

c) Idealistic Grounds

Apart from her urgent economic necessities, Germany has idealistic grounds for demanding the return of her colonies.

The colonisation of undeveloped countries and the civilisation of their peoples is a task imposed on the whole of civilised humanity. Every civilised nation has an indefeasible claim to take part in it; and Germany makes this claim with the utmost emphasis. The task is such an enormous one that the development of the territories in question would suffer if Germany's cooperation were to cease. To exclude Germany, against her will, from taking her share in colonisation, would be to expel her from the civilised community, and that would be irreconcilable with the highest principles and with the spirit of the basis agreed upon for peace.

Many millions of Germans have the Christian mission to the heathen close at heart, and their interest in it is deeply rooted in their Christian faith. Since Germany acquired colonies of her own, the German missionary movement has assumed greatly increased proportions, and the missionary idea has for the first time become the common possession of German Christendom. Incalculable harm would be done to the life of the Church and to popular religion if the German people were to be deprived of the possibility of continuing its colonial mission, which has so vastly developed within the last 30 years that at the outbreak of the war a third of all the German Protestant missions, and four fifths of all the Catholic, were working in the German colonies.

There are other important reactions on the home country that make it impossible for the German people to do without colonies of their own. Colonial experience is of the utmost scientific and technical value at home. Comparative philology, comparative law, ethnology, anthropology, and tropical medicine, to name only a few branches of science, have drawn from the colonies data of the greatest benefit to German and to all mankind. They have been responsible for the foundation of scientific institutions of worldwide fame. This is another reason why the loss of her colonies would injure Germany's intellectual life.

Lastly, in the hour of defeat, the German people as a whole needs an ideal goal, something transcending its own narrow frontiers, something to occupy its imagination. From this standpoint, too, the best Germans look upon the possession of colonies as an urgent necessity. Our adversaries themselves can judge whether it is good policy to deprive them of this outlet. They are aware that after the war of 1870-71 Germany not merely refrained from touching the French colonies, but did her utmost to encourage and assist the expansion of France's oversea empire.

It is not Germany's intention to pursue an ambitious militaristic policy in the colonies. Unlike other colonial Powers, she has refrained both from militarising the natives and from setting up other kinds of military establishment. In the future, her army and navy being reduced to insignificance, she will be quite unable to follow any other policy. That apart, she is prepared to offer guarantees making any exploitation of the colonies for military purposes impossible.

3. Conclusion

The German colonies form a comparatively small proportion of the colonial territories in the world. Of all the European colonial Powers engaged in the War, Germany has by far the smallest oversea dominions in proportion to the area and population of the home country. If peace is concluded in accordance with the draft that has been put forward, she will lose even that much, and will then be the only important industrial country in Europe that has no colonies. Their loss would be not only a severe material injury, but an additional serious obstacle to her economic development.

The conditions of peace contain no justification for the confiscation of the colonies. In this connexion, however, it is impossible to ignore the speech in which the President of the United States of America, on February 14th, 1919, introduced the draft of a League of Nations Covenant to the plenary assembly of the delegates of the Allied and Associated Powers. If that speech was correctly reported in the press, he said that Germany had inflicted the most intolerable burdens and injustices on the helpless people of some of her colonies, that she had considered it in her interest to exterminate them rather than to develop them, and that it had been her aim to obtain possession of the natives' land for European use, not to gain their confidence and so raise them to a higher stage of civilisation. This extremely unfavourable judgment of German colonial policy is a disgraceful affront to Germany, and the strongest exception is taken to it. Its only possible explanation is that an erroneous idea was formed from material selected with partiality and torn from its context.

Before so weighty a judgment was reached, morally annihilating Germany as a colonial Power for ever and representing her as unworthy ever to possess colonies again, the accused people ought, on the most elementary principles of justice and in accordance with the agreement that all colonial claims should be adjusted with absolute impartiality, to have been given the opportunity of defending themselves. As this was not thought necessary, the German delegation is obliged to demand the production of the material on which the judgment was based, and the opening of joint negotiations in a commission, in which it can decide its attitude and give a true picture of the principles, aims, and methods of German colonial administration. It assumes as a matter of course that this request will be granted, and is sure that, on impartial investigation, the charge that Germany is unworthy to possess colonies will be shown to be unfounded.

When it accepted President Wilson's message of January 8th, 1918, as a basis for peace, the German Government never doubted that the colonies would be restored. Supported by the unanimous feeling of the German people, it regards the deliberate confiscation of the German colonies as an arbitrary violation of the basis of peace, to which it cannot subscribe.

II. The Internationalisation of Colonies

The demand for an international system of administration for all non-self-governing colonies is based upon two fundamental ideas: that the development of backward peoples and their lands is the common responsibility of all civilised countries, and that all nations have an equal right to economic and cultural activity in those territories. This demand is continually securing new adherents, but it is still a matter for the future. The first attempts to comply with it are to be found in the General Act of Berlin and Brussels, in the framing and execution of which Germany took a leading part.

The Covenant of the League of Nations, as drafted by the Allied and Associated Powers, lays down the principle (Art. 22) that the wellbeing and development of peoples which are not yet able to stand by themselves is a sacred trust of civilisation, but limits its application (apart from portions of Turkish territory) to the colonies that Germany is required to give up. That limitation in itself makes it plain that the Allied and Associated Powers are not taking the internationalisation of colonies seriously. How far the mandatory Powers are to be placed under any obligation in respect of the administration of the colonies entrusted to them by the League of Nations is a question that has already been touched upon in the introduction. The only general obligation applying to all the colonies of Members of the League (Art. 23, para. b) is the somewhat vague one that native peoples must receive suitable treatment.

Germany is only maintaining the attitude she has hitherto adopted towards this problem, when she says that she is willing to help in building up the international order in the colonies. But she demands on principle that all non-self-governing colonies should be included, and holds it necessary that the areas in respect of which an international settlement is to be reached should be considerably extended, and that more effective provision should be made for enforcing that settlement. The German Government's proposals for the establishment of a League of Nations, which have been submitted to the delegates of the Allied and Associated Powers, contain the outlines of such a settlement. As matters for international regulation they mention not only the slave-trade and the traffic in liquor and in arms and ammunition, but also the protection of natives against forced labour and forced expropriation, and provision for their health, education, and well-being. It is proposed that the arrangements be carried out and superintended by an International Colonial Office and by League of Nations representatives in the colonies themselves. There can be no question but that the German proposals come nearer to the ideal of internationalising colonies than those of the Allied and Associated Powers; yet they do not exceed the bounds of the practicable.

According to the draft Peace Treaty that has been put forward, Germany, since she is not to be a Member of the League of Nations, is to be excluded from assisting to decide about the internationalised colonial territories, and from participating in their administration as a mandatory of the League of Nations. The draft goes even further in the way of ignoring Germany, for it is proposed to reserve to the Allied and Associated Powers the right to make fresh arrangements on the subjects dealt with in the General Acts of Berlin and Brussels (Art. 126). This claim, which, if admitted, would enable the Allied and Associated Powers to exclude Germany, not merely from her position as a Contracting Party to those Acts, but also from the rights therein established for all nations, is in the highest degree unreasonable and unjust.

Finally, on the subject of the German colonies, the conclusions of the German delegation to the Peace Conference are as follows:—

The demand embodied in Articles 119 et seq. of the draft Peace Treaty, that Germany should renounce her oversea possessions, is, in the opinion of the German delegation, irreconcilable with the armistice agreements based on Point V of the Message to the United States Congress dated January 8th, 1918. The German delegation therefore has the honour, making further reference to the four principles laid down in the Message to the United States Congress dated February 11th, 1918, to propose to the Allied and Associated Governments that the demand for such renunciation be abandoned. Should this proposal on the part of the German delegation meet with objections on grounds that have not yet been made known, Germany would still regard it as the basis of a just and lasting peace, as far as the colonial question is concerned, if she were allowed to administer her colonies according to the principles and under the supervision of the League of Nations—as the League's mandatory, if it were so desired.

III. The Reply of the Allies

The Justification of the Seizure of the Colonies by the Colonial-Guilt Lie

(Original English text)

Finally, the Allied and Associated Powers are satisfied that the native inhabitants of the German colonies are strongly opposed to being again brought under Germany's sway, and the record of German rule, the traditions of the German Government and the use to which these colonies were put as bases from which to prey upon the commerce of the world, make it impossible for the Allied and Associated Powers to return them to Germany, or to entrust to her the responsibility for the training and education of their inhabitants.

Extract from the reply of the Allied and Associated Powers to the observations of the German Delegation on the peace conditions.

Part IV.

German Rights and Interests. Outside Germany.

I

In requiring Germany to renounce all her rights and claims to her oversea possessions, the Allied and Associated Powers placed before every other consideration the interests of the native populations advocated by President Wilson in the fifth point of his Fourteen Points mentioned in his Address of the 8th January, 1918. Reference to the evidence from German sources previous to the war of an official as well as of a private character, and to the formal charges made in the Reichstag, especially by MM. Erzberger and Noske, will suffice to throw full light upon the German colonial administration, upon the cruel methods of repression, the arbitrary requisition, and the various forms of forced labour which resulted in the depopulation of vast expanses of territory in German East Africa and the Cameroons, not to mention the tragic fate of the Hereros in South West Africa, which is well known to all.

Germany's dereliction in the sphere of colonial civilisation has been revealed too completely to admit of the Allied and Associated Powers consenting to make a second experiment and of their assuming the responsibility of again abandoning thirteen or fourteen millions of natives to a fate from which the war has delivered them.

Moreover, the Allied and Associated Powers felt themselves compelled to safeguard their own security and the Peace of the world against a military imperialism, which sought to establish bases whence it could pursue a policy of interference and intimidation against the other Powers.

II

The Allied and Associated Powers considered that the loss of her Colonies would not hinder Germany's normal economic development.

The trade of the German Colonies has never represented more than a very small fraction of Germany's total trade: in 1913 one-half of one per cent of her imports and one-half of one per cent of her exports. Of the total volume imported by Germany of such products as cotton, cocoa, rubber, palm kernels, tobacco, jute and copra, only 3 per cent came from her Colonies. It is obvious that the financial, commercial and industrial rehabilitation of Germany must depend on other factors.

For climatic reasons and other natural causes the German Colonies are incapable of accommodating more than a very small proportion of the excess German emigration. The small number of colonists resident there before the War is conclusive evidence in this respect.

III

The Allied and Associated Powers have drawn up, in the matter of the cession of the German Colonies, the following methods of procedure, which are in conformity with the rules of International Law and Equity:

(a) The Allied and Associated Powers are applying to the German Colonies the general principle in accordance with which the transfer of sovereignty involves the transfer under the same conditions to the State to which the surrender is made of the immovable and movable property of the ceding State.

They see no reason for consenting in the case of the Colonies to any departure from that principle which may have been admitted as an exceptional measure in the case of territory in Europe.

(b) They are of opinion that the Colonies should not bear any portion of the German debt, nor remain under any obligation to refund to Germany the expenses incurred by the Imperial administration of the Protectorate. In fact, they consider that it would be unjust to burden the natives with expenditure which appears to have been incurred in Germany's own interest, and that it would be no less unjust to make this responsibility rest upon the Mandatory Powers, which, in so far as they may be appointed Trustees by the League of Nations, will derive no benefit from such Trusteeship.

IV

The Allied and Associated Powers considered that it would be necessary in the interest of the natives, as well as in that of general peace, to restrict the influence which Germany might seek to exert over her former Colonies and over the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers.

(a) They are obliged for the reasons of security already mentioned to reserve to themselves full liberty of action in determining the conditions on which Germans will be allowed to establish themselves in the territories of the former German Colonies. Moreover, the control to be exercised by the League of Nations will provide all the necessary guarantees.

(b) They require Germany to subscribe to the Conventions which they may conclude for the control of the traffic in Arms and Spirits and for the modification of the General Acts of Berlin and Brussels. They do not think that Germany has any ground to consider herself humiliated or injured because she is required to give her consent in advance to measures accepted by all the great commercial Powers in regard to questions of such great importance to the welfare of the native populations and to the maintenance of civilisation and peace.

The Allied and Associated Powers consider that all the possessions and property of the German State in the territory of Kiaochow must be treated on the same footing as State property in all the other German oversea possessions, and be transferred without compensation. In this connection they recall the fact that Kiaochow, which was unjustly torn from China, has been used by Germany as a military base in pursuance of a policy which in its various manifestations has constituted a perpetual menace to the peace of the Far East. In these circumstances they see no reason why Germany should be compensated for the loss of works and establishments and in general for public property which in the

"Apart from the regular employment afforded, the natives have been taught discipline and have come to realize what can be achieved by industry. Every labourer is an embryo planter. Large numbers who return to their villages take up cocoa or other cultivation on their own account, thus increasing the general prosperity of the country."

From the official "British Report on the British Sphere of the Cameroons". Parliamentary Papers, May 1922, page 68

Under the supervision of the German Government all measures were taken to ensure the well-being of the workmen in all directions, and, apart from the regular employment offered them, the natives were taught discipline and the realisation of what can be attained by diligence.

Report by the Governor of Nigeria, Sir Hugh Clifford (1923)

"Togoland was undoubtedly administered by the Germans in first class manner. They did not spare either time or money in developing their large-scale policy. The training of Africans as carpenters, fitters, mechanics, masons, smiths etc., as a glance at the town of Lome shows, was carried out by the Germans in a remarkable manner. The Germans had laid down an extensive first-class system of roads in the entire country."

Newspaper article in "West Africa" of June 23rd 1923, No. 334

"Whoever has studied colonial history at all knows that every nation committed misdeeds against the natives and that no nation is entitled to accuse another in this respect. It would not be possible to prove that Germany ill-treated natives in a higher degree than the other colonizing Powers."

Alcide Ebray in „La paix malpropre“.

"Wherever the German may be, the schoolmaster is abroad. With the missionaries, the colonial Governments have developed education to quite an astonishing extent."

L. Hamilton, in the "United Press" of July 1913

"I am driven to the conclusion that the charges against them are due to suspicions, natural enough in war-time, but without real foundation, and that the statement has been repeated so often upon scanty evidence, that it has come to be accepted as a fact. The great unselfish service of German missions under the British flag calls for an impartial scrutiny of any statement made against them."

Dr. Frank Lenwood, one of the leading officials of the London Missionary Society, in a letter to "The Challenge" of May 10th 1918

"The natives are our protégés and the German Government must for their sake assume the obligation of making the interests of the natives its own. For we do not wish to exterminate the natives, but to preserve them. That is the moral duty which we assumed when we hoisted the German flag in our colonies and in the South Seas."

Dr. Solf in a speech in the Reichstag on March 6th, 1912

"The vigour and strength and system with which Germany, not to mention other European countries, has of late years thrown herself into the work of outside colonisation, has been very marked and notable."

The Canadian Minister of Trade, George Foster, at the meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute in London on January 13th, 1914

"There was no lie we would not believe; no charge of crime which our furious prejudice would not credit. I thought at one time of making a collection of the lies which the French had written against us and we had published against them during the war: it would be a strange memorial of popular falsehood."

The English writer Thackeray in his book "The Four Georges" (3rd chapter) of Natives

"We find here (in southern Togoland) an enormous number of tiny villages, each ruled by two or three head chiefs of the families forming the village. In order to make good this lack of political unity, the Germans formed districts by uniting a certain number of villages and placing them under the most influential notables of the district. The German administration had conferred absolute power on these paramount chiefs, a practice that is incompatible with the fundamental principles of our political system. We have gradually restricted these excessive privileges, in particular the right to exercise jurisdiction."

From the French Mandatory Report for 1923, page 12

"As a matter of fact, German rule, from the nineties right up to the outbreak of the war, was by no means unpopular in East-Africa. The leading native chiefs were treated as we treat the Indian Rajahs, and the Arabs became so thoroughly reconciled to the German dominion that they became powerful allies of the Germans."

Governor Harry Johnston

"The common impression that we should not find much to learn from the German administration of East Africa is founded on a superficial or out-of-date knowledge of the facts..... Naturally enough, we judged the German system by our own, and in some ways found it wanting; as a nation we have had far greater experience in ruling tropical countries, and we were quick to notice what we considered to be weak points in the German administration; but at the same time we saw much to admire, and the general verdict must, we think, be one of congratulation to our neighbours (p.93)..... On the whole, they have every reason to be proud of what they are doing in their East African Protectorate (p.101)."

Frank H. Melland and Edward H. Cholmeley, in their book "Through the Heart of Africa", London, 1912

"And, first, the annexation of German territory was a distinct breach of the pledge given to our nation and the world at the beginning of the war. On the eve of the outbreak of hostilities we as a people, in common with our Allies, professed that the war was one only against aggression and domination, and the Prime Minister of the day (Asquith) formally repudiated all intent or thought of annexation, as did his leading colleagues latter. That pledge the nation, in a noble mood of moral elation, gladly received and implicitly believed. Yet the struggle had not lasted many months before the Allied Governments were drawing up secret agreements for the appropriation of vast territories in three continents!"

The English historian William Harbutt Dawson

"The Germans had sown thousands of millions in the soil of Africa."

"Dépêche Coloniale" of October 6th 1916

"The Government in German East Africa have taken the part of the native and grant the farmers every possible assistance, and help them to obtain labour, since they are determined not to admit any compulsory measures."

The British Vice-Consul, Douglas Young in his report for 1907/08

"But I was not as well prepared for the corresponding and equally interesting types among the Germans, the planters, the civil officials, the officers who had commanded, or were about to command, white or native troops — men of evident power and energy, seeing whom made it easy to understand why German East Africa has thriven apace. They are first-class men, these English and Germans; both are doing in East Africa a work of worth to the whole world; there is ample room for both, and no possible cause for any but a thoroughly friendly rivalry; and it is earnestly to be wished, in the interest both of them and of outsiders too, that their relations will grow, as they ought to grow, steadily better — and not only in East Africa, but everywhere."

Theodore Roosevelt, in his book: "African Game Trails" (1910)

"Of all the overlords of Africa the German has the cleanest hands and the best prospects. His African invasion was characterized by the most artful diplomacy, but even his bitterest enemy could scarcely declare that he did not play fair."

"I have closely observed the Germans in their intercourse with their half-savage 'protégés' on the West Coast. Administration and government on the black continent are largely a question of temperament, and to all appearances the Germans are less liable to give way to irritation and excitement than other white men. I have studied all the white races engaged in the work of awakening Africa, and I cannot avoid the conviction that the German native will develop himself as highly as all the others, if, indeed, not more highly."

hand of this Power have for the most part been used merely as a means of carrying out its policy of aggression.

In so far as concerns the railway and the mines that go with it, referred to in Article 156, para. 2, the Allied and Associated Powers hold that these should be considered as public property. They would, however, be prepared, in the event of Germany adducing proof to the contrary, to apply to such private rights as German nationals may be able to establish in the matter, the general principles laid down in the Conditions of Peace in respect of compensation of this character.

IV. The Colonial-Guilt Lie and its Refutation

The arguments used against Germany in 1919 in order to justify before the public opinion of the world a veiled annexation of the former German colonies are only rarely to be found among the international colonial experts. The lie regarding colonial guilt, i.e. the alleged incapacity of Germany to colonise, as expressed in the covering note of the former Allies of June 16th, 1919, was also officially withdrawn. With the destruction of the British Blue Book in 1926, that is to say, of the document which in 1919 was the strongest weapon in the hands of the Allies in carrying out their colonial annexation, the injustice done to Germany was at the same time refuted.

* * *

In connection with the German claim to colonies and raw materials, anti-German propaganda has endeavoured by means of other arguments to revive the colonial-guilt lie in a more or less veiled form. While this "revival" is to be found in England only in letters to the press, in France on the other hand all the charges against Germany which have long been refuted are disseminated in the press in the most malicious manner. For instance, the French review "Vu" in a special number of April 25th, 1936 uses the crudest methods to combat the German colonial claim. It would have been unnecessary to enter into such statements in the press if the former French Colonial Minister, Paul Renaud, had not written the introduction to this special number. Subsequently in the same review, the present French Colonial Minister, M. Moutet, in an interview made the most superficial reply to the German colonial claim and stated that Germany was now only claiming colonies because the heavy strain of the war industry was removing her basis of subsistence. In a recent number of the "Revue des Deux Mondes", i.e. on May 15th, 1937, the French Senator Frederic Eccard published an article: "Les revendications coloniales allemandes", which endeavours to refute the German claim. The speech by the Leader and Chancellor of January 30th, 1937, is described in this article as bluff. The regaining of the colonies is considered as representing a purely military and strategical interest on the part of Germany, and Eccard ventures to serve up again to the readers of this review every detail of the charges made in 1919 against Germany. It is moreover an interesting feature of this article that it unblushingly takes the secret treaties regarding the distribution of the German colonies as the legal basis in case the League of Nations should ever proceed to redistribute the mandates. That the deputy Archimbaud, who is sufficiently well known for his anti-German sentiments, should sing the same tune is only natural. In reply to Sir Samuel Hoare's speech, all he could find to say in the "Temps" of September 24th, 1935, was the cry: "Let us not allow Germany to take the place on which we are sitting", for "Togoland and the Cameroons are the pearls of the French Colonial Empire". The attacks made by the former Colonial Minister, Sarraut, in "Marianne" of February 17th, 1937, are less comprehensible.

In a period of political détente after the War, even French colonial experts recognised the great colonising work carried out by Germany, especially in the colonies allotted as a mandate to France, so that the propaganda to be found in the above examples can only be taken as implying a deliberate attempt to exploit the lack of knowledge of the readers of historical and material facts.

VI

The Allied and Associated Powers are anxious that no misunderstanding should exist with regard to the disposition of the property of German missions in territory belonging to them or of which the government is entrusted to them in accordance with the Treaty. They have, therefore, explicitly stated that the property of these missions will be handed over to boards of trustees appointed by or approved by the Governments and composed of persons holding the faith of the mission whose property is involved.

Anyone who continues to use the colonial-guilt lie against Germany must be aware that he is living in a glass house. The provisions of the Versailles Treaty regarding the German colonies are based on the colonial lie. The official documents on which the expropriation was based in the Versailles Treaty, have in the meantime been recognised as forged, untrue and one-sided. The history of German colonisation is at present as clean before the world conscience as that of other colonial nations. There are no unproved facts, no convincing proofs, that could be brought forward in order to leave the slightest stain on the history of German colonising activity and which could place Germany in a worse light than other colonial Powers.

In this connection we reproduce on another page a number of statements and declarations which show convincingly enough German colonial achievement before the War. Germany can only be proud of this work, which was not inferior to that of any other colonial nation.

* * *

The Allies, bound by secret treaties, had made up their minds as far back as 1915 to expropriate the German colonies.

In Townsend's book "The Rise and Fall of the German Empire", we find the following passage in this connection:

"Before proceeding to the detailed terms of the Treaty of Versailles regarding the disposition of the German colonies, let us summarize the situation in regard to these territories as it existed early in 1919, when the Congress was convened. The Allies — France, Great Britain, and Japan — had been occupying and administering all the German colonies, except East Africa, since 1915, and — it must be remembered — possession is nine points of the law. Furthermore, for the perpetuation of that occupation several definite secret treaties and understandings were in existence: in March, 1916, Great Britain and France had signed a Convention dividing Kamerun and Togoland between them; in the secret treaty of London (April 26th, 1915) France and Great Britain had promised to Italy "compensation" if they enlarged their possessions in Africa, meaning thereby additions to the Italian colonies in that continent; and in 1917 Japan had asked Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy to agree to support at the Peace Conference, "the claims of Japan in regard to the disposal of Germany's right in Shantung and her possessions in the islands north of the Equator". To which Great Britain agreed on condition that the Japanese "would treat in the same spirit Great Britain's claims to the German islands south of the Equator. France agreed on condition that Japan would urge China to break relations with Germany, and Russia and Italy likewise consented.

Furthermore, in addition to all these secret, but none the less definite and binding arrangements, there existed "hopeful expectations" on the part of the British Dominions and Belgium to which the Great Powers were more or less committed. Australia and New Zealand naturally expected to profit from the part which they had so efficiently played in the capture of the South Sea islands; the Union of South Africa expected to annex German South West Africa, and Belgium had high hopes of a reward for her share in the conquest of German East Africa.

With the foregoing in regard to the German colonial territories before us, we can see that Clause 119 of the Treaty of Versailles merely placed a rubber stamp upon what actually had taken place."

What Townsend shortly describes here was however partly known in 1919.

By occupying the German colonies, or to express it more accurately, by transferring the European war to the colonial territories, the Allies had, in spite of German warning, committed a breach of the most important charter of all white colonial nations, the Congo Act of 1885. The Allies had to veil all this before world public opinion, for their peoples in the name of justice had entered a war which was not to be a war of conquest. The war against Germany was waged by means of programmes bristling with pacifist phrases. At the moment of "victory" they were obliged to camouflage the imperialism laid down in their treaties and to make the annexation palatable to world conscience by a new propaganda trick. This position gave rise to the purposeful lie regarding the brutality of German colonial methods, and the alleged incapacity of the Germans to carry on the work of colonial education and administration.

In addition to private propaganda in the press and lectures, the charges were made semi-officially against Germany primarily in two publications: the defamatory writings of Mr. Evans Lewin, the librarian of the London Colonial Institute, and the hand books published by Sir George W. Prothero, head of the Historical Section of the Foreign Office, in particular Hand Book No. 114 entitled "German Treatment of Natives". In August 1918 came the official British publication of the so-called Blue Book: "The Report on the Natives of South West Africa and their Treatment by Germany." From French official quarters the colonial-guilt lie was disseminated mainly by the publications of the "Journal Officiel de la République Française" of November 8th, 1918, and January 5th, 1919.

In Belgium a Grey Book was published in 1919: "Correspondance Diplomatique et Politique relative à la Guerre en Afrique", which tried to place the blame on Germany for the fact that the conventional Congo Basin did not, as provided for in the Congo Act, remain outside the hostilities. The exchange of notes carried on in 1914 regarding the neutralisation of the possessions of the belligerents in the Congo basin, however, shows clearly that the Allies attached no importance to the maintenance of the Congo Act, but tried rather to take possession unconditionally of the German colonies. "Germany is to be beaten wherever she can be reached" was the refrain in the diplomatic reports on this subject.

Some speeches of that period were directly connected with this literature. They were introduced by a speech by Mr. Balfour, British Foreign Minister, on August 19th, 1918, in which he said:

"Will they, for instance, give back to Germany as she is at present the African colonies? Will they really do that? They know well what this would mean. In the first place it would mean providing the Germans with submarine bases on all the great routes of the world, and thus making world trade dependent on the good will of Germany.

In the second place it means the restoration of the tyrannical regime over the African natives. The House is well informed on this point and will be more so when the Blue Book which is at present in preparation and deals with one aspect of this question is published. In the third place

Germany would set out to create a great black army in Central Africa which would...

Mr. Snowden: As France has already done.

Mr. Balfour: Certainly France has already done so, but has France threatened the peace of her neighbours? That is the point. The Germans have not yet realised that nations have a soul and a character."

Lord Robert Cecil, then Minister of Munitions, who subsequently as an apostle of peace and a pacifist came forward in the world of the League of Nations with great ideal speeches, at that time also used similar arguments in the interest of British imperialism. On August 24th, 1918, he said:

"As far as the German colonies are concerned, I cannot agree with Dr. Solf's statements regarding the "moral right" of the Germans to be the protectors of the coloured races. I am of opinion that the German regime proved to be brutal and heartless. The British Government has collected evidence on this point which it will shortly publish. I believe that the world will then share my opinion."

President Wilson also became one of the propagators of the colonial-guilt lie when he made his statement at the Peace Conference on February 14th, 1919, i.e. at a time when, according to the published secret protocols, the fate of the German colonies had already been decided. It is clear from his reasoning that he based his remarks on the British Blue Book.

"One of the many sad discoveries of recent years is that the Great Power which has just been fortunately defeated laid intolerable burdens and injustices upon the helpless people in some of the colonies which it had annexed, so that this Power might be regarded as interested rather in their extermination than in their development and as inspired by the desire of possessing the natives' land for European purposes and not of enjoying their confidence in order to raise mankind in these regions to a higher level."

During the war, in the course of the years 1917 and 1918, Germany refuted these imputations with every objective means, in particular through the then Secretary of State, Dr. Solf. At the beginning of 1919, the German Colonial Ministry, in a Grey Book, "The Treatment of the Native Population in the Colonial Possessions of Germany and Great Britain", replied to half-truths and untruths of the British Blue Book. The result of this was that the British Government refrained from publishing the above-mentioned hand book by Prothero before the Versailles Treaty, although this had originally been their intention. A second German Grey Book, "German and French Treatment of Natives", also published by the Colonial Ministry, refuted the French charges.

In these two German replies by the Colonial Ministry, certain cases were frankly discussed in which German mistakes were alleged to have occurred. In this connection certain mistakes and transgressions by German nationals were openly admitted. On the other hand it was proved by the publication of German legislative measures, by showing German methods of jurisdiction in the colonies, by reproducing labour legislation and by explaining the methods of administration and education, that before the War Germany had acted, not only in form but also in practice, in a manner which might serve as an example for other Colonial Powers. In connection with the charges that Germany had carried out a policy of extermination against the natives, robber economy and an imperialist policy for the creation of military bases, these replies also contain counter-charges. The history of the colonial methods of England and France is related, and in this connection the German Colonial Ministry used almost exclusively foreign documents, i. e. charges arising out of English and French documents against the colonial methods of their own countries. They were public investigations and discussions in the parliaments of these countries, charges made in their own press, and reports of journeys made by Englishmen and Frenchmen respectively. These publications still constitute a German "dossier" of the greatest value against any attempt which may be made in future to bring charges against Germany in respect of her former colonial policy.

At the time of the peace negotiations, therefore, there were German refutations and documents for an objective judgment in accordance with the facts, and these should have opened the eyes of President Wilson, who first learned of the existence of the secret treaties in Paris. The continued claim of Germany to her colonies was made convincingly clear particularly to the United States and their President. A work published at the beginning of 1919 by the official German printing office: "Germany's right to recover her colonies; Irrefutable facts and figures; English and American testimony", in which Dr. Solf developed the German attitude to point 5 of President Wilson's programme, the statement by the German Government of January 14th, 1919, and an interview with the German Foreign Minister, Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, by a representative of the Chicago Daily News on February 2nd, 1919, were sufficient warning signs to prevent an injustice, to unveil the tendentious lies and to prove that Germany was not behind any other colonial nation in the work of colonial education and administration. But, as Townsend writes in his above mentioned book, "The Rise and Fall of the German Colonial Empire", "So widespread was this propaganda against Germany's colonial administration, over which it must be remembered the Allies exercised a complete censorship, that the United States was thoroughly infected with it."

* * *

The Paris negotiations of 1919, as they subsequently became known to us from the works of Hunter Miller, the American historian of the Conference, Baker, President Wilson's private secretary, Lansing, President Wilson's Foreign Minister, and Colonel House, President Wilson's confidant and adviser, on the whole took the above mentioned publications, in particular the British Blue Book, as the pretext for the expropriation of the German colonies. This is made clear from the secret protocol of the Council of Ten of February 23rd, 1919, which Ray Stannard Baker publishes in his work: "Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement." He writes as follows:

"But the first principle of successful diplomacy, as of war, is attack—swift and unexpected attack. While President Wilson thought he had succeeded in getting the discussion of colonial claims postponed, he had not counted upon the mercurial Lloyd George. At the afternoon session of January 24th there was a great stir in the outer room of the French Foreign Office, where behind double-locked doors the Council of Ten was sitting.

'At this stage,' reports the secret Minutes, 'the Dominion Prime Ministers entered the room.'

They had come to present their claims for the possession of most of the former German colonies which, as Lloyd George explained, had been captured by Dominion troops.

Mr. Lloyd George made a brief statement showing that the German colonial policy had been a bad one, 'in South West Africa they had deliberately pursued a policy of extermination.'

All he would like to say on behalf of the British Empire as a whole was that he would be very much opposed to the return to Germany of any of those Colonies....

President Wilson said that he thought that all were agreed to oppose the restoration of the German Colonies.

Mr. Orlando, on behalf of Italy, and Baron Makino, on behalf of Japan agreed.

There was no dissentient and this principle was adopted."

In this abrupt manner, all the German colonies were removed from German rule.

* * *

The British Blue Book, the strongest weapon in the hands of the Allies, was estimated at its true value and therefore condemned in the year 1926. The South West African Legislative Assembly, at a meeting on July 29th, 1926, declared it unanimously to be a war instrument, which the time had come to destroy with all copies.

The opinion of General Hertzog, the Prime Minister, regarding this document is clearly stated in the following letter of his Assistant Secretary, which we also publish in the original text:

P. M. 21/3.

Kantoor van de Eerste Minister

Kaapstad, 28 Februarie, 1927.

Die Sekretaris vir Suidwes-Afrika,

Kaapstad.

Met betrekking tot u minute van 23 Februarie, het ek in opdrag van die Eerste Minister om u mee te deel, dat Generaal Hertzog die besluit van die Wetgewende Vergadering betreffende die Blouboek oor die behandeling van Naturelle in Suidwes-Afrika deur Duitsland, in oorweging geneem het, en wens die Eerste Minister die lede van die Wetgewende Vergadering die versekering te gee van die waardering deur hom en sy kollegas in die Regering, van die redes wat hulle gelei het tot die neem van gemelde besluit, as ook van sy bereidwilligheid om hulle soveel moontlik tegemoet te kom in hulle begeerte.

Wat betref nou die versoek om die gemelde Blouboek te doen skrap uit die Offisiële stukke van die Unie Regering, wens die Eerste Minister daarop die aandag te vestig dat dit nooit deel uitgemaak het van die offisiële stukke van die Unie nie.

Vir so ver die verdere versoek om beslag te lê op alle eksemplare van gemelde boek in besit van biblioteke, met die oog op vernietiging, is die Eerste Minister van mening dat, selfs al sou die Regering daar die reg toe hê — wat Sy Edele nie geloof die geval te wees nie — dit 'n stap sou wees waardeur nouliks die gewenste oogmerk bereik sal word.

Die onbetroubaarheid en minderwaardigheid van daardie stuk oorlogspropaganda is, volgens die mening van die Eerste Minister, genoeg om dit te doen tot die oneervolle graf van alle dergelike geskrifte uit die oorlogstydperk.

w. g. W. J. H. Farrell, Assistent Sekretaris van die Eerste Minister.

P. M. 21/3.

Prime Minister's Office

Capetown, February 28th, 1927.

The Secretary for South-West Africa,

Capetown.

With reference to your minute of February 23rd, I am directed by the Prime Minister to inform you that General Hertzog has given consideration to the resolution of the Legislative Assembly concerning the Blue Book on the Treatment of Natives in South-West Africa by Germany, and that the Prime Minister desires to assure the members of the Legislative Assembly that he and his colleagues in the Government appreciate the motives that led them to pass that resolution, and that he is willing to meet their wishes as far as possible.

In regard to the request that the aforesaid Blue Book should be expunged from the official records of the Union Government, the Prime Minister wishes to point out that it never formed part of the official records of the Union.

As to the further request for the confiscation and destruction of all copies of the said book in the possessions of libraries, the Prime Minister is of opinion that even if the Government had power to take such action — which he does not believe to be the case — it would in no wise conduce to the desired result.

In the Prime Minister's view, the untrustworthy and contemptible character of that piece of war propaganda should suffice to condemn it to the dishonourable grave of all such writings of the war period.

(signed) W. J. H. Farrell,

Assistant Secretary to the Prime Minister.

On January 23rd, 1919, therefore, the fate of the German colonies was already decided. The world learned nothing of this. It was generally thought that one of the colonial territories of vital necessity for Germany would be returned, though possibly merely as a mandate. For Wilson had proposed that, in return for the obligation not to pursue any military or political aims in these colonies, Germany should get back sufficient colonial territory to make her independent of other countries in respect of tropical raw materials and to have at her disposal a territory for emigration. In addition Germany was to be heard before a decision was taken as to the fate of her colonies. This report by the American Press Bureau of May 2nd, 1919, was in accordance with the statement by the President himself, in which he strongly opposed the annexation aspirations of the other Great Powers:

"The world will say that the Great Powers first divided the defenceless part of the world among themselves, in order then to found a League of Nations. The bare fact will remain that every one of these parts is allotted to one of the Great Powers. I should like to state quite frankly that the world will not accept such a procedure, for it will make the League of Nations impossible and we shall have to return to competition in armaments and the accumulation of debt that it implies and the burden of great armies."

The secret protocol shows, however, that at the decisive moment President Wilson had merely noted that in his opinion all were opposed to the return of the German colonies. On May 7th, 1919, therefore, the peace conditions were ready, including the agreement regarding the mandatory system, in other words the sharing of the colonial booty under cover of that system. In the German Government's reply of May 29th, the lie regarding colonial guilt was refuted in the greatest detail by the statement of accurate facts. But the ultimatum of the Allies of June 16th proved that Germany was not faced by a number of Powers who respected international law and truth; the wording of the ultimatum shows the unconcealed hatred of these Powers who did not shrink even from lies in order to draw advantage from an unclean peace and to prevent a country from having access to colonies although it had within a short period acquired uncontested glory in exploration, tropical diseases, the labour education of the natives, and missionary work, especially in Africa.

There were unfortunately men of the first rank who placed themselves in the service of this tendentious lie, and in some cases they were proved to have expressed praise and admiration for German colonial work shortly before the War. Some have since the War taken back what they felt compelled to state in 1919 in the interest of their country. The colonial-guilt lie and the "ramp in idealism", as the Manchester Guardian called it, had already fulfilled their purpose.

Before and even after the dictated Peace of Versailles, it was not necessary to refer to German sources in order to ascertain the truth regarding the colonial activity of Germany. Experts of the highest international authority have done this sufficiently. In reply to the colonial lie and its propagators the German nation can bring forward evidence which should silence even the most unscrupulous instigators. We refer to such works as President Roosevelt: "African Game Trails" (1910); Herbert Adam Gibbons: "The New Map of Africa" (1916); Rev. John Harris: "Dawn in Darkest Africa" (1912); E. D. Morel: "Africa and the Peace of Europe" (1917); Ray Stannard Baker: "Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement"; Arthur Ponsonby: "Falsehood in Wartime"; Robert Lansing: "The Peace Negotiations" (1921); Sir Charles Elliott: "The East Africa Protectorate" (1901); Vice-Consul Douglas Young in the official "Diplomatic and Consular Reports" 1917/18; the work of the English African explorers R. S. and M. E. Meikle: "After Big Game" and the book of the English colonial officials Melland and Cholmeley "Through the Heart of Africa" (1912). Lastly, the truth about German achievements is to be seen from the official British reports on the individual colonies, while since the War the same statement has been made on various occasions in the mandatory reports of the League of Nations.

In order to combat and clear up the colonial-guilt lie, the Germans have published comprehensive works. In the first place mention must be made of the book by the last Governor of German East Africa, Dr. Heinrich Schnee: "Die koloniale Schuldfrage" (Munich 1927), which was first published (London 1926) in English under the title: "German Colonization Past and Future", with an introduction by the English historian, William Harbutt Dawson. As far back as 1919 an excellent work was published by the then Governor of Togoland, Hans Georg von Doering, in English: "Colonies and Calumnies", in reply to the work by Sir Hugh Clifford: "German Colonies". At the same time, in reply to the publication of the French "Journal Officiel" mentioned above, there appeared the work by Ajax: "France's Black Militarism". The most important documents on the colonial lie were collected in 1920 by Dr. Hans Poeschel, Government Councillor in the German Colonial Office, in the book "Die Kolonialfrage im Frieden von Versailles" (published by Mittler & Sohn, Berlin). Of other important collections may be mentioned finally Jacob-Schnee: "Kolonialpolitisches Quellenheft (Die deutsche Kolonialfrage 1918 bis 1935 — Buchners Verlag, Bamberg) and Dr. G. Kurt Johannsen and H. H. Kraft: "Germany's Colonial Problem" (Thornton Butterworth Ltd., London), the publications by Dr. Rohrbach, and the continued observation of colonial problems by the German Reviews "Deutsche Kolonialzeitung" and "Koloniale Rundschau".

It would be serving the cause of international appeasement if this "colonial-guilt lie" were not revived at the moment when the interests at stake for Germany in putting forward her claim to colonial possessions are of greater importance than reasons of prestige or the satisfaction of imperialistic desires. After what has happened, however, Germany has a moral right to reparation. In this connection we need only compare two statements by British statesmen who were responsible for dictating the peace at Versailles in 1919. While Lloyd George stated in a speech of November 10th, 1914: "We swear before God that we have not taken part in any conspiracy. We do not envy Germany her territorial possessions. We do not demand a foot of her colonies", the British Colonial Minister, Walter Long, said on December 13th, 1918: "We have conquered the German colonies in honourable battle, and I hope there is no doubt that we shall keep them." At that moment, there could certainly be no doubt on the subject, since the secret treaties already provided for the distribution of the German colonies, and—as the British weekly, "The Nation", wrote on February 1st, 1919—the mandates for the victors were in reality only a variation of the old "booty" principle.

Now that the colonial lie on the question of guilt has been withdrawn by its authors, even officially, there is no longer any moral ground for excluding Germany from the administration of colonial territories. There is also no legal ground, since it is proved beyond doubt that the seizure of the German colonies is based on a breach of the treaties by the allied Powers. There is, however, another right for Germany to put forward her claim to colonies and raw materials. No less than the recently deceased Lord Snowden, formerly British Chancellor of the Exchequer, referred to this right on June 12th, 1926, in a letter to the information paper "Spectator" appearing in Berlin, in which he said:

"The Versailles Peace Treaty deprived Germany of all her colonies. This was one of the cases of the worst injustice committed in the Peace Treaty, an injustice that may and must lead to the most serious consequences if amends are not made in time.

There is little danger that under present circumstances a new world war will soon break out in Western Europe. But if the natural aspirations towards expansion of a great commercial nation, such as the German, continue to be artificially suppressed, and if the competitors of Germany on the world market are placed in a position to monopolise vast territories producing enormous quantities of raw materials for industrial purposes, and lastly if Germany is not allowed to find an outlet for her surplus population, this must necessarily result in a dangerous material of conflict which might sooner or later lead to an explosion which would be dangerous for world peace.

That part of the Versailles treaty which deprived Germany of her colonies is not only an open breach of the promises made by the Allied Powers during the War, but also a frankly admitted attempt to suppress Germany's economic revival to the benefit of her rivals in trade. President Wilson stated in his peace message that, if peace were concluded, he would do everything to convince the German nation that the peace would guarantee their economic existence. Other statesmen of the allied nations made similar statements. But in the spirit of revenge in which the Peace of Versailles was concluded, these promises were regarded as not having been given or were ignored. With a view to justifying the seizure of the colonies, an expensive, and untrue propaganda was carried out throughout the world, the object being to prove that Germany is devoid of any colonising abilities. This allegation is entirely invented. It is true that, at the beginning of German colonial activity, events occurred which cannot be defended. But such abuses happened to every colonising Power at the beginning. After Germany had acquired a certain experience in colonial work, her colonial administration could be regarded as a model.

Apart from the moral objections raised by the question of depriving Germany of her colonies and overseas possessions, there is the necessity of giving Germany access to large territories containing raw materials and providing her with ways and means of expanding. It is quite impossible to think that peaceable relations can continue to exist so long as Great Britain, France, Belgium, Portugal and Italy possess large colonial territories, whilst a nation like Germany is deprived of all possibilities of expansion. It is by no means in the interest of Great Britain to oppose Germany's claim to colonial mandates.

It is not at all in Great Britain's interest to oppose Germany's claim for colonial mandates. She possesses an Empire that is big enough to satisfy the strongest appetite. It is her duty to develop these territories properly and not to load upon herself new responsibilities by taking over fresh territories. The German claim to colonial mandates must be settled by means of friendly negotiations. The mistakes made in 1919 must be tacitly admitted.

M. Asquith said at the beginning of the War: 'The aim of the Allies in this War is to create secure peace conditions on the basis of the same right for all civilised nations'. That must now become the practical duty of the Allies. To maintain world peace, all nations must cooperate; that demands a just solution of the colonial problem. It is of the highest international importance to solve this extraordinarily involved and menacing problem as soon as possible by the application of the spirit of friendship and international understanding."

The Mandatory System of the League of Nations

I. Veiled Annexation

There is no domain of League law in which its unclearness and ambiguity are so pronounced as in the corresponding clauses of the mandatory system: Article 22 of the League Covenant and the mandate statutes drawn up by the Mandatories themselves. The establishment of these two sources of law, which moreover owe their origin to a breach of the treaty, has in fact provided for the latent continuation of the mentality of the victorious Powers of 1919 and even of their world war alliance which can hardly be removed so long as the mandatory system lasts. The history and practice of the mandatory system, as may be seen from the League reports, can scarcely be said to have been hitherto anything more than a struggle for rights of sovereignty between the League and the mandatory Powers, in which the League, or the Mandates Commission, has in many cases given way step by step, despite all protests and warnings. At the same time, the duality of this system has hindered the sound development of the territories in question and has even been an insurmountable barrier against a just and adequate solution of the colonial question, which has become more and more urgent.

It is one of the saddest chapters in the history of the League that, at its inception, there was not only a distribution of territory in accordance with the right of war, but also that the League recognised for the mandated territories a system of administration which was contrary to the Covenant.

On searching for proofs of this, there is found to be an "embarras de richesse". As on the British side Lord Lugard has repeatedly written against the German colonial claim and defended the mandatory system, his criticism of the system may be regarded as entirely impartial. In a lecture which he gave before the Dominion and Colonial Department of the Royal Society of Arts in London on June 2nd, 1924, and which is to be found in the Journal of the Royal Society, Vol. LXXII, No. 3736, Lord Lugard describes in detail the hypocrisy which, with a view to camouflaging an annexation which had already taken place, was a means to an end in 1919. In his lecture he said:

"He (Wilson,) had insisted, moreover, on the principle of 'No Annexations', and indeed (as Mr. Quincy Wright points out in an American journal) the pre-Armistice agreement of November 5th, 1918, had clearly repudiated annexation. Yet probably, the majority of the victors, including France, Japan, and the three Dominions were for annexation. Even General Smuts, who claims credit as an advocate of the Mandate principle, did not propose to extend it to the C Mandates. So strong indeed was the demand of the Dominions that they should acquire complete possession of the conquered territories contiguous to their own in S.W. Africa and the Pacific, that in the event it was with difficulty that a form of Mandate was devised, which General Smuts described as 'annexation in all but the name',—and American and Japanese writers have used the same terms.

How were these demands to be reconciled to the theories of 'Self-determination' and 'No Annexations' and to the secret treaties and understandings which had been made in the exigencies of the War, and to pre-Armistice protestations?"

In the course of his lecture, Lord Lugard repeatedly confirmed this annexation in his criticism of the mandatory system.

In speaking of the difference between the mandate and the protectorate, he said:

"The most distinctive feature of the system is the unqualified right of supervision vested in the League, which does not, however, interfere with the absolute right of the Mandatory to make and enforce laws, to raise troops, and to raise and spend revenues. It is de facto and de jure, the Government."

In another part of the lecture he said:

"The Mandate System was thus a compromise between conflicting claims, pledges, and ideals, but we have seen that Annexation—eo nomine—was wholly impossible."

"The Power which had been principally concerned with the conquest of each Colony, or which had special interests in it by reason of its geographical position or otherwise, was selected as its Mandatory."

Lord Lugard goes on to state then:

"Again, it is difficult to reconcile the terms of the French Mandates in West Africa with the terms of the Covenant. The latter expressly precludes 'the military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of the territory.'"

"These countries would therefore, as Dr. Lewis points out in the 'Law Quarterly', automatically become involved in any war in which the Mandatory may become engaged. Thus the restrictions on the use of troops recruited in Mandate territories for use elsewhere, which is imposed by the Covenant, and was one of the ostensible reasons for depriving Germany of them, does not apply to A Mandates, only partially to the B class, and it seems quite uncertain whether it applies to the C class or not."

In this connection, moreover, the French attitude, when the provision of Article 22, para. 5, were laid down, was extremely significant.

According to Article 22, paragraph 5, militarisation was to be precluded in the German colonies in the interest of the native population. Clémenceau had unreservedly accepted this paragraph 5 on April 28th, 1919. On January 30th it was clear that this clause of the prohibition of militarisation of the German colonies was merely intended to prevent "France from raising great armies of negroes for purposes of aggression." Clémenceau had replied that he was "quite satisfied." A few days after the adoption of the League Covenant, on May 4th, three days before the Treaty was presented to the Germans, "while everything was in great confusion and every effort was being made to get the Treaty printed," Clémenceau, although he was previously "quite satisfied," without consulting his colleagues of the Council of Four or the Members of the League of Nations Commission which had the Covenant in charge, sent instructions to the Drafting Committee, through the French member of it, M. Fromageot, to change the wording of Article 22, paragraph 5, of the Covenant, so that "the Mandatory might be expressly allowed to raise troops, not only for maintaining internal order, but to fight, if necessary, for the mother country."

But Clémenceau's intention was noticed in time. At a secret meeting of the Council of Ten on May 5th, 1919, the Secretary of the Drafting Committee read the following report:

"The alteration in Article 22 was made under instructions given personally to M. Fromageot by M. Clémenceau, President of the Conference."

This led to excited discussions between Clémenceau, who suddenly demanded negro armies "for the sake of France's

Signs of German Civilisation in

"Let us have the honesty to admit that it would be quite impossible for a case to be presented to an international tribunal against the exercise of German sovereign rights in Africa, on the plea of German ill-treatment of natives. The presentation of such a case would invite, not only a damaging and unanswerable to quoque, but a citation of much British evidence in praise of German administration in Africa."

security," and the other parties, in particular Wilson and Lloyd George. Clémenceau said it was very important "to add a few words" in order to enable France to utilise native troops for the defence of French territory. After a long struggle it was decided to reject the "new French wording" and to adopt the old wording of April 28th 1919 which had been agreed to by all.

By a decision of May 6th 1919, the Supreme Council of the League agreed to the distribution. Subsequently the League concluded mandatory agreements with the Mandatory Powers, which again laid down separately and expressly for each mandate the obligations assumed in principle in Article 22. It is, however, characteristic that while all other mandatory agreements include a prohibition of the militarisation of the natives of the German colonies, except for police purposes and the defence of the territory, in accordance with paragraph 5, the mandatory agreements for the French mandates of Togoland and the Cameroons read as follows in Article 3:

"It is understood, however, that the troops thus raised (in French Togoland and the Cameroons) may, in the event of a general war, be utilised to repulse an attack, or of defence of territory outside that over which the mandate is administered."

France thus succeeded in getting her own way with the tacit agreement of the League of Nations. The Secretariat of the League appears to have eased its conscience with the statement that "Article 22 of the Covenant would appear to be in contradiction with the above authorisation."

With regard to the practice of the mandatory administration, Lord Lugard went on to speak as follows:

"Apart from these apparent divergencies from the strict terms of the Treaty, the Covenant itself failed to fulfil all the expectations which the pre-Armistice declarations of the Allies had raised. We have already seen that the United States takes strong exception to the limitation of the pledge of equal commercial opportunity to the Central African Mandates, and there only to members of the League. American writers have denounced this action as selfish appropriation of material benefits, contrary to the spirit and implied obligations of the Treaty, and of a Trustee State, and opposed to the declaration of the Allies that they would derive no material benefits from the Mandates..."

"It seems very regrettable that the principle of equal opportunity was not extended to C Mandates, and, in my personal opinion, it would have been wise, whether Germany joined the League or not, to throw open the door to German commercial enterprise in her former Colonies, where it is to be hoped that she would see a better system of administration under the Mandates than she had adopted in regard to natives. To deny access to direct sources of supply of tropical raw materials and markets, vitally necessary to an industrial nation of sixty million souls, must necessarily engender bitterness and resentment and add to the incentives for a new war."

It is impossible to describe more accurately the de facto annexation of former German territories and the existing practice of the mandatories, which is in obvious contradiction to the Covenant, than was done by Lord Lugard in 1924.

An annexation had thus taken place and, in order to cover it up, a legal system was constructed on which, in spite of all the learned dissertations, existing international law is unable to give a clear opinion, for the simple reason that it arose out of a breach of the treaty and, as Lugard stated in his lecture, out of a "distribution of the booty among the victors." It is scarcely necessary to preface our remarks on the mandatory system with a further general opinion from a competent quarter. The American State Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Robert Lansing, who worked with President Wilson at the Peace Conference, wrote as follows in his book "The Peace Negotiations", published in 1921:

If the colonial possessions of Germany had, under the old practice, been divided among the victorious Powers and been ceded to them directly in full sovereignty, Germany might justly have asked that the value of such territorial cessions be applied on any war indemnities to which the Powers were entitled.

Under the mandatory system Germany lost her territorial assets, which might have greatly reduced her financial debt to the Allies, while the latter obtained the German colonial possessions without the loss of any of their claims for indemnity.

In actual operation the apparent altruism of the mandatory system worked in favour of the selfish and material interests of the Powers which accepted the mandates. It should not be a matter of surprise, therefore, that the President found little opposition to the adoption of his theory, or, to be more accurate, of the Smuts theory, on the part of the European statesmen... If the advocates of the system intended to avoid through its operation the appearance of taking enemy territory as the spoils of war, it was a subterfuge which deceived no one.

After such judgments, it might be superfluous to enter in detail into the moral, legal and practical duality of the mandatory system. It is mainly for the sake of documentary completeness that we summarise below the most important stages of mandatory rule in connection with the altruism of Article 22 of the League Covenant. Moreover, it is not without value to call to mind the recognition by the League of an annexation of about 2,952,000 sq. km. of land with a value of many thousands of million Marks—solely as far as the German colonies were concerned.

The perusal of the proceedings of League meetings at that time inevitably leads to the conviction that, if the responsible representatives of international law at that time did not possess an astonishing degree of cynicism, the definition of League rights as against the rights of the Allies must have been an amusing game for them, consisting as it did in presenting an accomplished robbery subsequently and formally in such a way as to give it a fine outward appearance. They, who themselves belonged to the Allies by their nationality, had the task of giving the world a reason which would neither invalidate an annexation nor compromise the ideal conception of trusteeship.

What was the League doing in 1920, when it received the order from the Allies to proceed in respect of the mandates in the manner decided by a "Supreme Council", not at Geneva, but at Paris, Brussels and Spa? In reply, it may be said that the League was busy with its papers. It is an uncontested fact that the League did not use its power of protection over the mandates, that it took no action during the decisive negotiations regarding mandates, in particular the negotiations at Spa, and that it disposed of protests from the natives of the German colonies with the statement that the treaties unfortunately made it impossible to consider their claims.

It was only under the pressure of public opinion and in view of the impending meeting of the Assembly that the Council dealt with mandatory questions at its 8th session in August 1920 and tried to create the mandatory system, at any rate in its outer form.

The recently deceased Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs, B. W. von Bülow, in his book "Der Versailler Völkerbund" describes this start in the following words:

"The rapporteur was the representative of Belgium, that is of a country which itself claimed a mandate. It appeared from the beginning that the League was very badly informed of the actual state of affairs. The rapporteur knew that the Allied and Associated Powers had already decided upon the mandatories in a decision of May 5th, 1919. But this decision did not seem to have been final, for in August 1919 it had been announced that the Allies were 'now' in complete agreement as to the distribution of the mandates. Though he knew nothing of any treaty provision, the territories concerned were in the actual possession of the 'mandatories.' At a time which was not specified, he said, the frontiers of the mandated territories had been fixed by secret treaties between the Allies. In addition, in July and August 1919 a committee of the principal Allied and Associated Powers had sat in order to agree upon the mandatory conditions. This committee had reached unanimous decisions regarding the African colonies and the territories which were to be placed immediately under the administration of the mandatories. Only France had made reservations regarding the recruiting of coloured troops, and Japan regarding the interpretation of Article 22, para. 6.

It appeared from the extremely unclear Belgian report of August 5th, 1920, that the beati possidentes did not regard themselves as mandatories of the League and did not worry about that body in setting up their new rule. In addition, the Council had been unable to establish that (in accordance with Article 22, para. 8) 'the degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory' had been 'previously agreed upon by the Members of the League' (i.e. before January 10th, 1920). According to the Covenant these questions were to be decided by the Council. If the legal position had been otherwise, and if there had been a completed agreement between the enemy allied Powers, the Council could have established this fact since it consisted of seven representatives of Allied and Associated Governments.

Germany had been obliged to cede her possession to the principal Powers. But no blank authority had been given regarding their future fate, but on the contrary Article 22 of the Treaty and of the Covenant must apply to both parties, since the mandatory conditions were not 'previously agreed upon.' But the Council did not act in accordance with this position. It adopted the fiction that a previous agreement existed. It was probably guided by the consideration that the Allies did not intend that the League should lay down provisions for them. The Council was guided by the will of the principal Powers and not by the provisions of the Covenant, although it was aware that the Paris Conference had merely been presented with a draft for the so-called A Mandates and that even this had not been approved.

The Council was very well aware what obligations were placed upon the League by Article 22, for the rapporteur even enumerated the main points: the choice of the mandatories, the fixing of the frontiers of the mandated territories, the grant of full powers by the League, the fixing of the mandatory conditions, and the appointment of a Mandates Commission to examine the annual reports. Here also it was shown that the Council merely regarded itself as the executive organ of the enemy alliance and desired above all to protect its interests. The Council left the appointment of the mandatories to the Allies, although naturally a State that was to exercise a mandate in the name and on behalf of the League of Nations could only be appointed by the League itself. Undoubtedly the sovereignty over the mandated territories belonged to the League. This was clear not only from the text of the Covenant, but also from the sense of Article 22. But the League was never invested with these sovereign rights. The German colonies (according to Article 119 of the Versailles Treaty) had to be ceded to the principal Powers. In order to comply with the Covenant, the principal Powers should have transferred these territories to the League, in order—possibly—to get them back as mandates. The failure to transfer the sovereignty was a breach of the Covenant, according both to its spirit and letter. It could also not be said that the sovereignty was transferred tacitly to the League, for the mandatories never received their mandates from the hands of the League. The Council was on the other hand prepared to let the mandatories be appointed by the principal Allied Powers. It merely asked that the names of the Powers concerned and the frontiers of their mandated territories should be communicated to it. Then the League would note these decisions and inform the mandatory of the conditions for the exercise of the mandate. With regard to these conditions, it is true that the Council did not adopt the work of the allied commission of 1919. But it waived the right to draw them up itself and left this to the Allies, together with the definition of 'the degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory.' The Council merely reserved a general control over the mandatory administration with the help of the Mandates Commission provided for in Article 22, para. 9, which has to examine the annual reports."

The voluntary subjection of the Council to the desires of the principal Powers and all the failings and sins of the League Council in the mandatory question are contained in the German Government's note to the League Assembly of November 12th, 1920. (League of Nations Doc. 20/48/106, December 8th, 1920.) It reads as follows:

I

Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which determines the fate of the former German colonies, solemnly affirms that the welfare and development of the races inhabiting these colonies is a sacred duty entrusted to civilisation, and that the best method of putting this principle into practical effect is to entrust these races to the protection of nations in an advanced stage of development, who will exercise this protection as mandatories in the name of the League. It follows from the above that the League of Nations has itself assumed the care of and responsibility for the former German Colonies.

Though some particular State, and not the League of Nations, is responsible for the administration of these colonies, the duty of designating such States falls upon the League. Any other construction is incompatible with both the letter and the spirit of the Covenant. The States to be selected are Mandatories of the League and fulfil their task under its orders and in its name. Further, a Mandatory of the League can only be appointed by the League itself. There is no suggestion in the Covenant that the League can leave the task of nominating Mandatories to any other authority.

The Covenant further lays down that the nature of the mandate is to vary according to the special conditions prevailing in the territories in question and to the stage of development reached by their inhabitants. In colonies the mandate is to take the form of a direct administration. In this respect, the Covenant draws a distinction between two classes of colonies for which it contemplates different administrative arrangements. Nevertheless, for both classes it lays down certain identical obligations which are binding upon the Mandatories and from which the latter may not depart. In all cases the Mandatory Power must submit to the League an annual report upon the territories entrusted to it. Further, the extent to which each Mandatory Power shall exercise authority, control or administrative powers is to be the subject of special arrangement. Paragraph 8 of Article 22 explicitly states the authority competent to determine the Mandatory conditions. In the first place, these conditions must be decided by a Convention between the Members of the League. As all the Members of the League only meet in the Assembly, it is obvious that such a Convention can only take the form of a resolution passed by the Assembly. The Council is only called upon to take action if such a resolution is not passed. For this reason the Assembly of the League is now perfectly free to take such action as it may think fit.

As regards the exercise of the control vested in the League, an important task falls on the Permanent Commission of the League which is provided for by the Covenant. As the method of appointment of the Members of this Commission is not provided for by the Covenant, the inference is that it is the Assembly of the League which will have to deal with this question in the first instance. Further, the responsibility assumed by the League of Nations as a result of the institution of the mandate system implies that the Assembly cannot refrain from taking part in the control of the Mandatory Powers. Therefore the arrangements by which the Council receives the annual reports of the Mandatory Powers and takes the opinion of the Permanent Commission cannot be regarded as incompatible with the intervention of the Assembly.

II

The German Government was surprised to learn by the publication in the Official Journal of the League for September, 1920, of the Minutes of the Eighth Meeting of the Council, that the latter had received a report regarding the obligations placed on the League by Article 22 of the Covenant, a report which gave a totally different interpretation of the provisions in question.

The report in question endeavours to make out that the appointment of the Mandatory Powers and the delimitation of the territories which are to be placed under mandates is exclusively within the sphere of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers; it only leaves to the League, that is to say to the Council, the purely formal duty of notifying the appointments which have been made with regard to this or that State. With this object the report has based itself chiefly on Articles 118 and 119 of the Treaty of Versailles, by the terms of which Germany renounces in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights, titles and privileges whatsoever in or concerning all oversea territories, and by the terms of which she undertakes further to recognise and accept the steps which may be taken by the aforementioned Powers, in agreement, if necessary, with other Powers, with a view to the settlement of the situation arising from this renunciation. These provisions are, nevertheless, not of a kind to justify an interpretation of Article 22 of the Covenant differing from that which has been set forth above. In fact, regarded as a whole, the provisions can only have one meaning, that is that the Principal Allied and Associated Powers should hold the colonial possessions, as trustees, till such time as the Mandatories are appointed. It was necessary to make this provisional arrangement because otherwise these possessions would have been abandoned during a period from the coming into force of the Peace Treaty until the appointment of the Mandatories. In this respect the session of the abovementioned possessions to the Principal Powers may be compared to the cession of the territory of Danzig, as provided by Article 100 of the Treaty of Versailles. Besides, the answer given under date June 16th, 1919, to the observations submitted by the German Peace Delegation, regarding the conditions of peace, explicitly confirms the view that the cession of the colonies to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in no way implied the right of these Powers to appoint the Mandatories. In fact, in its remarks concerning Section IV of the Treaty of Versailles, this reply states under heading III in regard to Mandatories that the latter "being constituted stewards by the League of Nations will not derive any profit from such stewardship." That opinion bears out the view expressed in the report already mentioned, according to which the Principal Powers intended, when they drew up the conditions of peace, to retain for themselves the right to appoint the Mandatories. But even supposing that they had such an intention, this would not in the least affect the legal aspect of the matter. For it is an accepted principle, that in interpreting an international treaty no value can be attached to the intentions of one of the contracting parties, except in so far as those intentions have been expressed either explicitly or by implication in the provisions of the treaty. The result is, therefore, that the Principal Allied Powers cannot escape the duty of taking the necessary steps to ensure a result in conformity with the Covenant in respect of the Mandatory system.

As regards the fixing of the conditions of mandates, it is stated in the report already referred to that by "members" in the sense of paragraph 8 of Article 22 are to be understood not the Assembly of the League, but the Signatory Powers of the Peace Treaty, so far as they are Members of the League of Nations. Now there are absolutely no grounds for excluding in this way the Members of the League who were not among the belligerents. Furthermore, the Report declares that a convention drawn up with the aid of all the Signatory Powers would hardly be practicable owing to the immense number of the signatories. It is for this reason that the Council of the League, who would be competent if there were no such convention, appear to have refrained from undertaking itself the determination of the conditions itself and to have decided to let them be determined by the Principal Powers. The latter would, therefore, confront the Council with a fait accompli, so much so that its part in the matter would in fact be limited to notifying the arrangement made to the Mandatories. It is clear that by proceeding in this fashion the Council would be frequently violating the obligation imposed on it in paragraph 8.

Then, again, the Council proposes to convene the Members of the Mandatory Commission, whereas that task, as has already been explained, should fall to the Assembly of the League. The instructions drawn up by the Council for the composition of the Commission provide that each Mandatory Power, in its capacity as a Mandatory, shall be represented by one delegate; and that in addition to these State delegates, a certain number of members shall be appointed from among private individual nationals of other States. It is appropriate to observe that such a system would prejudice the effectiveness of the task allotted to the Commission, seeing that the delegates of the Mandatory Powers would necessarily have to be considered as interested parties, and that the private members would not be able to maintain their opinions with the same authority as the State representatives. The situation would be the same if, as might occur, the Delegate of the State whose mandate is under consideration should find himself precluded from taking part in the voting.

III.

Seen as a whole, the system proposed by the Council of the League amounts to the almost complete elimination of the Assembly, and it reduces the rôle of the Council to a mere formality, and it thus invalidates the control vested in the League. The Mandatory system would therefore become a mere fiction, and we should find ourselves confronted, in fact, with the annexation of the former German colonial possessions, through a distribution carried out by the Principal Powers. The German Government, for its part, would be bound to consider such a solution of the colonial question as a violation of the Treaty of Versailles, of which the Covenant of the League of Nations forms an integral part.

The German Government has not merely a formal, but a very practical, interest in endeavouring to prevent any such violations. Germany has a right to be considered when in due course the final distribution of mandates is undertaken. Therefore, the German Government cannot be indifferent to the question of knowing who is to allot these mandates and what system is to be adopted in deciding the conditions under which they are to be exercised.

For the above reasons the German Government has the honour to request the Assembly of the League of Nations to be good enough to discuss the question of Colonial Mandates, and to see that the steps taken are in conformity both with the letter and the spirit of Article 22 of the Covenant. If this appeal should be unsuccessful, the German Government desires, at once, to protest solemnly against this violation of the Covenant, and, as regards the future, reserves its rights concerning this question.

The League Assembly did not adopt any attitude towards this German protest. It is true that the Australian representative proposed on November 23rd, 1920, that it should be discussed by the Plenary Assembly, but he was induced between the meetings to withdraw this proposal. The note, which made a painful impression, was interred by the competent (6th) Committee in a private meeting.

The rapporteur to the first Assembly of the League was Cecil (South Africa), a master in the art of fine phrases. Even he was not able (on December 18th, 1920) to find much to praise, though there was much to blame. The general feeling regarding the previous treatment of the mandates question was unsatisfactory. In particular a complaint was made as to the slight share of the League Assembly in the solution of this problem which was of such importance for the prestige of the League of Nations. The Council had reserved all decisions for itself. The grumbling crowd was however energetically met by Balfour who justified the Council by stating that it was acting not only according to the text of the Covenant but also according to the spirit of its authors. The Council bore the entire responsibility and it alone had to decide. The same view was also taken by Bourgeois (France). In this connection, Balfour put in a word for the mandatories. He said this was a very difficult experiment. If the League took the view that the mandatories were only to take the responsibility and the trouble, but were not to draw the advantages, this could lead to no good. The man of great ideals, Lord

Robert Cecil, also took the view that the League could not carry on the administration of the mandated territories as a super-State. Finally, however, the Assembly modestly submitted a few wishes to the Council. The most important were that the mandatories of Class A should not strengthen their military forces from the territories entrusted to them and that they should not exploit the territories exclusively "for their own and their friends' advantage." It was also recommended that the mandatory conditions should be published, so that an end might be put to the former system of strictly secret policy.

II. The Distribution of the German Colonies*)

After the "Supreme Council" had determined the Mandatories, and the mandated territories to be transferred to them, on May 7th, 1919, the Council of the League, at its session in Brussels in October 1920, decided to divide the mandates into three categories, as had already been done in the Covenant. The division and distribution of the German colonies within the mandatory system was carried out as follows:

Group B:

German East Africa: Tanganyika Territory (British mandate), with an area of 968,871 sq. km. and a population of 5,063,660.

Ruanda-Urundi (Belgian mandate), with an area of 53,200 sq. km. and a population of 3,293,170.

Cameroons: The larger eastern part of the Cameroons, after deducting the new territory acquired in 1911 which was entirely waived in the Peace Treaty (French mandate), with an area of 429,750 sq. km. and a population of 2,230,201. The smaller western part of the Cameroons (British mandate) with an area of 88,231 sq. km. and a population of 778,700.

Togoland: The larger eastern part of Togoland (French mandate), with an area of 52,000 sq. km. and a population of 762,629. The smaller western part of Togoland (British mandate), with an area of 34,292 sq. km. and a population of 328,077.

Group C:

German South West Africa: South West Africa (mandate of the Union of South Africa), with an area of 834,990 sq. km. and a population of 266,930.

German New Guinea, excluding the islands lying north of the Equator: Australian mandate, with an area of 240,864 sq. km. and a population of 462,177. The island of Nauru is excluded; it is a British, Australian and New Zealand mandate with an area of 21 sq. km. and a population of 2677.

South Sea Islands north of the Equator: Japanese mandate, with an area of 2149 sq. km. and a population of 90,651.

Samoa: New Zealand mandate, with an area of 2934 sq. km. and a population of 53,087.

"There was some unfortunate delay in issuing the Mandates, detrimental to the welfare of the communities concerned... It was not till July, 1922, nearly four years after the Armistice, that the Mandates dealing with the ex-German Colonies were issued. By that time it was six or seven years since the German administration had been ousted in some of them."

It is again Lord Lugard who makes this charge in his lecture. During this time an arbitrary destruction reigned in this territory. At this time the life work of thousands of German families of settlers who had cultivated the desert and the jungle by the sweat of their brow was destroyed and given over to neglect. The destruction of German achievements, a sin which, through not openly admitted, had subsequently its repercussions in many forms in mandate reports, is a crowning proof of the small economic need which this new accession of territory represented for the "Mandatories." For in places where there was really a direct economic interest, the work of destruction was not allowed to celebrate any orgies and had to bow to strict governmental administration. One need only think of the phosphate exploitation on the island of Nauru and the diamond industry in German South West Africa.

For the colonies, the new mandate boundaries also represented a step backwards. Great thoroughfares were artificially separated. Tracts of country which, from the point of view of traffic, had their roots in the Indian Ocean were pressed into the sphere of the Atlantic, and natural boundaries such as those between the former German East Africa and the Congo were abolished, so that colonies which were formerly flourishing were condemned to destruction by the cutting off of their traffic. The division of Togoland and the Cameroons between France and England had also nothing to do with the prosperity of the natives. After the plantations in those territories had become entirely dilapidated and devastated, the mandate reports showed for many years after the War that these former exemplary German colonies could no longer attain the level they had reached under German administration. As far as the former German South West Africa is concerned, the industrial organisation in particular was condemned to destruction because it was in the interest of the Mandatory to use this country as an importing territory.

The lack of confidence in the League of Nations after it had simply recognised everything that the Allies decided, coincided with the much sadder experience that might be called the second partition of Africa. Just as the geo-political ignorance had the upper hand in Paris in the partition of Europe, so that nations and economic units were cut in two, Africa was also cut up through no fault of her own and merely because of her helplessness, according to no other right than that of conquest. Just as frontiers were drawn through the peoples of Africa in accordance with the standards of European policy, a determination based mainly on strategical considerations took the form of mandated territories.

In addition all these new boundary stones stand in the deserts and wastes of Africa like monuments of a World War, in which the whites gave the blacks the spectacle of the best way in which respect for white civilisation can be lost. In Article 119 of the Versailles Treaty, a community of nations did not take the German possessions on behalf of an Africa standing under the protection of the whole world, but this article is an emanation of pure striving after power, while Article 22 of the Covenant is the result of a bad conscience.

The Powers of the Mandates Commission and their Application in Practice

What decisive action could be taken by a Mandates Commission exercising its right of control under such conditions? Could it annul senseless boundaries? Could it work out the rights of protection which should now be guaranteed to the natives under the protectorate of the League of Nations? Could it fashion the economic development of the mandated territories to the advantage of the natives in such a way as to preclude from the outset a system of privileged rights for the mandatories? Could it take effective action so that other countries might have access to the development of the mandated territories? Could it exercise any effective control whatever?

At the outset of the practice of the mandatory system and its control by a so-called Mandates Commission, there are three decisive limitations of the right of control, which justify a negative reply to each of the above questions. In the first place, the public was excluded from the discussions of the Mandates Commission. In the second place, it was decided that petitions of the natives should not be sent direct to the Mandates Commission. In the third place it was decided that the Mandates Commission could not send any of its representatives to the mandated territories.

The publicity of the discussions might have implied moral and actual support for the Commission. By rejecting the possibility of a direct connection between natives raising protests and the Mandates Commission, inter alia any desires of the natives for the restoration of German rule were entirely suppressed. In view of the fact that the Mandates Commission was only able to follow events and developments in the mandated territories from the only source of information now at its disposal, namely the reports of the mandatory Powers, it only learned of great excesses on the part of the Mandatories from the press when it was already too late, as in the case of the Bondelzwart rising in South West Africa in 1923 and the Syrian rising in 1925.

As against this restricted right of the Mandates Commission, there are also the mandates statutes prepared by the mandatories themselves, which place the Commission in the weakest position precisely in respect of the most important questions. In view of their right of joint administration of mandated territories with neighbouring colonies, the mandatory Powers set themselves the aim of incorporating the territories.

If the Mandates Commission has hitherto during its entire practice played the part of a secretariat rather than a controlling authority, this is mainly due to the complicated procedure of the League of Nations. In order that the work of the Mandates Commission might have no great repercussions, this possibility was prevented from the outset by the League Covenant which provided that mandatory questions do not come directly under the Assembly, but that, according to Article 22, they are only dealt with by the Council. The Mandates Commission comes under the Council, to which it sends the annual reports of the mandatory Powers after it has examined and approved them. Though it afterwards became usual for mandatory questions to be referred to the sixth Committee of the Assembly for discussion, so that the reports were brought to the notice of a wider circle than the Council, important decisions on the mandatory administration were taken by the Council, so that the apparent majority of representatives of non-mandate countries in the Mandates Commission (6 to 4) was much more than counterbalanced by the fact that the mandatory Powers exercised a predominant influence in the Council.

The criticism of the Mandates Commission's work in the present publication will take no detailed account of the economic and social development of the natives. This tragedy of Africa, misery, poverty, the squandering of life, health and prosperity by the entirely inadequate administration of the colonial territories, problems the solution of which demands large-scale action which the colonial and mandatory Powers cannot bring themselves to take, is movingly described not only in writings by private persons but also in investigations by colonial governors and their authorities at home. They prove unequivocally that all colonial Powers have failed to think of the welfare of the natives, and that their administration has aimed rather at serving their own interests.

From this point of view, however, it is of decisive importance to inquire whether, after nearly seventeen years' work, the League, the Council, or the Mandates Commission have fulfilled their high obligations and brought the mandated territories under the League law, or whether the mandated territories have not rather fallen more and more under the rights of sovereignty of the mandatories.

A perusal of the proceedings in the Mandates Commission on the practice of the mandatory Powers shows clearly the method adopted for the administration of the mandated territories. From year to year, the mandatories have succeeded in making the mandated territories more and more an integral part of their colonies. By means of administrative reforms for which reasons of economy are advanced, by means of the principle of indirect rule under which Governors of adjoining territories also administer the mandated territories, by the fusion of the two administrations in respect of Customs, finance, currency and economic policy, and even by postal unions, combinations are made which may be said to undermine more and more the inner uniformity of the mandated territories.

It is impossible in the space available even to give a short description of all these tendencies towards constitutional union. Together with the discussions, claims and protests of the Commission regarding the non-fulfilment of the principle of the "open door", they take up the greatest part of the reports of the Mandates Commission.

An insight into such a discussion may, however, be given in the example of Great Britain's efforts to incorporate the East African mandated territory in the British Empire. Since 1926, plans had been pursued by England, under the motto "Closer Union in East Africa", for fusing the British mandated territory of Tanganyika, which comprises the greatest part of German East Africa, with the adjoining British colonies. In 1927 the British Government sent the Hilton Young Commission to East Africa in order to make inquiries on the spot regarding the proposed fusion. The Commission's report was published at the beginning of 1929 as a parliamentary paper. It was in favour of the union of the mandated territory with the adjoining British colonies of Kenya and Uganda under a Head Commissioner who was subsequently to be replaced permanently by a Governor General. The main reason given in the report for the union was the necessity of a uniform policy in respect of the present position and future development of the natives and their relations with the non-natives. As the Commission's proposals met with strong resistance on the part of a considerable portion of the population of the East African territories concerned and was by no means unanimously approved even in England, the British Government in 1929 sent Sir Samuel Wilson, Permanent Under Secretary of State in the Colonial Office, to East Africa in order to obtain further information on the spot and to negotiate with the parties concerned. His proposals were even more clearly in favour of the political union of the mandated territory with the British neighbouring colonies, though he endeavoured to remove the main stumbling block of the previous proposals by suggesting, in contradistinction to the Hilton Young report, that the native policy of the local legislation should be left to the individual colonial territories. These proposals, however, also met with strong opposition.

A Parliamentary Commission was then formed, consisting of members of the upper and lower houses, which, after taking evidence from witnesses and experts and hearing prominent persons, reported in October 1931; the report was published as a parliamentary document. The Commission's opinion was that "it was not at present the time" to take any far-reaching steps towards a formal union of the three East African territories. The British Government adopted the Commission's opinion. In September 1932 it decided that the political union of the three East African territories was abandoned "because the time for this had not yet come". At the same time, however, it ordered that the Governors of the three territories should regularly meet at conferences to discuss questions of common interest and that close cooperation should take place in individual branches of administration, such as Customs and communications and the scientific experimental institutes.

In June 1933, the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations dealt with the question of Closer Union. It reached the unanimous conclusion that a political or constitutional union between the mandated territory and British colonies would be contrary to the Mandate itself. With reference to the expression used by the British Government in its note of September 2nd, 1932, and by the accredited representative that "the time was not yet ripe" for union, the Mandates Commission in its report expressly stated that "such a union could not take place so long as the Mandate was in force". The Commission's report went on to state that, without prejudice to full consideration for the provisions of Article 10 of the Mandate, all measures should be avoided which might lead to a de facto establishment of such a Closer Union so long as the Mandate remained in force. Further, as regards the proposed establishment of a Conference of the Governors of the three territories in question as a permanent advisory organ for the cooperation and coordination of the common interests of the territories, the report expressed the opinion that these Conferences should not undertake executive responsibilities which would unduly restrict the necessary autonomy of the mandated territory. This last part of the report, relating to measures which might lead to the de facto establishment of a Closer Union, was not unanimously accepted, but only by a majority, while the minority, consisting of van Rees, Lugard, Merlin and Orts, did not agree to the text because it appeared to cast doubts on the exercise of rights granted to the mandatory Power by Article 10 of the Mandate and because it appeared to imply that the mandatory Power would be capable under any circumstances of taking a decision on petitions, as it had formally promised, not without previous reference to the Permanent Mandates Commission—such as a political and constitutional union of the mandated territory with neighbouring territories. The minority also did not agree to the passage relating to the Conference of Governors, because a purely advisory Conference could not exercise any executive powers or endanger the political individuality of the mandated territory. The minority of four consisted of the representatives of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, France and Belgium.

The report was submitted to the Council on September 28th, 1933, and adopted. In the discussion, the British Foreign Secretary, Sir John Simon, stated that the difference between the majority and the minority in the Mandates Commission related to fears for the future. The mandatory Power appreciated entirely that the position was governed and controlled by Article 10 of the Mandate. The mandatory Power had done nothing and would do nothing that would represent a breach of that article. In his opinion it would be undesirable to discuss in abstracto problems and solutions which the mandatory Power had not contemplated.

The development of this particular case shows the purely formal character of the control exercised by the Mandates Commission. For what is to be learned from the treatment of these British strivings? It appears in particular that there are two legal bases within the mandatory system: that of Article 22 of the League Covenant and that of the Mandate in question. Article 10 of the Mandate for East Africa reads: "The Mandatory shall be entitled to bring the territory into a customs, financial or administrative union or federation with the adjoining territories which are under its own sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures taken for this purpose do not go beyond the provisions of this Mandate." This is the other law of the mandatory system, a law that was not laid down by the organs of the League of Nations, but by a committee of delegates of the Great Powers appointed by the Peace Conference. The Mandate for East Africa was prepared in London and bears the date: London, July 20th, 1922.

After the British assurances, nothing more was said about British aspirations in East Africa, though for a short time, mainly as a result of German protests, it became clearer to the public what the mandatory system really meant in the long run, namely that the League was powerless and had merely to see, in connection with the Mandates Commission, that the outward appearance of Article 22 was, at any rate formally, not too much undermined. In view of this dual law, the passive attitude of the Mandates Commission is comprehensible. What can such a Commission do to prevent a political union when its legal basis is opposed by a mandatory statute of which Article 10 is obviously incompatible with Article 22 of the League Covenant. The unwritten condition of Article 10 lies in the transition from administrative measures to sovereign rights, for which the League law possesses no zone of influence. It is obvious that in practice a customs, financial and administrative union can only be carried out by creating a uniform administration for the territories in question. A financial and administrative union cannot be imagined except as under a common centre. But how can a territory form a separate unit under international law when it is combined with other territories under such a central authority? How is it possible to maintain the mandated territory as a unit when its finances and administration are combined with those of the British colonies? In the meantime the United Kingdom has gone a step further in its East African aspirations. It has combined the Tanganyika Territory with Kenya and Uganda in a Postal Union. In respect of this measure also, the Mandates Commission expressed its misgivings; but it could not decide to place itself in open opposition. We find similar aspirations in German South West Africa where the quarters striving for a Great South Africa have for years demanded the incorporation of the mandated territory as a fifth province. The so-called "administrative reforms", with which France, in order to "round off" her great colonial empire, is endeavouring to unite Togoland with the neighbouring colony of Dahomey and the Cameroons with French Equatorial Africa, may also be mentioned in this connection. According to these examples, Belgium is also trying to amalgamate her mandated territories of Ruanda and Urundi with the Congo Colony. Lastly, Japan is also averse to a change in mandatory conditions as she categorically stated after her withdrawal from the League had become legal on March 26th, 1935, and the reason given was that these territories had been promised to her by the Supreme Council of the Allied Powers before they were allotted by the League. This attitude is, however, mainly based on strategical considerations, since the mandated islands form a key position for Japanese naval defence.

These examples confirm the misgivings expressed by Germany in her note of November 12th, 1920. The danger of a political union was inherent in the procedure adopted for the treatment of the mandates question from the outset, for the rights of the League were so curtailed that it was only in a position to play the part of a bookkeeper who had merely to enter the decisions regarding the treatment of mandated territories in the "Treaty Series". The opinion of the well-known French professor of international law, George Scelle, on the treatment of mandates questions fittingly described this duty of the League of Nations. In his work "L'élaboration du pacte", he wrote: "The manner in which the rights apparently granted to the League of Nations were conjured away by the Great Powers suffices to show that the system adopted in Paris represented a veritable sleight of hand (trompe d'œil)."

The scope of the mentioned case can only be fully understood in the light of a decision which is to be regarded as a condition for this temptation towards annexation tendencies. We refer to the "clearing up" of the question of property rights in the acquisition and investment of capital in the mandated territories, which the Council dealt with in a resolution of 1924. The theoretical point of departure of this question was the possibility of a change in the mandatory. In this connection, the Swiss Professor Rappard, a member of the Mandates Commission, had drawn attention to three possibilities: 1. change in the trustee by deposition; 2. by voluntary transfer to a third Power; 3. by compulsory withdrawal in case of war.

At that time it was the opinion of all who took part in this discussion that such cases were to be regarded as highly improbable. There could therefore scarcely be any question of deposition, which the Council could only decide in case of continuous unscrupulous administration of the mandate. On the other hand, voluntary withdrawal could not take place without the consent of the Council. Lastly, compulsory withdrawal in case of war was beside the point, since a conqueror would be faced by the entire sanctions machinery of the League of Nations.

The result of this interesting discussion of principle showed, however, that its cause was the pursuit of very realistic aims by the Mandatories. They expressed their uneasiness at the possibility of any change in the mandatory administration and demanded that any future injustice in this direction should be checked by creating a sort of "life insurance" for their unselfish and benevolent task. The League Council, which was dominated by the mandatory Powers, then adopted, in 1924, the following resolution:

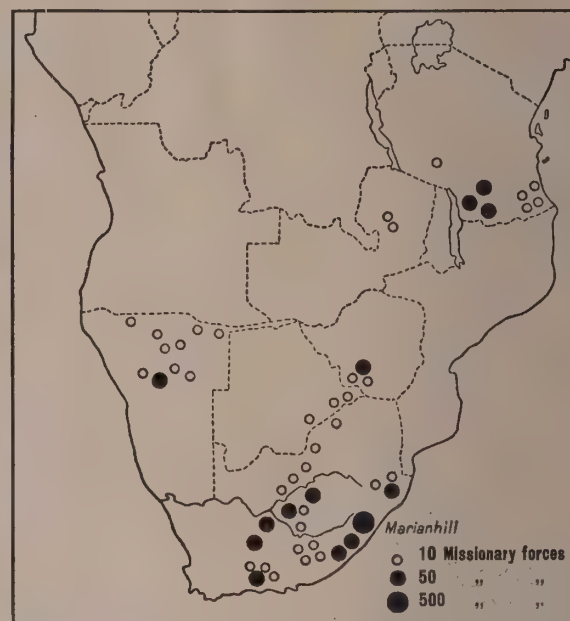

"The Council of the League of Nations:

In view of the discussion of the Permanent Mandates Commission, in the course of its sixth session, on the subjects of loans, advances, and investments of public and private capital in mandated territories, and in view of the earlier discussions and inquiries, and of the statements of the Mandatory Powers on this subject:

"Africa cannot afford to lose the help of the German societies which were established in the various parts of the continent before the War. The German missions in Togoland, in the northern part of the Cameroons, in German South-West Africa and in German East Africa were obviously blessed by God. They made a unique contribution to the evangelisation and civilisation of Africa. Their missionaries were second to none in self-sacrifice and zeal."

Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at the Africa Conference in November 1917

The German missionaries were subject during the War to the greatest deprivations and prosecutions; their property and that of their settlements in the German colonies were seized and in part destroyed.

In German East Africa there were before the War 815 schools with 45,970 scholars belonging to the Evangelical Missions and 804 schools of the Catholic Missions with 55,065 scholars (including 284 schools and 14,700 scholars of the three British missionary societies). In German South West Africa, there were 95 schools of Evangelical Missionary Societies with 5094 scholars, of which 39 schools with 2228 scholars belonged to the Finnish mission. The Catholics had 33 schools with 779 scholars, namely 27 schools of the Hünfeld Oblates and 6 of the Vienna Oblates. In the Cameroons there were 473 schools with 27,529 scholars belonging to the Evangelical Missions and 158 schools with 12,591 scholars belonging to the Catholic Missions. In Togoland, the Catholic Mission had 185 schools with 7539 scholars, and the Evangelical Mission 168 schools with 6218 scholars. In all the German Protectorates in Africa, the two denominations maintained 2731 schools with 160,794 scholars.

Under Article 438 of the Versailles Treaty, the property of the German Missionary Societies was transferred to foreign administrations. It was only in 1925 that German missionaries were allowed to resume the work so abruptly terminated. They are at present refused admission only in French Togoland and Cameroons and in the province of Ruanda which was allotted to Belgium. Wherever German missionaries have been able to resume their work, gratifying progress has been made. This is confirmed by the following tables. The figures relate only to work under German leadership.

1. declares that obligations assumed by a Mandatory Power in a mandated territory, and rights of every kind regularly acquired under its administration, shall have under all circumstances the same validity as if the Mandatory Power were sovereign:

2. Decides that:

(a) In the event of the cessation of a mandate or of its transfer—however improbable this may be—to a fresh Mandatory Power, the Council, without whose approval no such change can take place, will not give such approval unless it has been assured in advance that the new Government undertaking the administration of the territory will accept responsibility for the fulfilment of the financial obligations regularly assumed by the former Mandatory Power and will engage that all rights regularly acquired under the administration of the latter shall be respected;

(b) Moreover, the Council, when this change has been effected, will continue to use all its influence to ensure the fulfilment of these obligations, as has already been expressly provided in the mandates for Syria and Lebanon and for Palestine.”

This resolution is one of the most skilful resolutions of the League of Nations. While ignoring German property rights, it has not only built a solid wall against the possibilities existing under League law of any transfer of mandated territories to other countries, but, with this guarantee of invested capital, it has given the first real stimulus to the aspirations towards fusion which are now widely followed, as we have shown in detail by the above special case of East Africa.

Since this resolution, the main work of the Mandates Commission is the protest of some independent members of the Commission against “administrative reforms”, against the establishment of preferential rights for the Mandatories and against the fusion of these territories with the colonies of the Mandatories.

The Policy of the “Open Door”

In the question of colonies and raw materials a predominant place is given to the so-called policy of the “open door”. In this connection, it is affirmed that the economic and raw material sources are at the disposal of Germany and the other “have-nots.” What are the actual facts?

The principle of the “open door” is based on the Treaty of St. Germain of September 10th, 1919, which laid down this principle for the United States, Belgium, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan and Portugal in the so-called Congo Basin (Belgian Congo, parts of French Equatorial Africa and Portuguese West Africa, Ruanda and Urundi, Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda, Nyassaland and Zanzibar, parts of Abyssinia and Italian Somaliland, the northern part of Northern Rhodesia and Angola and a part of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan), in amendment of the Berlin Congo Act of February 20th, 1885, and the Brussels Agreement of July 2nd, 1890.

Article 15 of this Treaty, which provided that an examination and possible revision should take place in 10 years, has, like so many other provisions regarding revision, hitherto remained a dead letter.

The Berlin Congo Act of 1885 introduced in the entire Congo Basin freedom of trade, freedom of shipping, neutrality and the abolition of slavery. The “open door” which was thus proclaimed was, as it were, again closed at St. Germain. For the Treaty did not confirm economic “freedom,” but only economic “equality of rights,” and that only among the States represented at St. Germain. It was also stated that the new Treaty could be acceded to by States exercising authority over African territories and other States Members of the League of Nations or signatories of the Congo Act. Germany was excluded and was compelled, according to the unique method of Versailles, to agree in advance to anything that was done in the reconfirmation of the Congo Act. Later, when she became a Member of the League of Nations, no one in Geneva thought of inviting her to accede to the Treaty, in spite of the fact the signatories of St. Germain were to make every effort to obtain the accession of other States. When Lord Plymouth now states that Germany nevertheless tacitly enjoys the same rights from the treaty, this can by no means be regarded as an excuse, much less as a concession. If an examination and possible revision of the Treaty has not taken place up to the present and since 1929, this is certainly not due to the fact that a careful and serious investigation has proved to be superfluous. On the contrary, the treaty was never taken seriously.

What has been done in practice in carrying out this policy? What is the result of the financial, economic and administrative methods dealt with in the previous chapter? Has the policy of the “open door” proved to be one of the great achievements of the League policy, like balsam on open wounds?

As observed in the previous chapter, the discussions in the Mandates Commission have dealt largely with this principle.

But no one can affirm that these discussions have repressed the economic advantage of the mandatories. The principle of the “open door policy” has been maintained or not in every mandated country in accordance with the interests of the mandatory. In making this statement, there can be no intention of belittling the honest endeavours of decided defenders of the “open door policy,” in order to reject in the mass all the valuable suggestions of interest to countries lacking in raw materials, which the Mandates Commission has put forward in the course of the years. In order to obtain a clear opinion as to whether the principle of the “open door” has been maintained for the mandated territories or not, there is unfortunately only one method, i. e. statistics.

An adherent of the view that the Mandates Commission has effectively imposed its will on the mandatory Powers in respect of the application of the principle of the “open door,” the American Benjamin Gerig, in his book “The Open Door and the Mandates System” (London, Allen & Unwin, 1929), himself pointed out, for instance, that in the period 1925/27 France was responsible for about 33% to 45% of the import trade into the Cameroons, and that on the other hand British imports into the Cameroons in 1925 exceeded the French. During the same period, 33% to 43% of the exports from the Cameroons went to France. For Togoland Mr. Gerig gives France’s portion as 33% of the imports and 52% of the exports. In Tanganyika in 1926, 62% of the imports came from the mandated Power. Mr. Gerig thinks it can scarcely be prevented that about half the trade of the territory for which the “open door” exists should go to the administering country. As far as the mandated territories are concerned, it must be denied that such a high percentage is compatible with the principle of unselfish administration within the framework of the “open door.” Is there any question of trade with the mandated Power arising out of the sudden discovery of new raw materials which do not exist in its own colonies? Does this proportion of 50%, which is assumed to be inevitable, represent an additional trade which has become a vital necessity? Mr. Gerig himself gives the reply in his book. He has noted a fact which he does not regard as compatible with the principle of the “open door.” In the chapter “The Open Door in Practice,” he writes:

“Any country that takes the responsibility and bears the expense of administering colonies, or mandates, will inevitably hope to secure the larger share of the trade of these territories, particularly the import trade. And if there are valuable resources to be exploited it is natural that the nationals of the governing State should be the first to be informed of them. If railroads or bridges are to be built, harbours constructed and public buildings erected, the more lucrative contracts are not likely to go to the nationals of other countries.”

Germany has constantly pointed out this fact to the countries that are rich in raw materials.

Among the most important questions of foreign policy for all States is that of "collective security" so-called — and with it the problem of alliance, neutrality, and rapprochement, as methods of achieving security — and of the legal forms as well as the significance of the treaties in which the idea of collective security finds expression. German jurists did not participate in the deliberation of the working programme for the International Study Conference on Collective Security in 1934. But for the International Study Conference of London in 1935, the author, who is Professor of International Law and Philosophy of Law at the University of Berlin, worked out a memorandum (which he subsequently expanded into the present book) as a German contribution to the international discussion on this topic. This book, written with scientific thoroughness and dealing comprehensively and in detail with all sides of this difficult complex of questions, is addressed not only to the expert on international law and the science of international relations, but also to the politician interested in security policy and international law, who is entitled to expect the science of international law to draw clear "theoretical" lines of orientation through the tangle of pact policy and the various efforts to attain international security.

Ainsi qu'on se le rappelle, l'Allemagne n'a pas participé aux réunions destinées à fixer le plan de travail de la Conférence sur la Sécurité Collective qui eut lieu à Paris en 1934. M. Heinrich Rogge, docteur en droit, chargé de cours de Droit des Gens et de Philosophie du Droit à l'Université de Berlin, avait rédigé à l'intention de la Conférence d'études qui se réunit à Londres en 1935 un Mémoire qu'il a pris pour base du présent ouvrage qui peut être considéré comme constituant une contribution allemande aux discussions internationales sur le problème de la sécurité collective.

D'une part, la question de la sécurité collective se range parmi les questions les plus importantes du Droit international public. D'autre part, tous les détails de ce volume de 433 pages, suivies d'un répertoire très pratique, ont été soigneusement contrôlés par l'auteur; ils se trouvent examinés et réunis en un ensemble constituant un exposé du problème de la paix et de ses aspects scientifiques comme on n'en trouve nulle part d'aussi complet.

Par conséquent, l'ouvrage de M. Heinrich Rogge ne peut manquer d'intéresser au plus haut degré, non seulement les experts de Droit international et tout le monde scientifique qui consacre son activité à l'étude des relations internationales et des sciences politiques dans les différents pays, mais aussi les personnalités politiques s'occupant de la question de la Sécurité et du Droit international, car ils y trouveront des lignes «théoriques» bien clairement tracées qui leur permettront de se retrouver dans le labyrinthe que représentent la politique des pactes et les efforts tentés pour atteindre la Sécurité internationale.

Cet ouvrage a également une grande valeur pour les étudiants, auxquels il montre le rôle important que le Droit international joue dans la politique extérieure.

En résumé: un livre de haute actualité internationale.

Le Problème de la paix et la science du Droit international

XXVIII, 707 Seiten, broschiert RM 12,—, Leinen RM 14,—

Erstmalig wird hier eine Gesamtdarstellung des Friedensproblems und seiner Wissenschaft gegeben, das in seinem ganzen Umfang, in seinen vielfach verschlungenen Fragestellungen behandelt wird. Gegenüber allen pazifistischen Fiktionen und Illusionen zieht sich durch das Werk als Lösung wahrer Friedensbestrebungen die These, daß der Frieden seinem Kern nach Rechtsproblem ist. Das Friedensproblem wird als die Frage nach dem „Frieden durch Recht“ bestimmt und seine Komplikationen werden unter diesem Gesichtspunkt entwirrt. Dabei wird aber mit aller Deutlichkeit aufgezeigt, daß die Völkerrechtsentwicklung weiterdrängt, daß „das Recht der nationalen Selbstverteidigung“ oder „der internationalen Notwehr“ und die Anerkennung eines „Frieden in Ehren“ zu den Grundfragen und Aufgaben des Völkerrechts und der Friedensbewegung gehören.

Die Entwicklung der letzten zwei Jahre hat den Voraussagen des 1934 erschienenen Buches über die Entwicklung der Sanktionsfrage und des Widerspiels zwischen Bündnispolitik und Neutralitätspolitik recht gegeben, ein Beweis für die Lebensnähe und Anwendbarkeit der darin vorgetragenen Wissenschaft.

Here for the first time the problem of peace, and the science which deals with it, is treated in its entire scope and in all its multifarious intertwined aspects. In contradistinction to all pacifistic fictions and illusions, the solution of true efforts for peace which permeates the work is the thesis that peace is, at the core, a legal problem. The problem of peace is defined as the question of "peace by law", and its complications are disentangled from this point of view. But it is made eminently clear that the development of international law presses onward, that the "right of national self-defence" or of "international self-defence" and the recognition of a "peace with honour" are among the fundamental questions and tasks of international law and of the peace movement. Developments of the past two years have vindicated the predictions of the book, which appeared in 1934, regarding the development of the question of sanctions and of the interplay between alliance policy and neutrality policy — a proof of the closeness to reality and the applicability of the science which it expounds.

INHALT: Sammlung aller das Vertragswerk von Locarno betreffenden Dokumente von 1925 bis 1936 — CONTENTS: Complete collection of documents regarding the pact of Locarno, from 1925 to 1936 — CONTENU: Collection de tous les documents importants regardant le pacte de Locarno, de 1925 à 1936

Pour la première fois, ce livre contient un exposé d'ensemble du problème de la paix et de ses aspects scientifiques s'étendant aux questions fort complexes qui sont impliquées par ce problème. À toutes les fictions et illusions pacifistes, l'ouvrage oppose la thèse que la solution des efforts entrepris en faveur d'une paix véritable doit découler de cette considération que la paix est, en substance, un problème d'équité. Le problème de la paix est donc défini par la question «la paix par l'équité» et c'est dans cet esprit que sont élucidées les difficultés qui sont venues compliquer ledit problème. Dans cet ordre d'idées, le volume montre clairement l'insistance avec laquelle se poursuit la poussée vers un développement du Droit international; de plus, il montre que le droit, tant national qu'international, de «défense légitime» ainsi que la reconnaissance de la notion de «la paix dans l'honneur» figurent parmi les questions et tâches fondamentales du Droit international et du mouvement en faveur de la paix.

Les événements qui se sont déroulés au cours de ces deux dernières années ont confirmé les pronostics de l'ouvrage — paru en 1934 — au sujet de l'évolution de la question des sanctions et au sujet de la compétition surgie entre la politique d'alliances et la politique de neutralité, ce qui démontre d'une manière convaincante combien les considérations scientifiques de M. Rogge sont proches de la réalité et susceptibles d'application pratique.

The advantages of the mandatory Powers, like those of the other colonial Powers in their own colonies, are of many kinds and mostly of a very general character. The mere fact that the mandatory Power decides the official language of the country and applies its own legal system offers a great advantage to all members of the mandatory Power, especially the officials. But in addition, all the economic links between the mandated territories and the mandatory Power are much stronger than between them and the other nations. The mandatory Power has the right to appoint the entire staff of officials in its colony or in the mandated territory allotted to it; the costs of this administration, to which only nationals of the mandatory Power are admitted, is borne by the mandated territory. It thus gives the mother country an advantage and relieves it of a burden. The requirements of the administration and of the officials are preferably ordered from the home country, and any possible immigration is in the first place promoted from that country. In view of the close commercial relations, the output will go mainly to the home country or, as in the case of Great Britain, to her dominions and colonies. By means of grants and official loans, the political, economic and cultural influence of the mandatory Power grows, and the mandated territory becomes responsible for the payment of interest. A further advantage is the existence of a sphere of uniform currency in which foreign trade can be carried on without regard to the foreign exchange position.

In addition to these general advantages, there are also special possibilities. These are in the first place all the measures which aim at establishing as wide a monopoly as possible by production and export restrictions in the disposal of certain raw materials, and in the second place they are the measures which, by means of preferential systems, such as export premiums, quotas, railway tariff facilities, preference for national shipping, have an effect on the foreign exchange position of non-colonial countries, on their purchasing power, and therefore also on the demand for raw materials.

In British, American and French inquiries, it is everywhere admitted that the American tariff policy, the high French preferential duties and the preferential system of the Ottawa agreements have exercised a disastrous effect on the development of world trade. It is also admitted that in almost all colonial territories that are not bound by special treaties, the export trade of countries which do not possess colonies has been restricted to the advantage of the mother countries. Lastly, it is also admitted that, in spite of the establishment of the "open door" for the "A" and "B" mandates (in the case of the "C" mandates the Peace Conference considered it necessary for political reasons to exclude this guarantee, while in the case of the "B" mandates the equality of rights was restricted by the arbitrary exceptional provision that it was in the power of the Mandatory to carry out certain public works and services on conditions which it thought fit), and in spite of the Treaty of St. Germain, with the possible exception of a few great public works for which international tenders had to be submitted, the local administration obtains all its requirements from the mother country. In short, in spite of the door which is alleged to be wide open, the governing Powers in practice enjoy commercial facilities, which have also contributed to the position that the substantial sources of raw materials and trade possibilities have not been adequately utilised and that this has been mostly to the detriment of the natives. It may be pointed out in this connection that the agreements concluded at Ottawa in 1932 are valid till 1937.

All this shows that the establishment of the mandatory system, which was to be merely a step towards a new colonial administrative and economic reform, took place solely at the cost of Germany and resulted entirely to the advantage of the trustee. But this fact is also the clearest argument against the attempt to convince Germany that colonies and mandates merely represent a heavy burden, for the loss of which one must be thankful to providence and to those who are willing to take them.

That it is an uncontested fact that the riches of the mandated territories and their main sources of revenue fall to the mandatory Power is a decisive argument against the entire mandatory system and in favour of its abolition.

The constantly closer combination of administrative and financial practice and the increasing trade of the mandated territories with the sovereign territory of the mandatory Power, particularly in recent years, clearly proves the aim, which is in every way opposed to the theory of the League mandatory system.

How has the economic development progressed since Mr. Gerig's book? The statistics of the mandated territories themselves are sufficient proof. The exports of Great Britain, together with those from Kenya, Uganda and British India, to East Africa amounted in 1931 to 65 % of the total imports of the territory. The imports from the same sources were as follows in subsequent years: 1932, 52.2 %; 1933, 49 %; 1934, 46.3 % and 1935, 48.6 %. The exports from East Africa to these countries were: 1931, 49.2 %; 1932, 64.6 %; 1933, 62.2 %; 1934, 68.2 % and 1935, 68.6 %. As regards South-West Africa, the total imports were £1,261,865 in 1934 and £1,498,732 in 1935. Foreign countries participated in these totals only to the extent of £225,536 in 1934 and £311,549 in 1935. The export figures for South West Africa were: 1934, £1,142,120 and 1935, £2,512,946. The amounts going to foreign countries were: 1934, £301,698 and 1935, £540,039. As regards the Cameroons, the share of France and Great Britain in the imports was: 1930, 51.3 %; 1931, 59.1 %; 1932, 65.9 %; 1933, 60.9 %.

The position is similar for Togoland and to a still greater extent for the South Sea Islands.

Another expert, Leonard Barnes, in a work entitled "The Future of the Colonies" (London, The Hogarth Press, 1936), has given the following interesting figures for 1933:

Share of various States in the foreign trade.

Kenya and Uganda, 1933:

	Import from	Export to
Great Britain	38 %	35 %
Other parts of the Empire	25 %	42 %
Germany	3 %	2 %
Italy	3 %	1 %

Tanganyika Territory, 1933:

Great Britain	29 %	24 %
Other parts of the Empire	19 %	37 %
Germany	10 %	10 %
Italy	—	2 %

Nigeria, 1933:

(incl. Cameroons under British mandate):
Great Britain	67 %	37 %
Other parts of the Empire	4 %	1.5 %
Germany	8 %	16 %
Italy	0.3 %	4 %

The inquiry of the Royal Institute of International Affairs: Raw Materials and Colonies, arrives at similar figures for 1934.

In 1934 for instance, in spite of the Convention of Algeiras, Morocco obtained 43 % of its goods from France; in spite of the "open door" in the Congo Basin, Nigeria obtained 55 % of its imports from Great Britain, the Belgian Congo 43 % from Belgium, and Kenya-Uganda almost 37 % from Great Britain. Of the imports of French Cameroons, 25.8 % come from France and 39 % from Great Britain; of French Togoland 15.1 % from France and 39 % from Great Britain. The corresponding figures for Germany are 0 %, 4.7 %, 6.5 %, 3.5 %, 7.7 % and 5.9 %.

These figures show what the system of the "open door" really means for colonies and mandated territories. It is quite clear why the system fails to work. But it is no doubt worth while to give the reasons again and to show that the lack of preferential duties and the like in favour of the colonial or mandatory Power by no means signifies practical equality of rights for all other nations.

We find a deliberate economic policy on the part of the mandatory Powers who, true to their pre-war principles, apply the principle of the "open door" in practice in the manner demanded by their own economic interests. The phraseology of the "open door" is exactly like the pre-war idea of free trade policy; it is nothing more than one of the forms of competition of capitalistic economy in which, after so many unhappy experiences, countries which have been severely tried economically should not place their trust. It was part of the commercial traditions both of England and France never to apply the principle of the "open door" in the manner in which it was applied before the War by Germany. It is one of the merits of the above mentioned book by Mr. Gerig that he has proved this in detail. What was known as free trade before the War was never understood by British statesmen as meaning anything more than "free trade within the British Empire". At the beginning of the discussions in 1919, when England opposed Wilson's unrestricted demand for the "open door policy" for all colonial territories, Wilson was referred to the American policy of preferences. Sir Austen Chamberlain stated at that time, on June 9th, 1919, in skilful diplomatic form: "I am sure that President Wilson's fourteen points are not to be understood to mean that a country has no right or shall no longer have the right to discriminate between its own citizens and others. What he no doubt meant and what I presume he desires is to reduce the extent of the discrimination or to abolish the discrimination with which a certain country acts discriminately against one foreign country as compared with another foreign country. This is quite a different matter."

It will be seen from this, that even after the establishment of Article 22, Great Britain adhered to her old preferential policy. The inclusion of certain mandated territories in the C group is, moreover, the pure expression of such a policy; it has really nothing to do with demographic or cultural questions. France also could not proclaim herself as a representative of the "open door policy". In the past, it is true, she entered into an agreement with Germany granting the latter advantages in Morocco, but in this particular case she had compromised the principle by excluding Germany from the Algeiras Acts of 1906.

Thus, the "open door policy" of the mandatory Powers is also a result of the unsatisfied practice of the mandatory system which goes counter to all promises. It is true that President Wilson's demand that "the Mandatory State or Agency shall in all cases be bound and required to maintain the policy of the Open Door, or equal opportunity for all the signatories of the Covenant, in respect of the use and development of the economic resources of such people or territory" is still to be heard from the camp of the mandatory Powers. It is the reply they make to all countries lacking in raw materials when they say: "What more do you want? The door for obtaining raw materials and economic sources is open to you." But practice shows that this is not so. The fact that the path is closed to Germany in the mandated territories, and especially in the former German colonies, is, however, not solely the result of a selfish economic policy on the part of the mandatory Powers, but is due to political reasons.

The mandatory system has also failed in the accessibility of the sources of raw materials in the mandated territories for non-mandate countries. The result of the Versailles Treaty, the longer it continued, proved more clearly to be a chapter of historical ingratitude and injustice towards Germany.

"Germany was the one Great Power which did not win her colonial empire by conquest.

The Open Door policy was adopted by Germany at a time when she was protesting against the closed doors of other territories and when she was taking the initiative in promoting the Conference of Berlin for equality of treatment in the Congo. Germany took a new parture in Open Door methods by negotiating with England bilateral reciprocal and unlimited Open Door treaties for their respective territories in Middle Africa and in the Pacific. Using these treaties for bargaining purposes she negotiated a series of other reciprocal most-favoured-nation treaties, thus generalizing her Open Door treatment.

There is no evidence from trade statistic, tariff schedules, and informed authorities which leads to the conclusion that the Open Door was not practised. The equal economic opportunity for other countries practised by the German colonial administration from 1885 to 1914 stands as a record of which the German nation may well be proud."

This is the opinion of Mr. Gerig, one of the best of the experts who have observed the "open door policy" of the mandatory Powers in connection with the mandatory system. When German trade, although it enjoyed no preference in the German colonies, ranked first in 1913 with 66% of the imports and 73.8% of the exports, this was a proof that the "open door" was available primarily to the country which pressed forward of its own vital power.

When one thinks in this connection of the meagre result of the first international discussion on the world supply of raw materials, which was carried on at Geneva in March of this year, and of the evasive and unobjective speeches by the representatives of certain countries that are well supplied with raw materials, it is not only regrettable but it is also hopeless ever to expect that such an international political discussion will ever lead to the result which was the cause of this League procedure, i. e. the demand of the poor countries for vital raw materials, the lack of which is the cause of their present crisis.

The defenders of the mandatory system have argued that the very inaccuracy in the wording of Article 22 of the Covenant in respect of the maintenance of sovereign rights forms the strength of the League, which could at any time prevent political annexation and economic preparations to this end from becoming facts. As no proof was obtainable for this assertion, hopes were held out for the future that some day the Mandates Commission might become an institution which would protect the mandated territories against political and economic imperialistic aspirations with greater power than hitherto as a trustee in the interests of all countries. These future promises sound all very well, but the practice of the mandatory Powers is a different matter. On the contrary, after the experiences of the last fifteen years, it cannot be denied that the mandatory Powers are in many cases deliberately trying to maintain the unclearness of the legal position, in order more easily to attain their real aims.

A system that is so closely connected with the establishment and policy of the League of Nations and is based on such debatable foundations and principles, cannot be improved in the long run by individual well-meaning changes. Judicious economic and colonial experts long ago realised that the entire conception of mandates — "in sin conceived and in remorse begotten", as the first Director of the Mandates Section of the League called them — requires a fundamental revision. Whether this will make much change in the existing conditions is another matter. In order to reach a radical solution, it is not the revision of the mandatory system that is required, but a revision of the entire colonial question.

B. The Colonial Question as a Problem of Economics and Raw Materials

Extract from the Speech delivered by Joachim von Ribbentrop on the Occasion of the Spring Demonstration of the Commission for the Economic Policy of the NSDAP., on March 1st, 1937

The World War and Versailles brought about the most tremendous economic upheaval of our time. Germany's foreign trade was destroyed, Central Europe was shut out from the world market, the conventional international laws concerning the protection of private property were disregarded by many countries, neutral trade was stifled. The decision, made at the World Economic Conference of the Allies in Paris in 1916, to continue all these measures against Germany after the conclusion of the War, was largely put into practice in the dictate of Versailles. Versailles brought about the so-called liquidation of German private property, which meant the loss of most of the German capital investments abroad, the exclusion from all the world markets, one-sided privileges by means of one-sided most-favoured-nation clauses to the benefit of the victor states, huge reparation payments in money and kind with no sort of reciprocal terms, the confiscation of the German merchant-fleet, etc. By the erection of artificial customs barriers across century-old economic territories, a state of paralysis if not complete destruction was forcibly brought about in the economic area of Central Europe. These were the immediate results of the World War and of Versailles. In addition there were the indirect results through the development of their own industry and the partial creation of self-sufficing industrial areas by almost all overseas countries, which had formerly provided markets for industrial export from Europe and particularly from Central Europe, that is, Germany.

No country was in a position to avoid the results of this tremendous upheaval. It was obviously much easier for those countries with a large domestic market or a great colonial empire providing vast export possibilities, to adjust themselves to the altered circumstances. France with her colonial empire confined herself to a quota policy, America introduced the policy of high protection to safeguard her great domestic market, and finally, at the Ottawa Conference, England welded her Empire together into an exclusive economic structure by granting customs preferences for the Dominions. In addition the most important economic areas introduced protective tariffs which mainly affected German goods, and reduced German export to these countries more and more.

Germany had not merely to suffer the general results of this world economic dislocation like every other country, but was hit much more hardly. For, in the first place, Germany constitutes a comparatively small and over-populated economic territory, and in the second place she entered the new economic struggle with the enormous handicap of Versailles. I will refer in this connection only to the tremendous reparations debts, which Germany could only pay by means of exports. But the more Germany exported, in the fanatical urge to fulfil what was required of her, the more the great economic units of the world, France, America, and the British Empire, entrenched themselves behind new protective customs barriers. In addition to this, the vast economic unit of Russia, which in the past had been one of the chief of Germany's export markets, was, through Bolshevism, practically excluded from the normal world economic course.

Such was Germany's position after the War, and it is not to be wondered at that Germany, faced with the results of the economic madness of Versailles, had to make tremendous efforts to find her feet once more.

But worse than all these burdens was the moral depression of post-war Germany. The rapid progress of intensification in the nineteenth century had led through the appearance of the insane doctrines of Marxism to a deep and dangerous cleavage between workers and employers. Bolshevism, coming from the East, exaggerated this division and gradually came to be the greatest menace to the entire structure of European economics and western culture. Especially exposed to danger through the hopeless economic situation of the post-war years, guided by a weak government which had lost touch with the people, caught in a net of capitalistic and liberalistic economic theories, and thus open to the Bolshevik propaganda from Russia, their immediate neighbour, the German people were heading for disaster.

It is the immortal service of our Führer and of the National-Socialist German Workers' Party to have brought about a fundamental change in Germany, in the economic sphere as well. The Führer's principle, that capital must serve economy and economy the people, and not vice versa, became with the National-Socialist assumption of power the guiding principle for the development of the new economic structure of Germany. National-Socialism does away with the hostile tension between workers and employers, and in its place establishes the community of all productive workers in the service of the whole nation. The service of the nation as a whole is allotted to trade and commerce as its significant function, and in united Germany one of the principles of the National-Socialist ideology, "Service before Self", strikes ever deeper roots.

But in this way a solid basis of quiet, of order and safety has been created in Central Europe, on which the German economic system, shattered to its very foundations, could at last be built up once more. The question now arose: how could the German nation, morally united, a community in work, a firm centre of order in a society of states in which class-war, strikes, and class-hatred are rife—how could the German nation give its economic system, crippled through the events since 1914, a sure and lasting foundation, as a guarantee of existence and well-being for the nation?

Experience pointed here first to the method of increasing exports, so that Germany might be in a position to import the foodstuffs and raw materials necessary for domestic consumption and also for purposes of processing and re-export. The method of credit was excluded on principle. The Third Reich did not wish to become the world's debtor. It was sufficiently occupied with the debts contracted by former governments. Import was regulated strictly according to the extent of export. In this way Germany has been able during the last few years not only to adjust her foreign trade balance, but also to make a considerable increase in the volume of trade, and even to pay old debts and interest out of certain surpluses.

But it has been the Führer's constant aim since the assumption of power, in addition to the economic safeguarding of the bare existence of the German people, to raise the general standard of living in Germany and thus to guarantee for his people extended possibilities of cultural activity and cultural exchange. With this aim in view, German economic leaders have during the last years exerted tremendous efforts to increase the German volume of trade with other countries by way of normal goods exchange, and to come to correspondingly liberal agreements with the different countries of the world. The fact that these efforts were only partially successful, as a result of the short-sighted refusal on the part of economically strong countries, and further the recognition that continued propagation of Bolshevism throughout the world might lead to a further decrease in the volume of German foreign trade (as in the case of Spain) have caused the Führer to embark upon entirely new ways.

After renewed unsuccessful attempts to establish comprehensive international trade agreement, the Führer stepped in once more last summer. The Four-years Plan, with which you are familiar, was decided upon without more ado. To-day it has already been tackled on an enormous scale, and progresses irresistibly towards its completion. Thus it was only after it was quite clear that liberal trade agreements with other countries could not be achieved, that the Führer decided upon this step. In other words this plan was virtually forced upon Germany by the other countries. While at the time of its announcement the Four-years Plan was often laughed at by foreign economists, it seems very strange to us when we read here and there in foreign newspapers, or hear in speeches by foreign politicians, that it will be possible to negotiate with Germany only when she abandons the Four-year Plan. It appears still more strange to us when we hear from other countries that Germany is isolating herself economically, is pursuing a policy of absolute self-sufficiency and desires no more trade relations with other countries. First of all I must point out that, if we are to speak of self-sufficiency, it was the other countries of the world who started this policy, as I have already stated. Roosevelt's economic policy, and above all Ottawa, were purely measures of self-sufficiency, and these were adopted long before the Four-years Plan. The Four-years Plan is thus merely a natural piece of self-help on Germany's part, and all the criticisms from abroad can only strengthen us in our opinion that we are on the right way. Perhaps there is really a country in the world which requires certain raw materials as a condition of its existence, and can produce these materials itself, but does not. The leaders of such a country are to be pitied. Germany, at all events, is subject to no such suicidal ideas. Germany has ascertained that she possesses coal, wood, inventive brains and numberless strong, workhardened hands, and is determined to produce herself the raw materials which she cannot import, in order to feed her children better and gradually to raise the standard of living.

Strange as was the first verdict of some foreign countries as to the possibility of carrying out the Four-years Plan, the second conclusions of certain foreign economists seem to me to be equally false; namely, that the Four-years Plan is a proof of the hostility of German economic policy towards international trade. In my opinion this is a complete and utter fallacy, for these reasons:

In the first place, I believe that we are far too close neighbours in Europe to-day and far too dependent upon reciprocal exchange of agricultural and industrial products, for any country to be able permanently to cut itself off economically from the others.

But the prerequisite for all reciprocal exchange of goods is the ordered structure of the separate economic areas. If this is not present in one country, it will lead sooner or later to harm for all. As far as Germany is concerned, this prerequisite, namely, the ordered structure of the German economic area, is to be provided by means of the Four-years Plan, in that this is to make Germany economically independent of other countries, at least in regard to essential raw materials, and thus provide for German economy its fundamental requirements in raw materials. Only by this means will the economic foundation be provided upon which Germany can enter into a regular exchange of goods with the rest of the world.

The capital which in Germany of necessity becomes free through this whole development will automatically flow into the channels of world economy and world trade, and thus bring about a revival.

A prosperous Germany, in quite a different position from that of to-day, will be able to buy more than the minimum of bare necessities from abroad. Thus, in my opinion, there can be no doubt that the Four-years Plan in its final results will mean anything but self-sufficiency; its execution will rather create the preliminary conditions necessary for Germany's renewed participation in regular world trade and, above and beyond this, German economy, having hereby become independent, will have an enormously beneficial effect on world trade in general in that it will increase the exchange of industrial products between the other great economic units of the world.

If I have just expressed a few ideas on the effect which, in my opinion, the carrying out of the Four-years Plan will have on world trade, I would now like to turn to the political aspect of the subject; for, as I see it, the economic importance of the Four-years Plan is surpassed by the significance of its political consequences.

In separating the world into victors and vanquished after the War the nations were at the same time divided into the "Haves" and the "Have-nots," as a British statesman put it last year. Now it is very natural and comprehensible if the non-possessing nations regard the possessing nations with discontent, while these in turn regard the others with suspicion.

This discontent and this suspicion, however, can again only be dispelled if the possessing and the non-possessing nations come to an arrangement which, while not raising the latter to the ranks of the wealthy nations of this world, nevertheless offers them a certain compromise.

By the Treaty of Versailles, Germany, once one of the wealthiest countries in the world, has been forced into the ranks of the non-possessing nations. Germany was at the time unwisely deprived of all her assets capable of mobilization, which created an inequality of possession in all spheres, such as could never last, and to which must be ascribed a good part of the unrest in the world to-day.

It is, however, in the interests of all nations to eliminate this unrest in the world and therefore to find a compromise between the possessing and the non-possessing states. And how can it be found?

We are first of all confronted with the practical impossibility of finding compensation for the enormous displacement of values during the post-war period. I take leave to doubt whether those nations which at that time enriched themselves so enormously at Germany's expense, being for the most part very wealthy already, have really benefited thereby. This much is, however, certain, that this redistribution of wealth has had catastrophic results for Germany. A discerning English economist was probably the only person to realise this in 1919 and withdraw from collaboration in the Peace Treaty, because he even then foresaw the terrible results which the execution of this treaty would have on Germany in particular and thus also on world economics in general.

These things cannot be altered now. Nevertheless an adjustment must be found because in our enlightened world of newspapers, telephones, telegraphy, wireless, aeroplanes, etc., it is no longer possible for some countries to flow with milk and honey while others have to struggle for their bare existence. As matters lie, this adjustment can only be found in two fields firstly, by the solution of the problem of the restoration of the former German colonial possessions, and secondly, by means of the German people's own efforts.

With regard to the question of colonies the Führer declared in his speech of January 30th that: "as a matter of course our demand for colonies for our densely populated country will be put forward again and again." At the same time he utterly refuted the reasons put forward abroad for withholding the former German colonies. If we read over the covering note to the Treaty of Versailles to-day and see that the conversion of the German colonies into mandated territories is expressly accounted for by "the use to which these colonies were put as bases from which to prey upon the commerce of the world" and her inability to administer her colonies, it is quite clear to us with what a morbid psychosis of hate and on what threadbare grounds Germany's colonial possessions were taken from her. I believe that hardly anyone capable of intelligent thought will to-day any longer hold possible the line of argument employed at that time, I further believe that hardly any unintelligent person will suggest that this strange proof of the rough and ready solution that has been found is capable of being brought into line with President Wilson's demand that a "free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims" should be found. Yet it was relying on Wilson's promises alone that the German nation at that time laid down its arms.

Germany claims the right to colonial possessions on principle, for this is a right which belongs to every other nation, even to the smallest in the world, and Germany must formally reject every form of argument which seeks to dispute this right with her.

Further more, England, Japan, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal—all possess colonies and, in certain cases, colonial empires which for the most part are far, far greater than their mother countries. Germany with her huge population crowded together in the narrowest space needs colonies more than anyone else. So shall Germany of all nations possess no colonies?

But just as false as were the grounds on which the colonies were taken away from Germany, is the reason which one finds from time to time in the foreign press, namely that Germany would pursue an Imperialistic policy and organize her colonies as strategic bases. Quite apart from the fact that from the military point of view every colony signifies for Germany a lost position in advance, the Naval Agreement concluded between Germany and England is the most striking proof of the falsity of such a contention. Incidentally I may perhaps remind you in this connection of the Führer's declaration that the possession of colonies would lead to no increase in Germany's naval demands.

Now let us turn to the economic side.

Here there are in the main three points which must be continually emphasized anew:

(1) The question of raw materials, i. e. the necessity for Germany of the possession of regions in which sources of raw materials may be exploited with her own German currency, and from which raw materials may be bought to supply German industry, likewise with German currency. Granted that all sources of raw materials in the world are open to Germany to-day, but only if paid for in foreign exchange of which we do not possess enough.

(2) The colonies as a market for manufactured goods and as a field for German enterprise. In this connection we should emphasize the contracts for public works let out by the colonial administrative authorities, for these are of great importance. In foreign colonies these contracts fall almost exclusively to the industries of the mother country, thus, if there were colonies under German sovereignty, our own industry would naturally receive the lion's share.

(3) The possibilities of development in the colonies. It will be possible for the Germany of to-day to develop the colonies much more intensively, and to carry out economic planing on broader lines and based on a longer period of time than was possible under our former liberalistic economic system. There is no doubt that in this way, after a few years of development, a considerably greater percentage of the whole German consumption of raw materials can be supplied from the colonies than was the case before the war, and, what is more, with the aid of German capital alone, that is of German currency.

It would be possible to say a great deal more on this subject of colonies. However, we have not the time to-day. But I do believe that what has just been said has made it quite clear that a return of the former German colonies is of very great importance to Germany and can finally lead to a considerable improvement in Germany's economic situation.

We hope that sound common sense and economic thinking will prove victorious in this matter too and, as soon as possible, find an equitable solution. Such an equitable solution was President Wilson's idea. The present status of the former German colonies as mandates, which leaves open the question of the final sovereignty over them, proves that at that time people could or would not comply with Wilson's demands, but at the same time showed by this temporary solution that they realized that sooner or later this question would have to be finally settled. The growing recognition abroad of the injustice which Germany suffered in the treatment of the colonial question will, it is to be hoped, at last induce the mandatory powers to make of their own free will the generous gesture expected by us, a gesture which would be of the greatest importance for a final clearing of the atmosphere.

I believe that Germany can expect this gesture, for—

In order to take her place again in the ranks of the possessing nations, Germany is prepared voluntarily to take the main burden once more upon her own shoulders in order to satisfy her needs by a renewed, huge expenditure of energy on the part of the German nation. For this is the practical import of the Four-years Plan. It is therefore not admissible that the world on the one hand says that a materially discontented Germany is dangerous, and on the other is not prepared to help Germany and even goes so far as to do a great deal to prevent our being contented. I believe that the world should rejoice that Germany is prepared, with the aid of her own resources and without injuring anyone else, to give her economic system once more the secure basis of raw materials which world trade to-day either can or will not offer it. Yes, I do believe that the outside world must be interested in the success and swift carrying-out of the Four-years Plan almost to the same extent as Germany herself is.

For has there ever in history been a better guarantee of peace and tranquillity than a contented nation which possesses all it wants? In my opinion here lies the importance of our Four-years Plan for foreign policy. In contrast to the privileged nations, Germany finds her way to expansion outside blocked. Therefore she must find her satisfaction in expansion within, through intensification within, and must harness every energy in order to assure the means of existence to her population of 68 millions, living as they do on their small territory and on the poor soil of Northern Europe.

Germany's Colonial Demands

Article published in the American journal "Foreign Affairs", January 1937.

By Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, Reich Minister of Economics and President of the Reichsbank

The American reader will think that the problem of colonial possessions for Germany is no concern of his. For that reason I should like to refer to two points which are of importance from an American standpoint in the solution of this problem. First of all, I do not believe that the world economy can enjoy lasting prosperity without Germany's participation. If Germany were isolated, one might say that the world could survive the loss of a market of some seventy million people, that seventy million consumers, more or less, make very little difference to the world at large. But no such isolation of Germany is possible because the whole of Eastern Europe simply cannot dispense with the German market.

The Eastern European countries are predominantly agrarian. For them the German market is a matter of life and death. At the present time Germany receives some 14 percent of the exports of Poland, 16 percent of those of Czechoslovakia, 17 percent of those of Austria, 30 percent of those of Hungary, 49 percent of those of Bulgaria, 20 percent of those of Rumania, 36 percent of those of Yugoslavia, 45 percent of those of Greece and 64 percent of those of Turkey. Consequently, the disappearance of Germany from the world market would have most unwelcome results for the whole of Eastern Europe. Nor is it of much less importance to the Scandinavian countries. No one must forget this importance of Germany, situated as she is in the heart of Europe, with her highly developed population and her high standard of living. European prosperity cannot be conceived of without German prosperity. And however much America may wish to stand aloof, there is not the slightest doubt that the ebb and flow of European prosperity is important to her.

The second reason why the United States cannot remain indifferent to the German colonial problem is moral. Even though the United States finally refused to ratify the Versailles Peace Treaty, it nevertheless was President Wilson who, by the proclamation of his Fourteen Points, provided the occasion for peace negotiations. Point Five of the Wilson program concerning colonies was one of the points on which Germany relied when she entered into those negotiations. And this, moreover, after the American Government had received from the Allied Powers the assurance, and had conveyed that assurance to Germany, that the Fourteen Points would constitute the basis of peace. Point Five of the Wilson program reads as follows:

A free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interest of populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

Germany was perfectly ready to submit her colonial claims to the test provided for in Point Five, the more so because Colonel House, the President's friend and collaborator, in his well-known Lyons wireless in October 1918, had given the following interpre-

Militarism

When the German colonies were seized, the former Allies found no better pretext in order to make their purely imperialistic aims palatable than to state they merely wanted to protect the natives from Prussian militarism and its methods. The entire falsity of this statement can be clearly proved. The last Governor General of German East Africa, Dr. Heinrich Schnee, in his above-mentioned book, gave an accurate description, with figures, of Germany's military position in her former colonies. He writes as follows:

"In the covering note, Germany is charged with have used her colonies 'as a point of departure for raids on the trade of the world'. This statement is entirely untrue. At no time before the War did Germany create institutions or make arrangements in her colonies in order to use them for such purposes. As mentioned above, the only fortified base in all the German Protectorates was Tsingtow in China. That the fortifications of this port were created for defensive purposes and not to provide a basis of attack was obvious both from the manner of these fortifications and from the events of the War. All the other German colonies in Africa and the South Seas had not the slightest fortification which was suitable even for defence against an attack by European naval or land forces. There were even no guns. The principal port of the largest German colony, Daressalam, only possessed a few old guns for salutes, fired with very smoky powder, and the same was the case with Duala in the Cameroons. There were no guns whatever in any of the other ports in East Africa, or in any of the other colonies.

Where were the ports in the colonies from which German submarines could have set out, where were the harbour fortifications and strand batteries behind which German warships could have prepared for raids, where were the bases where they could lie in safety and take in coal? Nothing of the kind existed. Nor were there ever any considerable number of warships stationed in the African and South Sea colonies, such as would have been required for such undertakings. In German East Africa there was only one small cruiser, and in the other colonies, if there were any at all, only obsolete small warships were as a rule stationed. When the War broke out, the few small warships in the German colonies in Africa and the South Seas were compelled immediately to leave the ports of the Protectorate which offered them no protection.

And now as regards the alleged militarisation of the German colonies themselves. In the first place the legal provisions regarding the colonial troops and their small effectives show that they had merely to do their service in the colony itself. There were protectorate troops, organised as military troops, only in the three largest colonies of German East Africa, German South West Africa and the Cameroons. Their object is laid down in the Protectorate Troop Law of July 7th-18th, 1896, namely that they were used for the maintenance of order and security in the African protectorates. An examination of the figures shows at once that they could not serve any other purpose. German East Africa, almost twice the size of Germany and with a population of about $7\frac{3}{4}$ million natives, had protectorate troops numbering 2500 native soldiers with 152 German officers and n.c.o.s, in addition to 108 German sanitation officers and n.c.o.s. In addition there were 2140 native police troops under 4 German officers and 61 n.c.o.s, for carrying out actual police duties. These troops were armed until after the War started with old sports rifles, single loading rifles, firing with very smoky powder.

The position was similar in the Cameroons, except that the protectorate troops and police troops were much smaller than in East Africa. The former amounted to 1550, and the latter to 1255 natives under a corresponding number of German officers and n.c.o.s.

German South West Africa was the only colony with white protectorate troops, amounting altogether to not quite 2000. In addition there were white police numbering 500-600. It is obvious that this small number of troops and police could only be intended for maintaining order in a territory far more than half as large again as Germany, with a not very numerous but difficult native population.

The other German colonies had no protectorate troops at all, but only small police troops, amounting in Togoland to 550 natives, in German New Guinea, including the widespread island territories, to 830 natives; Samoa, lastly, had only a small trained police troop (Fitafita) consisting of about 30 sons of chiefs, who were used for decorative purposes.

The small effectives of the troops existing in the German colonies show without any doubt that they were only used for the maintenance of order in the territory itself. The same result is obtained when these effectives are compared with those of the neighbouring foreign colonial territories. The German protectorate and police troops were entirely within the limits of those customary in British colonies with similar conditions, and were in some cases much lower than the effectives in French and Belgian colonies.

It is absurd to think that Germany would have tried to use these small troops, which in case of war would have been cut off from all supplies from home, for conquest in neighbouring territories.

When the Great War broke out and was extended to the colonies, there were neither sufficient troops nor arms nor ammunition in the German protectorates to put up an effective resistance in the long run to the greatly superior forces that poured in from all sides. The fact that so much was nevertheless achieved and that, in particular, the German East African troops were able to keep the field throughout the War is due, not only to the excellent German leadership and the support given to the coloured troops by the calling-up of German reservists, but mainly to the loyalty of the natives."

The above remarks should have made it sufficiently clear that the charge of militarisation of the German colonies is without foundation. Germany had no colonial army, no coloured troops outside the colonies, no compulsory levy of natives, and no arrangements which would have rendered possible the use of natives for other purposes than the maintenance of order and security in the colony to which they belonged.

That Germany had not more troops in her colonies than were required for internal order is clear from the unquestionable report by Dr. Solf, as contained in 1919 in his book: "Colonial Policy, my Political Testament" (page 53). He writes on his negotiations with the South African General Botha:

in the Colonies

"Botha then spoke of the natives in South West Africa and of a possible repetition of the rising. When I referred in this connection to a reduction of the protectorate troops which was desired by a section in our parliament, he gave an urgent warning against a reduction of the number of the protectorate troops below 2000, in the interest of the maintenance of order. He was also of opinion that one could never trust natives and should be constantly on the watch."

A further confirmation of the fact that Germany only kept as many troops in the colonies as were necessary to deal with local risings, is to be found in the book by the expert Brigadier General C. P. Fendal: "The East Africa Force 1915 to 1919":

"There was an idea that should war break out between England and Germany there would be no active fighting in Africa.... If was feared that the prestige of the white man would be lowered, and that the progress of civilization in Africa would be put back a hundred years. The prevalence of this idea led to the maintenance, both in British and German East Africa, of only sufficient troops to deal with local risings" (pp. 22—3).

The unpreparedness of Germany for the war in the colonies is also testified by an Englishman. Dr. Norman Leys, the writer of the book: "Kenya", wrote as follows in an article in the "New Leader" of August 24th, 1926:

"A month later (after the outbreak of War) I saw with my own eyes the poor devils of German Askaris use obsolete rifles firing with black powder, from which every cloud of smoke was a welcome target for our men who were armed with modern smokeless rifles. The proof that Germany did not intend war in Africa is as complete as the proof that the mandatory system was a mere cover under which three imperialistic Powers stole entire territories without a shadow of justice."

Proof can also be given from the French side as to the non-militarisation of the German colonies. This was confirmed, inter alia, by the French mandatory report for 1923 for the Cameroons addressed to the League of Nations, which says:

"The Germans had created no fixed organisations in the Cameroons which might be qualified as fortifications or as a military or naval base."

And what about the statement that the so-called "German militarism" had abused the natives under its protection? In connection with the charge of militarisation, merely two fitting proofs may be given. The American Herbert Adam Gibbons wrote as follows in his book "The New Map of Africa", which was published in 1916:

The ability of German officers in Cameroon and East Africa to command the loyalty of these native troops and the cooperation of the inhabitants of these two colonies is a big surprise to France and Great Britain, and disproves the thesis that the natives of the portions of Africa over which Germany ruled were eager to welcome British and French liberators.

Even the Times, which can hardly be charged with pro-German sentiments, wrote on December 12th, 1918, when the wave of hatred against Germany was at its height:

It is wrong to think that the natives on the outbreak of war were yearning for freedom.... One element may even prove to be a definite danger, namely the native German soldier whose absolute fidelity is remarkable."

The charge of militarism is a two-edged weapon for those who reproach Germany with it; they should read their own colonial history in order to learn to be silent. The militarism of the great colonial Powers has been so thoroughly described by their own nationals that this literature, if collected, would fill whole libraries. One of the saddest facts was the transportation of black soldiers to the European battlefields during the War. That these coloured troops did not take part in the War out of love for their country, may be sufficiently shown by one example. With regard to the levy of coloured troops during the War, M. Delafosse wrote as follows in the "Dépêche Coloniale et Maritime" on February 16th, 1922:

"Whether we like it or not, we are constrained to admit the fact that recruiting is generally unpopular in our colonies. During and since the war we have certainly succeeded, as a result of persistent efforts, in enlisting large numbers of natives; but in how many cases was the recruit really a volunteer? In certain districts, it is true, there were numbers of young folk who allowed themselves to be enlisted without complaint and even who came and enlisted voluntarily, but the older men looked askance at the matter. Indeed, repeated and strongly emphasized Orders and even forcible measures, were often necessary in order to make up the required contingents, not to speak of the cases in which the recruiting led to disturbances and risings several of which were of a serious nature. It is to be expected that the obligatory service will not be more favourably received by the natives than the volunteer recruiting."

Even the mandated territories have not been spared militarism. It is sufficient to refer to the sensational discussions which took place in the League of Nations, when France succeeded in recruiting natives in the mandated territories not only for police and military service for the internal security of these territories, but also, in using these troops for other territories. The Syrian rising in 1925 in the French mandated territory and the suppression of the Bondelzwarts with air bombs in South West Africa in 1922, moreover, showed sufficiently clearly what methods were used even by Mandatories after the War.

Those who are responsible for the present order of peace should not speak of the militarism of the Germans. In closing this chapter, we may quote the book by Ray Stannard Baker: Woodrow Wilson, who, as one of the best observers of the Paris negotiations of 1919, had to admit the following facts:

"It was the Prussian idea of force, of military sanctions and military methods that he (Wilson) was seeking to get away from — that had to be got away from before peace could be made. This was a part of the 'old order' that had caused the war; he was there to establish a 'new order'. They had hewn away, with stupendous effort, the head of the Prussian hydra, and here had grown new hydra-heads all over Europe. The old forces were ever here in the Peace Conference, trying to dispatch or at least influence the settlements....."

It was plain that the more vigorous the maintenance of the war feeling, the severer the peace terms could be made."

The dictated Peace of Versailles then gave the proof that the militarists had won the struggle against the political leaders in Paris.

tation of President Wilson's conception: "The stipulation is that in the case of the German colonies the title is to be determined after the conclusion of the War by 'impartial adjustment' based on certain principles. These are of two kinds: 1. 'Equitable' claims. 2. The interests of the populations concerned." Colonel House then referred specifically to Germany, and said: "What are the 'equitable' claims put forth by Germany? That she needs access to tropical raw materials, that she needs a field for the expansion of her population, that under the principles of peace proposed, conquest gives her enemies no title to her colonies."

Just as it is impossible for the Government of Great Britain to ignore, in the face of history, the solemn assurance it gave at the beginning of the World War that it did not wish to annex the German colonies, so it is equally impossible for the American people to ignore the solemn declarations made by their Chief Executive and his collaborator.

It was not the German Government that brought the war into the colonial territories. It was not the German Government that brought the colored peoples into the World War, an act the consequences of which we now see in the widespread unrest prevailing amongst the colored races. The Congo Act of 1885, in which England, France, Belgium and Germany participated, provided that the signatory Powers in case of war would renounce the use of the Congo Basin as a basis for war-like operations. On August 23, 1914, Germany suggested to her opponents that the colonies should be left out of the war. France and England did not follow this suggestion. They not only violated the Congo Act, but brought the war into the German colonies. Germany's entire colonial military power was only some 7,000 men in all the colonies put together. They had no significance other than to act as a police force for the maintenance of law and order. The inhabitants of the colonies were never used for German military purposes, whereas France brought over half a million colored soldiers and put them into the field against Germany. I make these preliminary remarks in order to show clearly that for Germany the colonial question is not to-day, any more than it was before, a question of Imperialism or Militarism. To this day it is still essentially a question of her economic existence.

In the golden age before the World War the problem of colonies and raw materials did not have the importance it has to-day. This is as true for Germany as for other countries. Before the War, Germany's world investments were in round figures 12,000 million dollars, the profits of which could be used to buy raw materials all over the world. The markets where raw materials were procured were completely free. Very seldom were the development and distribution of raw materials controlled by cartels, and on the rare occasions when raw materials were cornered the situation was only temporary. Long-term commercial treaties assured the freedom of international trade. All the important countries were on the gold standard, and this provided a sure basis for commercial calculations. Emigration and immigration, between the young countries and the old, was open and was looked on with favor.

All these elementary principles of international trade and intercourse have now disappeared. Strict regulations govern immigration into almost all the countries where formerly immigrants were welcome. The gold standard has been abandoned by nearly every country. Commercial treaties are concluded only for brief periods, and in their place have come quotas and restrictions, to say nothing of constant increases in more effective tariffs. German investments abroad have been taken away without compensation, and the markets where raw materials are to be procured are largely subject to the same restrictions that prevail in other fields of commerce. In recent years we have seen the results of this policy. World trade has fallen to almost one-third of its previous maximum. Credit machinery has ceased to function. Confidence in international payments has been extinguished. Every merchant and investor is chary of investments in foreign countries.

In view of the decline in international commercial relations, the more important countries have fallen into the habit of exploiting more intensively the economic territories at their disposal. Much is said nowadays to the effect that Germany is striving for autarchy. People entirely forget that this autarchy has long since been achieved by such countries as France and Great Britain, not to mention Russia and the United States. Autarchy can be easily achieved—in fact it naturally exists—in an economic region which is supplied with almost all raw materials, provided it enjoys the same monetary system throughout. The British devaluation would never have had the success which it achieved if Great Britain had not been able to bring the monetary system of the Dominions onto the same basis as her own. France could never have used her colonial empire so successfully if it had not been administered under the same monetary system as the mother country.

I should like to quote some figures to indicate the extent to which autarchy has progressed in the British and French Empires. The share of the British Dominions, colonies and protectorates in the imports of Great Britain rose during the last twelve years from about 31 to about 42 percent; and their share in British exports rose from about 41 to about 49 percent. The imports of France from her colonies increased in the last ten years from about 10 to about 26 percent, and her exports to the colonies increased from about 14 to about 32 percent. So vast is the geographical expanse of the United States of America, so enormous its wealth, that it is much less dependent than other countries on an exchange of goods with the outside world. In its natural wealth lies the explanation of the fact that its 125,000,000 people have only a ten percent share of the world's trade, whereas the 45,000,000 people of Great Britain have more than 14 percent. Of course the circumstances are even more favorable in Russia, which is not so developed and contains almost all kinds of raw materials.

As against these great national economic domains stand the countries with large populations but limited territories. Because of their inadequate land resources they are much more dependent than the others upon the international exchange of goods. These two kinds of countries have lately been classified as the "Haves" and the "Have-nots".

To their astonishment, statesmen have now become conscious of the fact that the British Empire has more than a quarter of the earth's surface at its disposal, and that one-quarter of the world's wheat, one-half of the world's wool and rubber, one-quarter of the world's coal, one-third of the world's copper and almost all the world's nickel is produced within the confines of that Empire. It was recently stated in the House of Lords that of an estimated twenty-five different varieties of essential raw materials, the British Empire was amply supplied in its own territory with no less than eighteen, was supplied to a certain extent in two cases, and was deficient only in five.

Germany, on the contrary, as the same speaker in the House of Lords pointed out, was sufficiently supplied by its own production in only four cases, was more or less adequately supplied in two, and was completely without supplies in nineteen. In Italy and Japan conditions are equally unfavorable. The speaker in the House of Lords appropriately added that, "in these circumstances it was not surprising that there was unrest in Germany, Japan and Italy; it was true that Great Britain was probably the most peace loving country in the world; that was because she had got all that she wanted." What is particularly interesting in this statement is the connection established by the speaker between the control of raw materials and the love of peace. He very rightly recognizes that a nation which is cut off from the essential necessities of life must be a source of unrest in the world.

Now, however, events have unfortunately occurred to make Germany's case very different from that of similarly situated countries like Japan and Italy. Despite the League of Nations and its alleged assurances of peace, Japan has meanwhile decided to help herself and has acquired Manchuria; while Italy, by the conquest of Abyssinia, has expanded the territory which she requires for her life. As a result, Japan and Italy are no longer amongst the unsatisfied nations. They have left the Have-nots and have joined the ranks of the Haves, those nations which are satisfied. Germany remains the lone unsatisfied large Power. So long, then, as the problem of colonial raw materials is not solved for Germany, so long will she remain a source of unrest despite all her love of peace. It is that love of peace which still permits her to entertain the hope that she can solve the colonial problem peacefully and that she can take her place in the ranks of the Haves.

In the year 1929, when the extension of ample credit to Germany still concealed her economic situation, and while the international gold standard still flourished, 4,400 million dollars out of the 5,630 million dollars which Germany paid for imports went for food stuffs, raw materials and semi-manufactured goods. In the year 1935, the import total had declined to 1,680 million dollars, of which 1,400 million dollars were devoted to food stuffs, raw materials and semi-manufactured goods. The extent to which German production has been throttled is obvious. Of the 1,400 million dollars spent for imports, 600 million were devoted to food stuffs alone, and only 800 million went for raw materials and semi-manufactured goods. Any such quantity of raw materials is far below what Germany normally needs to keep her industries going and maintain the standard of life of her people. The false dawn which foreign credits brought to Germany in 1925—1930 following the institution of the Dawes Plan, made way for cruel reality when this credit inflation ceased and the world economic crisis occurred. It is either silly or cynical, in the face of such facts, for foreign commentators to declare that Germany can buy raw materials in the world market at will. No, Germany cannot do that because she does not possess the means of paying for them in foreign currencies; and she does not possess the means because foreign countries do not consume enough of her wares.

In the circumstances, it can hardly be a matter of surprise that Germany should try to increase her ability to produce raw materials in her own country by forced and artificial means. We know very well that even if we succeed in replacing with artificial native products a number of raw materials normally supplied by the world market we can do this only at high cost. So we ought to reject autarchy on principle, because it will necessarily lead to a lowering of the standard of life of the German people. But we have no choice so long as political conditions do not permit German colonial activity. There will be no peace in Europe until this problem is solved. No great nation willingly allows its standard of life and culture to be lowered and no great nation accepts the risk that it will go hungry.

I should like to make perfectly clear that autarchy, whether natural or produced artificially, cannot possibly be an ideal. It is opposed to the general principles of civilization. Autarchy means isolation from the rest of the world. A reduction in commercial relations reduces the exchange of products of the intellect; the means of exchange in scientific, artistic and cultural fields are destroyed. A national economy based on the autarchic principle produces mental autarchy. As minds grow narrower there is an increase in the estrangement which has unfortunately existed between the great Powers for many years owing to political factors. Heretofore mankind has progressed only by means of the exchange of intellectual goods; and only by such an exchange can it resume a healthy development.

A considerable school of opinion holds that all that is needed is to restore the international exchange of goods. Germany's share will thus be increased, and she will again be able to purchase raw materials. These are the peoples who are always talking of free trade and the lowering of tariff walls. Everybody agrees with them, but no one has yet succeeded in translating their ideals into reality. The reason for this is very simple. It lies in the fact that a nation's economic strength plays an extraordinarily important part in determining its political situation. To-day the possession of raw materials has become a political factor, just as the voluntary change of the currency standard has become a political instrument. People think that by withholding or sharing raw materials the political situation of a political opponent or friend can be correspondingly influenced. This theory was sadly exemplified in the famous sanctions agreements of the League of Nations. It was imagined that by means of an economic boycott the political necessities of life could be denied a country, or deliberately limited. We saw the policy in operation against Italy. The Italian example proves that no nation with any claim to honor and worth will willingly submit to such a policy. For any nation to live at the mercy of another is a complete impossibility. The spirit which prompts the idea is not that of a League of Nations; it is not the spirit of peace. It is a spirit which drives nations apart and into war. A great nation that sees itself exposed to such a danger will employ all its powers to avoid it. No friend of peace can ever approve of measures intended to cut off great Powers from the natural treasures of the earth.

A particularly ridiculous charge to which Germany has often to listen in connection with her colonial demands is that colonies in general and her former colonies in particular are valueless, and that it would not do Germany any good if her colonies were returned to her. This immediately prompts the retort: If the colonies are so bad, why do you keep them? It is also misleading to refer to the minor part played by the colonies in Germany's pre-war foreign trade. I have already pointed out that before the War free trade prevailed on a large scale and that Germany had valuable resources in the form of foreign investments. Consequently, it was not necessary before the War for Germany to develop her colonies with particular energy. It nevertheless is astonishing what Germany did with her colonies before the War without any great effort. They had been in her possession, on the average, for only some twenty-five years, from the end of the eighties and the beginning of the nineties. But during those twenty-five years Germany did more with her colonies than other countries had done in two hundred and fifty years.

At the outbreak of the World War, that is, after two decades of German administration, the German colonies had ceased to be a burden on the mother country. In fact, the financial balance was so well established that even the colonial railway loans had been paid for by the earnings of the colonies. Only the seven thousand police troops were supported by the mother country. During the fifteen years before the war, the external trade of the German colonies had increased seven-fold. That happened in a time when Germany did not experience a scarcity of raw materials and foreign currency, in a time when world trade had not been interrupted by political and economic mistrust, in a time when the struggles of different currency systems were not being fought out, in a time, therefore, when Germany had no particular need to intensify her trade with her colonies. Today, when there no longer is free trade in the world, when Germany is crushed by foreign debts and harassed by the lack of raw materials and valuta, if her colonies were returned to her she would proceed to develop them with far greater intensity. A large part of the food supplies and raw materials which we now lack could be furnished by them.

Of course there are short-sighted people who declare that if Germany got back her colonies they would compete with the other countries which supply raw materials, to the disadvantage of these latter. This is simply the eternally recurring, short-sighted, unbusinesslike attitude of all those people who are constantly afraid of any new development. It was this attitude which found expression in England in the nineties, when it was said that every Englishman would be the richer if only Germany were crushed.

Even the stupidest person, I believe, would admit, to-day that the English are not richer by one penny because of the World War and the Versailles Treaty. Their trade has dwindled, like that of every other country, and their financial burdens have increased exactly like those of other nations. If Germany could expand economically by acquiring her own basis of raw materials, this could only contribute to the stimulation of world trade in general. It would help to increase consumption, promote prosperity, and raise the standard of life, not only of the German people, but of the entire industrial world. At no time in history did the prosperity of world trade reach such a peak as during the years of peace before the War, when the economic competition of all countries was vigorous. For example, trade between Great Britain and Germany was never so active as at the time before the War when these two countries were engaged in fair industrial competition.

In matters of foreign politics, the American people, despite their youth—or perhaps because of it—have for the most part shown a healthy, human, moral attitude. It is true that, for reasons which are gradually being seen in their true light, the American people joined in the war. But they rightly refused to ratify the Versailles Treaty, because it was an immoral treaty. I know very well, and I wish here to confess it openly, that many things that are happening in Germany to-day are not approved of by a large section of the American people. But may I, just as frankly, ask Americans this question: What would they themselves do, after having lost a war which they fought in the conviction that it was for their existence, if they then were oppressed for twenty long years by an unjust peace imposed by the victors, and on top of that were deprived by their opponents of the necessities of life?

The German people have been the torch-bearers of European culture for thousands of years, have been the model in every field of art, have produced the most creative figures in religion and in science. And this is the nation whose moral standing has been affronted and disparaged by its opponents for two decades! It is inconceivable that such treatment should not produce a profound reaction in the German people. Believe me, my American friends, when I say that this German people is still the same people that gave the world Luther and Goethe. For this reason it must and will live, for this reason it will continue to fight with all its strength for its place in the world.

Americans must not imagine that they can evade the moral responsibility laid on their shoulders by President Wilson. That this feeling of responsibility still exists in America is shown by the following statement by Colonel Edward M. House, the same man from whose Lyons wireless I have already quoted, and who recently wrote in Liberty as follows: "Every statesman will admit in private conversation that Germany, Italy and Japan need reservoirs into which to pour their man power and from which to draw those necessities and raw materials which nature denied them. But the great possessing nations—Great Britain, France, the United States and Russia—are unwilling to grant to their less fortunate fellows more than the crumbs that fall from their colonial table. Just as social peace cannot prevail without some adjustment of the capitalistic system, so international peace cannot be preserved without drastic territorial readjustments. Great Britain, France, Russia and the United States must receive Italy, Germany, and Japan on terms adjusted to present world conditions and recognize their insistence upon being given their proper part of the colonial resources of the world. Chaos and catastrophe will be upon us unless those that have among the Powers are willing to share in some way with those that have not."

The attitude towards German colonial needs has been modified a bit. In 1929, when I pointed out at the Young Conference that Germany's demand for colonies raised an essential condition for her economic survival, I was laughed at. But now a British minister, Sir Samuel Hoare, speaking before the League of Nations in September of last year, has come forward in favour of a redistribution of the means of access to the world's raw material resources. The precise propositions and intentions that may lie behind that general formulation have not yet been revealed.

I therefore wish to name two conditions essential to the solution of Germany's raw material problem. First, Germany must produce her raw materials on territory under her own management. Second, this colonial territory must form part of her own monetary system. Colonial raw materials cannot be developed without considerable investments. Colonial markets are not of the kind that can live by the personal needs of the native population. Shirts and hats for the negroes and ornaments for their wives do not constitute an adequate market. Colonial territories are developed by the building of railways and roads, by automobile traffic, radio and electric power, by huge plantations, etc. From the moment that the German colonies came under the control of the Mandate Powers, Germany was cut off from the delivery of goods required for such investments. In 1913, for example, Germany's exports to Tanganyika formed 52.6 percent of that area's imports. In 1935 they formed 10.7 percent. The British Mandate Power as a matter of course places its orders in England and not in Germany or elsewhere. That is the reason why Germany needs colonial territories which she herself administers. Since, however, the development of colonies depends upon long term investments, and these investments cannot be made by the native negro population, the German currency system must prevail in the colonial territories, so that the required investments may be made with German credits. These, then, are Germany's two basic demands in the colonial field: that she have territories under German management and included in the German monetary system.

All the other questions involved—sovereignty, army, police, law, the churches, international collaboration—are open to discussion. They can all be solved by means of international co-operation so long as nothing unworthy is imputed against the honor of Germany. The German colonial problem is not a problem of imperialism. It is not a mere problem of prestige. It is simply and solely a problem of economic existence. Precisely for that reason the future of European peace depends upon it.

Extract from Dr. Schacht's Speech at the Centenary Celebrations of the Association for Geography and Statistics at Frankfort o. M., on December 9th, 1936

"It may surprise you that a man like myself connected with finance and economics should take part in the jubilee celebrations of an association dealing exclusively with geography and statistics. But I considered that this might be an opportunity of using dry though irrefutable figures in order to give a picture of the economic position in which Germany is situated from the geographical and demographical point of view. The necessity of such a review arises out of the general conviction that the peaceful development of Europe to a very great extent depends upon whether Germany and the German people can look forward to a secure social and economic development or not.

We are constantly obliged to note to our astonishment that many people abroad, while taking exception to our mental outlook and wishing to consider us as outsiders with whom no discussion is possible, have never taken the trouble to inquire as to the reason for this mental outlook which appears to them to be so foreign. The reason is simply that we are a country which has too large a population on too small a space, and this fact weighs us down like an incubus.

In a recent conversation on this fact with a foreign diplomat in Berlin, this philanthropist gave me the advice that the German people should reduce the number of births. This view, which we meet elsewhere in Anglo-Saxon quarters, is in contradiction with the most primitive principles of the divine world order, and, if we had not had so many bitter experiences, it would be surprising to find such views emanating in particular from a country which in other respects attaches great importance to religious ideas and sentiments. It is only the irony of fate that that same country is one of those that possess possibly the most space and the greatest possibilities of life. I consider the arbitrary restriction of an increase in population as a crime against God and nature so long as the world as a whole offers possibilities of subsistence for the people who live in it. But it is not a fact that the world no longer possesses such possibilities, though their utilisation is hindered by political conditions in respect of possessions.

As a matter of fact in the last few decades Germany has experienced a decline in the birth rate which was particularly acute in the years after the War. The necessary external influences which the War and its consequences were bound to bring to our nation as to other nations in respect of an increase in population were unavoidable, but the German nation is not prepared to accept arbitrary external pressure which destroys its vital force.

It must be pointed out here that any attempt to cause a shrinkage in a great nation by lasting external pressure must necessarily lead to social distress and disturbance and ultimately to an explosion. The foreign satesmen who attempt to explain the European problem to-day by the motto: "Here democracy, here Fascism" or the like, entirely overlook the fundamental problem. It is not a decisive factor whether the nations eat their fill under democracy or under Fascism. The decisive factor is that they should eat their fill. It is easier to influence the mental outlook of a satisfied nation than a hungry nation. Peace in Europe, and consequently of the whole world, depends upon whether the dense populations of Central Europe obtain for themselves a possibility of living or not."

Dr. Schacht then turned to the rise in the average age of the people, the density of the population and the question whether the nations have properly utilised the space at their disposal, and then showed the extent to which Germany had tried by means of intensive cultivation of the soil, to extract the maximum possible for her subsistence from the reduced area which still remained to her. Germany had extracted everything possible from her soil at an enormous outlay of capital and labour. The results of the last three years had proved that the limit attained in 1933 could not be exceeded. The German could not obtain all the food required by the German nation from the existing German soil.

The case was quite different with our European neighbours. If the soil of our neighbours, which was known to be considerably better and more favoured by climate, was cultivated in the way we had been compelled to cultivate ours, the products would be increased in France by a third to a half, in Poland by a half to three-quarters, and in Russia would be doubled or trebled. This calculation leaves out of account the areas which could be but have not been hitherto cultivated and which are still available especially in Poland and Russia.

"I need not go into the serious lack of materials for Germany's industrial requirements. Germany is not only dependent on imports of foodstuffs from abroad, but is inadequately supplied with raw materials for her entire industry. We have adequate supplies only of coal, potash, and nitrogen. There is either a restricted supply or a total lack of materials in the case of iron and almost all base metals, petroleum and phosphates, wool, hides, timber, rubber, and cotton. As Germany possesses no supplies or possibilities of production of these materials abroad, she is compelled to purchase all these goods by means of her export trade.

In the report by the Director of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1936, the following clear opinion is expressed: 'So long as industrial States can dispose of their goods without restriction abroad, they can purchase the raw materials required by their industry; but if their foreign markets are closed, they can no longer obtain the necessary foreign exchange in order to keep their factories working and to employ their labour.' It can naturally not be expected that an international, though politically bound, organisation should enter into the reasons for these facts and the necessary means of changing them, but I think no one at present will dispute the fact that a country cannot be deprived of all its foreign revenue earning property and all its colonial possessions and in addition be loaded with enormous debts to foreign countries, without bringing such a country's balance of payments to a state of hopeless collapse. But this was done to Germany. The statement by the above mentioned Geneva Labour Conference is, however, of importance, since it rightly points out that, even under normal conditions, if an industrial State is to maintain itself it must have a secure foreign market. This raises a great problem that endangers the peace of Central Europe and which must be frankly discussed here.

The fossil free traders who have not yet observed that the world economic position necessarily changes from time to time, continue to state that all Germany has to do is to sell sufficient goods abroad at cheap prices in order to buy all the raw materials she requires. This view is a foolish one. Everyone knows that there is not a single civilised country in the world that now subscribes to the principle that goods should be purchased where they are cheapest. This might have been possible when Adam Smith wrote his book on the Wealth of Nations. At present the position is that every Government must first see that its own population has work and is employed. So long as Adam Smith's theory did not conflict with the necessity of providing work, all was well. As soon as industrial development raised the problem of the provision of work, Adam Smith had to be scrapped. It is a fact in economic policy that people must not conform to theories, but theories to people; in other words Adam Smith is beaten by hard facts.

German foreign trade finds itself prevented by the measures of the other Governments from selling its goods to the desired extent in foreign countries. This does not apply only to the present. It will always be a fact that the foreign trade of a country depends not only on the capacity of the country itself but also on the will of the buying markets. Since the War, however, we have learned what an instrument of power economic policy can be in international conflicts. I will not on this occasion enter into the moral aspect of all these questions, but the conclusion must be drawn that the maintenance of the freedom of food and raw materials of a great nation is, in the view prevailing among certain foreign diplomats, to be made dependent on the charity which a few predominant powers can distribute or not at their discretion. It should be clear to any politician that this conclusion cannot be freely accepted by any great, self-conscious nation. If League and other idealists nevertheless still exist who think that the foreign market should in some way be guaranteed to an industrial State provided it promises to conform with certain desires of foreign Powers, the answer must be that, in view of the diversity of the economic and political relations of the countries of the world, there is no reason to attribute evil intentions or even stupidity, in order to show that the execution of such an idea is absurd. Even if all the leading statesmen showed the best will and possessed the greatest intelligence, they could never ensure that the markets of the world would always be kept open for an adequate assimilation of German goods. Economic and demographic conditions, technical and traffic relations and developments in various parts of the world are so completely incalculable that no Power in the world could give a guarantee for the execution of such an alleged ideal.

Before the War Germany had made provision for her future supply of food and raw materials by acquiring her colonies in Africa and Oceania, a territory five times as large as Germany with only about 13 million inhabitants. Mr. Amery, the former Secretary of State for the British Dominions, dealt some months ago with the demand for the return of the German Colonies and stated that a return of the colonies would not help Germany. I will not go to the opposite extreme and state that a satisfactory settlement of the colonial question would at one stroke conjure away all Germany's needs in respect of raw materials. But what the British expert entirely overlooks is that before the War Germany possessed, in addition to her colonies, revenue-earning establishments abroad to a value of 30,000 million gold marks. She possessed a flourishing foreign trade with all accessory branches of industry, such as shipping, insurance, credit institutes etc. The markets of the world were open and for the most part secured by long-term commercial treaties. There were no restrictions on emigration. For all these reasons, Germany could purchase her raw materials on the world market and had no incitement to force the development of her own colonial possessions or to emigrate to them.

But all that has now changed. If the colonies were not now withheld from Germany she would take up the development of supplies of colonial raw materials with the greatest energy by means of German labour and capital and credit in German currency and would obtain infinitely more foodstuffs and raw materials from them than is at present the case under mandatory rule in spite of the development which has taken place. Naturally the development of the colonies will take some time. But it must be pointed out that, with modern technical appliances, development can be brought about much more quickly than was the case previously. Even in the present situation, therefore, the colonies would bring about an immediate alleviation of the German position in respect of raw materials, and the effect would be very rapidly increased in the course of years. Even the present exports of vegetable oils and fats from the German colonies cover about a quarter of our annual requirements of these materials. In respect of timber there would be a possibility of very considerably alleviating the position immediately. These are not merely baseless hopes but actual facts.

To sum up, Germany has insufficient space for her population. She has made every effort, and certainly much greater efforts than any other nation to extract from that restricted space what she requires for her living conditions. But, in spite of all these efforts, the space is inadequate. The lack of industrial raw materials is even greater than that of foodstuffs. The existence of the German nation cannot be ensured by any kind of commercial political agreements. The allotment of colonial territory is the real solution of the existing difficulties."

The German Standpoint on the Question of Colonies

By General Ritter von Epp, Reich Governor of Bavaria

"Europäische Revue", September 1936

The German people live in a Territory which is extremely restricted compared to its population, and does not produce the raw materials that have become essential to existence. The Treaty of Versailles deprived Germany of her entire Colonial possessions, as well as of the possibility of acquiring the necessary raw materials with her own currency. In comparison with the colonial possessions of other countries, Germany to-day can only be regarded as occupying a secondary position. Even in 1914 Germany, with colonial areas $5\frac{1}{2}$ times the size of the Mother Country, ranked after many smaller nations. England was already in possession of an empire 105 times larger than Great Britain. Belgium's colonies were 80, Holland's 60, France's 22 times the area of the Homeland.

The fact that Germany was cut off from the possibility of importing necessary raw materials from colonies which she could call her own, has had particularly tragic results, the more tragic indeed because the density of Germany's population (Germany being numerically the biggest European nation after Russia) has made an intensive industrialisation of the country essential in order to feed her people.

Any government which is conscious of its responsibility, must regard it as one of its chief duties to provide its people with food and work. The carrying out of this duty has been made even more difficult than the other countries which possess colonies by the Treaty of Versailles, which imposed an enforced administration on the former German possessions. It should also not be forgotten that the rising standard of living which began to be prevalent in Germany before the War, is to be attributed to the possession and exploiting of colonies.

In order to restore her economic life, Germany is essentially in need of territories which shall, at the same time, produce raw materials and in which her own money shall be legal tender. We are neither willing nor able to accept a position of inferiority compared to other countries. We must be able to make the necessary purchases of raw materials with our own money. For, in consequence of the policy of reparations, we have been subjected to a constantly increasing drain on our reserves of foreign currencies, which makes it difficult for us to buy anything that must be paid for in foreign money. This trend has become even more marked through the attempts of the rest of the world to become self-sufficing, attempts which made it increasingly difficult for Germany to export her wares.

In the most favourable event, Sir Samuel Hoare's proposal for summoning an international conference to deal with the distribution of raw materials could only, even if the proposal was actually carried out, provide Germany with additional territories from which to obtain what she needs; it does not, however, attempt to meet German demands for colonies in which her own currency would be legal tender. Hence, proposals of this kind, however well intentioned they may be, cannot provide the relief which German economic life, labouring as it does under manifold disadvantages, so urgently needs.

Other quarters have attempted to classify various states into "Haves" and "Have-nots," and it is hardly necessary to add that Germany was included among the latter. Certain foreign periodicals have attributed the most incredible intentions to Germany as a "Have-not" country, which was determined to obtain possession of colonies by hook or by crook, and these insinuations have led to widespread unrest. Political suspicion increased considerably, not only in France but in smaller countries such as Belgium and Portugal. In addition, as a result of these repeated statements made in the foreign press about Germany's intention to annex colonies by forcible means, other countries which had hitherto not been active in colonial matters, suddenly began to take an interest in the question.

It cannot be stated too emphatically that Germany would never defy world-wide public opinion by annexing foreign territories. On the contrary, when Germany brings up the question of colonies she is thinking only of her own possessions which the Treaty of Versailles arbitrarily placed under the enforced control of the League of Nations, for the latter in its turn to hand them over to the present mandatory powers. The German colonial movement aims at nothing more than the removal of this enforced control and the restoration to Germany of the right of free disposal over her own colonial possessions. It follows that no other state will be injured in its territorial status by Germany's demand for her due.

It should not be difficult to meet Germany's colonial demands. The Treaty of Versailles has lost much of its importance as a political guiding principle. It has grown to be a harmful factor in international life because it offends against the very foundations of justice, confidence and authority. The day is bound to come when the wrong done to Germany under paragraph 119 of the Treaty of Versailles will be righted. The "colonial-guilt-lie" which served as a pretext for depriving Germany of her possessions, is already admitted to be the untruth it really is. Important foreign authorities (I need only recall the name of General Hertzog, the South African Premier) have formally withdrawn the charge that Germany is unfit to colonise.

The following juridical arguments which underlie Germany's demand for the return of her colonies have hardly yet been mentioned at all in public controversy abroad. The fact that the Signatory Powers to the Congo Treaty had solemnly undertaken in paragraph 11 not to extend an European war to Central African colonies is in itself proof that to have taken Germany's colonies away from her was an act of grave injustice. This circumstance explains how it was that Dr. Solf, Secretary of State for the Colonies, could telegraph to German East Africa as late as on August 2nd, 1914, that the colonies were not endangered and that the settlers would not be molested. It was not any act of Germany's which ran counter to this paragraph 11 of the Congo Treaty, but, on the contrary, a British cruiser which started hostilities in German East Africa on 5th August. This act of war was contrary to the Treaty stipulations by which the European Powers had undertaken not to drag their colonies into the fray even in the case of war, but rather to guarantee the colonial status quo for the time being.

If this were not sufficient proof of the injustice of depriving Germany of her colonies, yet another reason can be given. Germany only gave her assent to the preliminary treaty of peace officially entered into on November 5th, 1918, because she believed that President Wilson's fourteen points would be maintained and that the note of the American State Secretary, Lansing, of November 5th, 1918, would be the juridical foundation of peace negotiations. Wilson's fifth point provided for a free, open-minded and absolutely impartial solution of all colonial aspirations. This was subsequently nullified by Article 119 of the Treaty of Versailles, for Germany was forced to renounce all her rights to her overseas possessions.

It is, moreover, impossible to justify the contention that the taking over of the German colonies was a veiled form of annexation to which the country must submit as one of the consequences of having lost the War, for the actual value of these colonies was not taken into consideration when the amount of Reparations was fixed. Consequently, Germany has never ceased to consider that the demand for the return of her former colonial territories is a matter of right.

It is a contradiction in terms to pretend, as has often been done recently, that owing to her racial legislation at home, Germany has proved herself incapable of educating alien races and administering their wealth. Exhaustive studies in the field of biology have enabled Germans to ascertain to their satisfaction that every race possesses its own characteristics differing essentially from those of other races. The point of Germany's racial legislation is precisely to respect and encourage, as well as to assist, the development of these characteristics within her own borders. However, Germany has no intention of interfering with the racial affairs of Native peoples. We are simply anxious to prevent the intrusion of foreign racial elements into our population and this on racial grounds. Those who think this a reason for denying Germany's capacity to govern Native peoples ought rather to examine the history of many another nation which boasts of its talent for colonising. It will be sufficient to mention the extermination of the inhabitants of the Marquesas Islands and the other Maori populations of the South Seas; or to turn to the disappearance of the Indians in North America and in Canada; or, finally, to remember the concentration camps provided for the Boers until the latter became reconciled to England's interests. In this connection it may be observed that it was not a particularly glorious page in the history of the World War that the Allies should have encouraged black men to destroy white, quite apart from the fact that such a course of action damaged the prestige of Europeans beyond repair in every other continent.

Germany has rightly realised that honour is the sacred possession of a nation, and that no people can tolerate a permanent inroad on its honour. To-day, Germany is considered to be on an equal footing with other nations and, consequently, she claims the right to co-operate in the education of backward peoples on account of Article 22 of the Covenant.

According to the text of this article those territories which are already subject to the sovereignty of other states are not included in the scheme of cultural development from which Germany cannot be excluded. It follows that we can only fulfil our share of these duties in our own colonies, and not in those belonging to other countries, such as, say, Portugal, Holland, or Belgium. This point of view is the more valid since Germany cannot prejudice her protest against the injustice done to her, by unjust coveting of other people's possessions.

If the colonial injustice were righted, Germany would be able to absorb in time the rest of her unemployed. Her economic life would receive a stimulus which would ultimately make itself felt internationally. Frozen credits could more easily be made liquid again owing to the renewed flexibility of the German financial market. Economic improvement in its turn would help to ease political tension. It will thus be realised that the solving of the German colonial question would mean a real contribution towards the recovery of Europe, both commercially and politically. Even in the territories at present under mandate, their restoration would mean the stable conditions essential to ordered progress. More than that, it should appeal to the white race in its entirety to strengthen its position in dealing with world-wide political problems by the inclusion of Germany.

The sooner Germany's juridical and moral demands for colonial justice are satisfied, the sooner she will contribute her share in upholding European possessions the world over and in fulfilling the obligations they entail. England is by no means the last country to be interested in the decision as to whether Germany can meet her obligations as an European nation.

This decision should not be difficult to arrive at so far as the British people are concerned, for the Anglo-German Naval Treaty has proved that, granted good will, the adjustment of the interests of these two great nations is no mere Utopian aspiration.

The Supply of Raw Materials and the Colonies

Extract from a speech by Dr. Rudolf Eicke, Director of the Reichsbank (1936)

I. The Supply of Raw Materials by means of Exports

The supply of raw materials for industry is at present one of the central points of German economic policy. The great extension of the scope of our industry calls for a vast consumption of industrial raw materials. While formerly the public provision of employment claimed the greatest interest, it is now the provision of the material required by our economic policy which involves important tasks. With the change-over from economic measures calling rather for intensive labour and the execution of building programmes to works calling more intensively for materials, the question of raw materials begins to play an increasingly important part among the means of employment.

The lack of a secure and regular supply of raw materials for great industrial nations has for some time been a source of constant anxiety and uncertainty throughout the world. Only few great countries are in a position, in view of their own rich sources of raw materials or of large receipts from foreign capital, to satisfy their demands for raw materials without restriction. Countries with large capital, such as the United States, Great Britain, France, Holland, Belgium, the Scandinavian States and Switzerland, have at the present time in practice the preference in the purchase of raw materials on account of their good capacity of payment. Many nations, on the other hand, have difficulty in covering even their most essential needs. These countries, which include Germany, Italy and many medium-sized and small States, in view of the difficulties of payment, often obtain only what it has been impossible to dispose of elsewhere.

Germany has no longer at her disposal large surplus amounts of foreign exchange which she can use for the purchase of overseas raw materials beyond the amount obtained from her exports. Before the War, Germany had a flourishing foreign economy of her own in a free world trade. German foreign investments to the amount of approximately 25,000 million Marks brought in 1,000 million Marks in interest per year; German services, in particular shipping and insurance undertakings, produced great profits. These receipts could be used for the great imports of raw materials and colonial products. Germany was deprived by the Versailles Treaty of the greatest part of her foreign investments. When it is remembered that most of the large European countries at present still possess considerable resources in foreign exchange from their capital investments and services, which they are able to use for purchasing overseas raw materials, the specially difficult position of Germany is made clear. There has hitherto been no case in the world, in which an industrial State is able to establish its balance of trade merely by means of the export of industrial products, to purchase raw materials and in addition to pay off its debts.

Germany's present difficulties in obtaining supplies of raw materials are by no means due to the new German economic policy. On the contrary, National Socialism has in this respect succeeded to a poor inheritance. German industry was greatly shaken economically and financially by the War. Before the War, Germany, in accordance with the rapid increase in her population and the general extension of the world market, adapted herself so intensively to the international exchange of commodities, that until the outbreak of the War from a quarter to a third of her industrial net production was intended for export, and from three to four millions of the ten million industrial workers were engaged in export trade, while a considerably greater portion were dependent on the import of the foreign raw materials necessary for the internal market. At that time the German economic structure was definitely that of an industrial creditor country with great import requirements of raw materials and a great export surplus of manufactured goods, with a balance of trade which was on the whole passive and of which the deficit was covered by the yield of the growing capital investments abroad. With the unhappy outcome of the War the economic structure of Germany was greatly changed. Germany was deprived in the east and west of important territories which were of considerable value as sources of raw materials. The colonies were declared as mandates of individual League Powers and were thus withdrawn from German administration. The extensive German capital abroad was for the most part lost. German economy was to a great extent deprived at the end of the War of gold, foreign exchange and stocks of raw materials.

The economic rise in the post-inflation years was purely due to borrowed money, since foreign credits amounting to over 25,000 million Reichsmarks came to Germany and again set our economic life in motion. By means of these enormous foreign loans, German economy received an influx of foreign exchange, which was partly used as a currency reserve and also served for laying in stocks of raw materials. In so far as the borrowed foreign exchange was not used for paying the high tribute, it

Salvarsan, Germanin, Neostibosan, Fuadin, Plasmoquin, Atebrin — all these are German therapeutic products which have a brilliant place in the forefront of the struggle against tropical diseases. German bacteriologists, with Robert Koch at their head, have played a leading part in the discovery of the infection and transmission agents of malaria, sleeping sickness and relapsing fever. The great part played by German science in international studies of tropical medicine is firmly established and unreservedly admitted. German injections render possible the cure of 95 to 100 per cent of cases of sleeping sickness. The mortality from the sub-tropical disease Kala-azar has been reduced as a result of Neostibosan from 98 to 2 per cent. The terrible disease known as Oriental boil, which is current in Egypt and the countries of the Mediterranean littoral, has been fought with striking success by means of the German drug Fuadin. As a means of combating amoebic dysentery, a dangerous disease extremely common in the tropics and sub-tropics, the Hamburg Tropical Institute evolved the so-called Yatren 105, which every tropical schoolboy (so to say) knows. The incalculable value of these ingenious discoveries, which will always constitute one of Germany's services to humanity, is apparent in the work of the German laboratories of Bayer (Leverkusen) and others in connection with the campaign against malaria through the production of the synthetic drugs Atebrin and Plasmoquin. With their aid that scourge of the human race, malaria, from which a third of the human race is still at the present time afflicted, is being for the first time effectively held in check.

No one is entitled to belittle the service of German science in this connection. The enthusiastic recognition of the work of German doctors and researchers, and the fact that colonial countries — in spite of imitations — are the first to procure these drugs from Germany, is confirmation of the international reputation of German tropical medicine. The development of the tropical regions of the world has been fundamentally altered by the triumph of German tropical medicine and chemistry. Germany is the author of a revolution in hygiene in tropical countries, which is fraught with blessings. Is it not unfair permanently to exclude the real benefactor from the scene of his benefits?

returned to foreign countries, when the foreign credits were called off in 1930, for import and other purposes. The international credit machinery became more and more blocked in recent years. Even the use of normal import credits, the so-called documentary credits, became constantly more difficult, especially as the Reichsbank was deprived by the disappearance of its currency reserves of a sufficient fund for manoeuvring these credits. Germany, from being one of the greatest creditor countries in the world, became the principal debtor country, and her purchasing power was affected in a manner which was bound to give rise to difficulties in supplying the vital raw materials and foodstuffs. The raw material troubles of the first post-war years, which we regarded at that time as non-recurring and thought we had overcome for good, recurred with the exhaustion of the foreign sources of credit and the depression in world trade. The raw materials question of to-day is therefore not a new one, but is the raw material problem of yesterday. The definite economic settlement of the War has not proved possible in the last twenty years. National Socialist economic policy, which aims at bringing health to German economy from within, has consequently had a hard struggle from the outset in foreign economy.

This development shows at the same time how extremely important it is, by increasing exports as the principal source of foreign exchange still remaining to Germany for covering her great import requirements, to make the position safe in respect of raw materials and foodstuffs. All the other receipts of foreign exchange are at present of less importance for import purposes. Capital transactions still call for the transfer of considerable amounts of interest to foreign countries, amounting last year to about 250 million Reichsmarks. It is true that the services show a favorable balance in respect of shipping and insurance; but the amount is not considerable and is offset by payments of foreign exchange for other purposes, such as commission, travelling expenses, assistance, the maintenance of official and private agents abroad etc. While foreign countries still state that Germany can export as much as she likes and use the proceeds from such exports in order to purchase raw materials on the world market, the actual attitude of foreign countries is in striking opposition to such statements. German efforts to export are rendered difficult by very many factors over which foreign countries are in a position to exercise a decisive influence. The industrial competitors of Germany are trying by every means to increase their output as much as possible, whatever the effect on Germany. The competition between the various industrial countries, Germany, England, United States, France, Belgium and Japan, has enormously increased in recent years. The devaluation of the currency in a number of countries in practice means nothing more than that export goods are almost given away. In addition to competition by devalued currency and the difficulties caused by quotas and customs duties, there is also open or concealed political pressure. Certain quarters in the world try to make their influence felt everywhere and to create obstacles wherever Germany is taking up the threads, just because they do not like the way Germany is setting her house in order. In addition there is the business lost in Russia and America.

A great obstacle to the development of our foreign trade has also been caused by the great German lack of foreign exchange, which has to a great extent brought our foreign trade into the rigid limits of barter, clearing arrangements and compensation.

Foreign means of payment which can be freely used, the so-called cash foreign exchange, are only received by Germany at present to the extent of barely 20% of her exports. German foreign trade has been enclosed in a strait waistcoat in which it has difficulty in moving. The natural structure of our foreign trade, which consists in paying for overseas raw materials with the considerable traditional surplus of foreign exchange from trade with the European countries, by far our greatest markets, is thereby adversely affected. On the whole, Europe has to provide the foreign exchange required by overseas countries, a fact which is due to the natural position of the overseas markets which supply cheap raw materials and the European markets which require manufactured goods of high quality. In addition, restrictions have been placed on the free initiative of German foreign traders under the pressure of our foreign exchange position, and these restrictions continue to exist despite all efforts towards a more elastic arrangement of clearing and a more reasonable development of compensation transactions. International trade needs to be freed from the fetters of the present compulsory system, so that it can again work properly. The first condition for this, however, is the restoration of peaceful and reasonable political relations in the world. In the present development of international trade and means of payment, it has only been possible for Germany to maintain and in some cases slightly to extend her export trade by means of the greatest encouragement of exports and great price sacrifices.

If Germany were to devalue her currency, as foreign countries have often proposed, the result would be fresh competition for the lowest price. The other industrial countries which at present oppose the German endeavour to export, would certainly not lay down their arms in face of a devalued German currency. Foreign countries would rather reply to such a measure on the part of Germany by further reductions in price. The great colonial Powers would in the first place continue to reserve their markets for their own industrial products, and would endeavour by every means to defend their position in the other world markets that are secured by treaty. The price dynamics of currency devaluation could contain possibilities of success for German exports only in so far as there are still open doors in the world, but such success could not be obtained in a world economy which is highly independent of price laws and is ruled by duties and quotas. There is therefore no guarantee that German exports can be increased in this manner or that the supply of raw materials can be facilitated.

The foreign trade of the Reich has hitherto been the weakest point in the upward movement of the entire economy.

The main object of exports is at present to obtain the necessary raw materials for internal trade. All other factors, including the employment of the people directly engaged in exports are secondary matters. In case of emergency they could be employed in other industries. But so long as a State, as is the case in Germany, can obtain only a part of its raw materials within its own frontiers, it is dependent on its export trade bringing in at least as much foreign exchange as is necessary for the purchase of the raw materials required for its vital needs.

The governmental regulation of our foreign trade is solely a result of our lack of foreign exchange, which has made it necessary to adapt the import permits to the available foreign exchange in accordance with the New Plan, in order to prevent the occurrence of unsettled new debts and not to allow this cause to endanger the stability of the Reichsmark.

II. Colonies as Sources of Raw Materials

Any investigation into the supply of raw materials for German industry cannot be complete without touching on the colonial question. It sounds very contradictory when the statement is now made in the world that the colonies have no economic value for Germany and that consequently their seizure is not of much importance. The very opposite is the case. In a thickly populated, industrialised country like Germany, industry would be substantially facilitated by colonial possessions. The problem of supplying Germany would be very much simpler, if she could produce in territory under her own sovereignty and with the same currency a considerable part of the principal raw materials required by industry and the substances necessary for daily life, instead of having to purchase them abroad in foreign currency. The German distress in respect of raw materials and foreign exchange is to a great extent a German colonial distress.

Germany's desire to regain her colonies is not a frivolous striving for power at the cost of others, but is a result of the thirst for sources of raw materials and a very natural desire on the part of a nation that cannot live permanently in a restricted space.

Apart from Germany there is no Great Power without overseas possessions. The significance of the British world Empire is based mainly on its early colonial policy. The Americans have at great expense laid down rubber plantations in Liberia in order to be able to influence prices on the world market. Japan went to Korea and Manchuria, France took what she could get in North Africa, Italy gained Abyssinia in addition to her old possessions. Everywhere we find the striving to settle one's people on soil which has hitherto belonged to others, in order to produce raw materials with one's own labour and capital and thus to improve the supplies for the home industry. But while the whole world acts on such principles and in accordance with such views, no comprehension is shown for our endeavours. The constant German demand for the return of the colonies is the best proof of the love of peace of the German Government and the German nation; for in case of war, as the Great War proved, colonies can scarcely be of much use to us.

As is proved by valuable and thorough investigations made by well known colonial experts, the German colonies which are at present under foreign mandate are capable of producing a considerable portion of the German requirements of raw materials, if they are properly exploited. The African colonies are tropical countries five times the size of Germany, inhabited by a native population which has proved by its former achievements that it is capable under guidance by white men of producing considerable quantities of raw materials. The great dependence of Germany on imports of ores and of tropical raw materials, especially oil seeds and fibres could be substantially reduced by the production in the German colonies which was rapidly increasing before the War.

The German requirements of fat can be for the most part covered by the production of oil seeds in the German colonial territories. In the opinion of Geheimrat Schmidt of the Colonial Economic Committee, there is enough suitable land in the Cameroons, Togoland and German East Africa to cover Germany's supply of important fat raw materials, such as palm oil, palm kernels, ground nuts and soya beans. If the South Sea territories, which are important suppliers of products of the cocoanut palm, are included, it would probably be possible to cover almost entirely the requirements of cocoanut oil and copra.

The production of rubber in German East Africa and the Cameroons is possible to an extent that might make Germany independent of supplies from other countries. According to estimates by Geheimrat Schmidt, almost all the present requirements could be covered by the areas available in the Cameroons alone. In addition, the vast forests of the German colonies contain reserves which could supply considerable quantities of rubber at prices which are certainly far below those of artificial rubber.

The German requirements of textile raw materials, such as wool, cotton, hemp, flax and jute, can to a great extent be covered in the former German colonies with their rich possibilities of production. According to the opinion of experts, about 40 % of the German requirements of cotton could be covered by production in the German colonies, which appears to be very promising. The production of sisal hemp already exceeds German needs and represents an important export factor, since the area of cultivation can be greatly extended. Though the great German requirements of wool cannot be covered in the colonies in the near future, there is a possibility of greatly increasing the production by means of suitable hydraulic works for promoting sheep farming. The same applies to the by-products of cattle breeding, i. e. the production of the raw materials of the leather industry, hides and skins.

According to the investigations of Geheimrat Range, the well known Berlin geologist, our old Protectorates justify the highest hopes from the point of view of mining. Much that appeared to be a Utopia before the War, such as the extraction of iron ore in Africa, has already become a reality in other colonial territories. Moreover the production of copper, tin and gold holds prospects for the future. There is no doubt as to the occurrence of light metals and coal. If it were possible to proceed to the mining development of these new countries with greater energy than the present mandatories, valuable mineral resources would undoubtedly be explored.

In addition, the colonies are suited for supplying us with large quantities of timber, especially of the finer kinds, as they did before the War. The guaranteed supply of timber is of importance for all European countries, as the existing supply of European timber for the manufacture of paper and cellulose will possibly only last for another twenty years. If no other raw material of equal value has been found by that time, this may involve great danger for the coniferous forests of the civilised countries. This gives special importance to the rich tropical stocks of timber.

Lastly, the colonies offer rich possibilities for planting cocoa, coffee, tea, bananas and lemons, products which a modern civilised State can now no longer dispense with. Germany's total requirements of cocoa and tea can be covered by our colonies; in the tropical parts of the colonies there is abundance of suitable soil. The planting of coffee in particular, can be greatly increased. German East Africa and the Cameroons already supply good qualities. The possibility of entirely supplying Germany with southern fruits from our colonial territories is specially worthy of notice. The banana is of special importance; the Cameroons alone offer sufficient possibilities of cultivation to cover our entire previous import requirements of bananas. There are also certain possibilities of planting tobacco.

In view of their climatic conditions and soil, the German colonies thus represent an important basis of raw materials. The fact that these territories were not productive before the War and are even now not very remunerative is due to the colonising work which is still lacking. Before the War Germany had only just begun their exploitation, and the Mandatory Powers have had no economic need to continue this development according to plan. Naturally the exploitation of the natural resources of the colonies can only be carried out gradually; the plant and the plantations must first be created. "Colonising" means in the first place hard work—but work which undoubtedly gives a remunerative yield. After getting back our colonies, it would be possible in a period of about ten years, by intensive work and the investment of considerable capital, to create a raw material territory which would substantially relieve us of imports from abroad.

Even in their present condition the German colonies supply a number of important raw materials which, compared with the German import requirements, amount to over 100 % in the case of hemp, 30 % for cocoa and bananas, 20 % for tropical woods, and over 10 % for oil fruits, oil seeds and coffee.

In 1934, according to Dr. Weigelt's calculations, the German colonies exported raw materials of a total value of 156 million RM. In 1935 these exports rose to 179 millions. They include, however, some very considerable individual items, in particular gold from New Guinea. In some products our former colonies were able to register special successes. German East Africa attained particularly good results with the production of hemp, coffee, cotton and rubber. German South West Africa, on the other hand, might be made an ideal area for cattle and sheep breeding, and therefore for the production of hides, skins and wool. In addition the mineral resources are considerable. The Cameroons have proved specially suitable for the cultivation of cocoa, the production of vegetable fat in the form of palm kernels and palm oil, and fine wood. Togoland and New Guinea are also rich territories for the production of tropical raw materials of all kinds. An energetic administration could obtain further good results from the former German colonial possessions.

A complete survey of the economic value of colonies for the mother country is not yet possible at the present time, and cannot be calculated from the existing statistical figures. In particular, it is impossible to prove exactly their value for the supply of raw materials to the mother country. Estimates have, however, been made by competent experts. The value of the production of raw materials which would accrue to the home country by intensive exploitation is stated to be about 500 million RM per year, according to conservative estimates of the possibilities of development. Professor Thorbecke even estimates the annual value of production as high as 600 million RM. This amount is equal to about 15 % of our imports last year. If more productive colonies were allotted to us, the amount would naturally be correspondingly higher.

If Germany were at present in possession of her former colonial territory, a natural basis of raw materials could be created there by means of German labour and German capital, for which we are at present obliged, in view of our difficult foreign trade position, to seek a substitute by erecting great equipment in Germany and investing large amounts for artificial manufacture. Naturally the increased utilisation of home sources of raw materials by means of more perfect scientific work and industrial technique may lead to a rise in production and prosperity. But nothing is more natural than to seek to extend technical production which is limited in space to the wider sphere of virgin areas of production. Valuable agricultural products which cannot be grown at all in Germany owing to the poverty of our soil, or can only be grown with an immense outlay of capital and by artificial means, are obtained in the tropics without any appreciable cost. The necessity of colonial activity for Germany thus acquires a constantly increasing importance.

What use is it to us that the English and Americans constantly try to prove in speeches and writings that the raw material markets of the world are plentifully supplied and the further development of colonies is unnecessary, when at the same time Germany is not given the possibility of acquiring sufficient foreign means of payment in order to cover her immense requirements of raw materials abroad? Naturally, the return of her colonial territory will not be able entirely to make up the present lack of raw materials. But the colonies provide rich possibilities for the occupation of German labour and can therefore contribute to secure the economic future of our Fatherland. In relations between the home country and the colonies, a free trade can be developed unhindered by economic and political obstacles. The anxious scheming which at present characterises the exchange of commodities between independent States is of much less importance between colonies and the mother country.

To the same extent as colonies open up new means of supplying raw materials, they also serve to provide new markets for the products of the mother country. Even before the War, German trade with the colonies was rapidly increasing; the turnover was increased five times in a period of ten years. In the last year before the War, the sale of German goods to our African colonies amounted to 141 million Marks. It is true that this amount was very small compared with the total German exports. But, under German administration, the economic development of these territories would have made such progress that they would already have been an important market for German products. If the German colonies were regained, there would have to be immediately great deliveries of means of transport, machinery of all kinds and other investments from Germany to the colonies. Gradually the German colonies, like those of the other European countries, would become a main pillar of the permanent exchange of raw materials and manufactured goods with Germany.

The colonies are also of importance as representing possibilities of settlement for over-populated Germany, which must endeavour to extend its basis of life. The area available in Germany for purposes of settlement is very restricted. There has therefore always been a German emigration to overseas countries. But it is only in German colonies that there is a sure guarantee of the permanent maintenance of the German spirit. The colonial Germans represent a fixed portion of the German nation and take German customs, language, culture, and German institutions to overseas territories. The German colonies can also serve to extend the horizon of the German youth and to enrich many branches of German science by colonial research work.

British colonial experts have recently been endeavouring to contest the value of colonies as settlement territories. The great possibilities of colonial settlement are described by them as an illusion on the grounds that Great Britain herself is not in a position to send her surplus population to her own colonies. In the African colonial territories, it is said, there are great areas which are practically uninhabitable on account of the lack of water, mountainous ground which cannot be cultivated, or the tsetse fly, the carrier of dangerous bacilli. The districts which are inhabitable are said to be already fairly thickly settled by natives and Germany was scarcely able to accommodate more than 20,000 people in her colonies before the War. On the other hand German experts have ascertained by exhaustive studies that German settlers can do any physical work in the highlands of East Africa without danger to their health and that a denser settlement can be created in South West Africa by means of irrigation work. The difficulties formerly encountered by the settlement of tropical countries on account of the unfavourable climate, the dangers of tropical diseases and the difficult conditions of the soil, have now for the most part disappeared. Medical science and scientific research in the sphere of hygiene and the combating of diseases have given results which enable the white race to work in tropical territories to a much greater extent than was formerly thought possible. The possibilities of colonial industry and colonial settlement have also been extraordinarily extended by the present technical progress. Motor cars and aeroplanes, wireless telegraphy, telephones and broadcasting are the modern means which enable great areas to be opened up to an extent that was formerly unknown. Modern water works and irrigation can open up vast territories.

It is often said that the German colonies have always been run at a loss, that they cost much and brought in nothing. In spite of the expenditure that naturally increases with the exploitation, the receipts from the colonies increased to such an extent that the total grant from the Reich in the last five years before the War barely exceeded 30 million Marks a year. The Protectorate loans on the outbreak of war amounted to about 180 million Marks. If the development had quietly continued, the Protectorates would undoubtedly have been in a position in the near future to cover all the expenditure, including that for national defence, out of their own receipts, and in addition to provide the means for further colonisation. Lastly it should be remembered that the capital investments of German national economy in the Protectorates produced a revenue which increased from year to year. The further large-scale development of the German colonies would no doubt require many thousands of millions of Reichsmarks. But this expenditure would be distributed over a number of decades. In this way a sure basis would be provided for raw materials and for the existence of millions of people, while the same capital investment in Germany, if placed in industry, might one day prove to be a bad investment. It should be quite possible to raise these funds, especially for productive investment and financing in Reichsmarks. That ways and means would be found of obtaining this capital in New Germany is guaranteed by the energetic economic policy of the Government.

The present settlement of the colonial question excludes from colonial work the very people who would be specially suited for carrying out pioneer work in such an economically important territory, a nation of 67 millions who have so conspicuously proved their capacity for colonising. The other Great Powers are absolutely satiated with colonies and in some cases tired of colonies, so that they are incapable of the energy necessary for proper development, while Germany has a surplus of such energy and is increasingly compelled to extend her bases of soil and foodstuffs.

The German nation has been rightly called the "nation without room". Germany can equally well be called the "country without raw materials". Germany, like Italy, attained her national unity and power too late to be able to have any weighty influence in the division of the more valuable territories. It is true that, shortly before the War, by developing an energetic policy by peaceful means, through treaties and the purchase of colonies, Germany at the eleventh hour attained an important position as a colonial Power, which she however again lost in the World War. For our densely populated country with its poverty in raw materials, a freer access to the world's sources of raw materials is a vital necessity. A change in the present position must be all the more easily possible as the present mandatory Powers, Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Union of South Africa and Australia, which exercise a kind of guardianship over the German colonies, are in a position to give up the administration of our Protectorates without in any way endangering their own supplies.

Economic points of view at present occupy the front rank. We need work and bread for our people, and we wish to obtain a great part of that bread and work in our colonies. Colonies enable us to extend the living space of Germany and to develop our forces in a national enlarged space of our own, under our own sovereignty and our own administration and with our own means of production. In view of our foreign exchange position, the most decisive factor for Germany is to be able to produce within her own currency system a considerable portion of the raw materials which she has at present to pay for in foreign currency. Our economy and our currency policy are concerned in the development of possibilities of obtaining raw materials with German capital and German labour. The extension of the sphere of the German Reichsmark is the most decisive factor.

At the head of all statements regarding colonies stands the word of the Leader and Chancellor: "We need colonies as much as any Power". In the great peace plan of March 7th, 1936, Adolf Hitler made clear Germany's attitude to the colonial question in the following words: "The Government of the Reich expresses the expectation that, within a reasonable period, by means of friendly negotiations, the question of colonial equality of rights . . . will be cleared up". Colonial possession has now become a hard German vital necessity.

* * *

The raw material problem has been more and more discussed in the world in the last few months. Even the recognition that it is a world problem, in which all nations have to cooperate, is a step forward. But it must not be merely a theoretical discussion. The latest events in Africa and the dark clouds which hang over the whole world are the first charge brought against the sins of omission of the past years. The great possessor countries have the means in their hands to cure the evil from which policy and economy of the whole world are suffering. Let the countries which are poor in raw materials have the door opened in one way or another to a secure and sufficient supply of raw materials and to an adequate extension of the volume of their foreign trade. The constant growth and the enormous energies of a nation which has a right to its existence, such as the German nation united under Adolf Hitler, are pressing for development and only demand a sufficient living space. The quicker the necessary decisions are taken, the more rapidly will the political sky clear up and the quicker will world trade again reach a sound basis.

The German Colonies as Economic Territories^{*)}

The Economic Development before the War

What efforts did Germany make up to the year 1913 in order to give her colonies a development which still forms the economic basis of these territories?

German colonial economic activity can hardly be said to date back before the beginning of the century. German colonial economic achievement in the short period between that time and the outbreak of the War is all the more remarkable.

The main lines of this development are given below.

The white population of the colonies developed as follows: East Africa: 1900, 1131 whites; 1913, 5336 whites; Cameroons: 1900, 528 whites; 1913, 1871 whites; Togoland: 1900, 114 whites; 1913, 368 whites; South West Africa: 1900, 3387 whites; 1913, 14,830 whites; South Seas: 1900, 483 whites; 1913, 1984 whites.

The development of the production of the colonies was as follows:

The following plantation areas were under cultivation in all the colonies together:

1896	11,000 ha.
1913	179,000 ha.

The expansion of cattle breeding (mainly in South West Africa) is shown by the following figures: In 1910 there were altogether in the German colonies 1047 farms with a stock of 76,787 cattle and 373,352 small animals. In 1913 there were 1331 farms with a stock of 168,977 cattle and 670,514 small animals.

The capital in industrial companies working in the German colonies, according to a computation of the Colonial Economic Committee, amounted in 1896 to 62 million Marks, in 1904 to 185 million Marks and in 1912 to 506 million Marks. A first attempt by the German Colonial Office to distribute this capital according to the object of the businesses, was as follows at about the end of 1912:

Capital in Millions of Marks.

10 Banks	11.14
9 Shipping	41.80
7 Railways, Communications, Telegraphs	60.04
47 Mining	111.91
138 Plantations and Cattle-breeding . . .	117.72
109 Mixed businesses, trade and industry	133.48
79 Diamond mining	29.99
399 Companies	506.08

In the case of 20 further companies, the capital was not ascertainable.

In 1913 the railways in the German colonies had a total of 4176 kilometers in operation, including 310 km. in the Cameroons, 327 km. in Togoland, 2104 km. in South West Africa and 1435 km. in East Africa. In addition railway sections amounting to over 300 km. were under construction at the end of 1913.

An examination of the above figures shows in the first place that there were signs of a rapid upward development. In view of the fact that such a development took place within ten years, and in a number of cases in a much shorter time, the figures do not indicate the actual development.

A general expression of the economic development of the German colonies may be found in the increase in their foreign trade and finances. The following table gives the annual value of imports and exports in millions of Marks.

The total trade of all the colonies (imports and exports) was as follows:

According to the trade statistics of the German Empire, the share of the mother country in the foreign trade of the colonies was as follows:

The total trade of all the German colonies in the last year under report thus amounted to a value of about 319 million Marks, while Germany's trade with her colonies had a value of 107 million Marks. In themselves, these are certainly not very large amounts. But they should be regarded from the point of view that they are in the first place the result of scarcely more than ten years comprehensive economic development work in the proper sense of the word. When regarded in this way they represent a magnificent development. One of the most important facts to be adduced from these figures is, however, the well planned German method of work. The method of capital investment, the building of railways, telegraphs and lines of communication and — as is shown on another page — the cultural and social establishments and buildings, prove that Germany, in planning her colonial work, did not adopt a policy of exploitation and robber cultivation.

In drawing up the balance sheet of German cultural work, the question is raised as to whether the German colonies represented a "bad business" for Germany. This view is put forward with great glee by interested quarters abroad in the superficial opinion which is still held even at times among experts. The financial yield from the former German colonies, however, gives the lie to these statements. In the ordinary budget, the receipts of all German colonies (except Kiaochow) in respect of taxes, customs and other administrative receipts amounted in 1913 to a total of 60.70 million Marks, and the estimates for 1914 up to the outbreak of the War 58.11 million Marks. In addition to these receipts there were in the course of the last ten years growing savings from previous financial years, which amounted in 1902 to only 70,000 Marks, but in 1909 to 3.82 millions and in 1912 to 8.83 millions. The Reich subsidy, which up to 1900 was several times the receipts of the colonies and in 1902 was 16.92 million Marks, i. e. nearly double the actual receipts, became constantly of less importance for the financial administration. In 1912 it amounted to 21 millions, while for 1914 it was estimated at 20.32 millions, i. e. slightly more than a third of the actual revenue. This amount was used for the maintenance of the protectorate troops. All the other expenditure, including the interest on loans, and the financing of railway construction, was covered by the colonies themselves. At the beginning of the year 1914, the German colonies had on the whole entered the period of economic development. Germany had by this time proved that she was as well fitted for colonisation as others.

A comparison between the German African colonies and their neighbouring territories shows that in the latter the economic development, which gradually led to very large yields, was not any quicker in the first period of colonisation than in the German colonies. The lead gained by the foreign territories over the German territories in the absolute amount of their trade, in cases where the external conditions were similar, is mainly due to their earlier start and the deliberate pursuit of economic development. It should not be overlooked that in 1890 Great Britain had 3592 km. of railway in operation in Africa, while Germany had none, and that ten years later the British lines were 7177 km. in length and the German 234. It was only in 1906 that building began on a large scale. The importance of colonial development for Germany had become recognised, and everything that might contribute to this end was carried on with zeal. German science, which placed the results of its research in the service of colonial production and created the means of its development by ridding wide areas of disease, German technical skill which carried on that economic development with the most modern methods, German administration which created the foundations of external order, the German missions which endeavoured to raise the cultural level of the natives, had combined with the result that the heroic age of German colonisation was comparatively soon overcome. The period of economic development on a large scale had started, and the tree was already putting forth shoots — when the War broke out.

The Economic Development after the War and under Mandatory Rule

The economic statistics up to the year 1925 show a standstill or a decline. In German East Africa, as a result of the expulsion of the Germans, the German plantations deteriorated. Trade and traffic declined to such an extent that the railway had to close many of its stations. The cultural establishments of the Germans were destroyed. Epidemics and diseases spread. In 1923 Great Britain had scarcely begun to replace what had been destroyed. According to her own admission, there was a lack of suitable and experienced staff. Winston Churchill, at that time Colonial Secretary, was obliged to state on June 28th 1921 at the British Imperial Conference: "We have endeavoured to equip Tanganyika with a Government not inferior to the German administration which it had replaced. I am afraid that for a year or two, the state of this territory will compare unfavourably with its progress and prosperity when it was in the hands of our late opponents." In the Cameroons also, the German cultural work was destroyed. The plantations were neglected. The natives left the country as they had either lost their work or had to pay more taxes than before; the introduction of military service was also a cause of emigration. The first action that was found necessary was the introduction or expansion of the French language; the German schools, including the mission schools, were closed. The large-scale German campaign against sleeping sickness was also neglected in the Cameroons by the fact that, for reasons of prestige, the German remedy "Germanin" was no longer used. In Ruanda and Urundi, sleeping sickness had also again made headway. Belgium, which was not even in a position to check this dreadful disease in her own Congo, was naturally not in a position to replace the German measures. Germany, which was said to be "unworthy" to possess colonies, achieved remarkable results for these former German possessions and for Africa as a whole.

In Togoland, the German model colony, there was also a considerable decline in economic activity. The French press was itself obliged to note that the good German organisation had been destroyed, and it was pointed out in the French Chamber (March 18th and 22nd, 1922) that the population under French rule lived in a condition of slavery. In South West Africa the Boer Minister Smuts, it is true, desisted from a general expulsion of the Germans. Nevertheless, the position of the colony became extremely unfavourable on account of the change in the methods of administration. The abandonment of diamond mining severely affected many people. The British native policy entirely collapsed in the Hottentot rising of May 1922, which was directed, not against the whites, but against the new masters, Boers and British. The history of this rising was brought before the Third Assembly of the League of Nations on September 8th, 1922. The imposition of a high tax on dogs caused the natives to refuse payment. Although no blood had been shed at the beginning, the Government entered the field with armed forces, machine-guns, artillery and aircraft, against the natives under the protection of the League of Nations. Their houses were bombarded, and men, women and children were thus killed without discrimination. The natives who were attacked naturally defended themselves, and this led to further heavy losses. It is the irony of fate that this great rising took place in the same territory as the Herero war of 1906, which British propaganda represented as a proof of Germany's incapacity to colonise. In South West Africa also the economic decline was considerable. Without regard to its economic capacity, its production was sacrificed to the advantage of the economy of the Union of South Africa. The Germans were also expelled without consideration from New Guinea and the South Sea Islands. The result was a rapid decline in production. German plantations were handed over to former soldiers, and the conditions prevailing there were condemned even by the Australian press.

Under mandatory rule, therefore, until 1925, in open opposition to the Covenant of the League of Nations, the values created by the Germans were destroyed, and as a result of political measures a standstill or decline in economic activity was brought about which exposed in particular the natives of these countries to severe distress.

The economic development since 1925 is mainly due to the objective work of the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations which has gradually made its influence felt. It succeeded in freeing the economic and even the cultural interests of the natives in the mandated territories from the chaos of this first period. The value of the foreign trade of the former German colonies is shown by the following figures:

The following tables are of great interest. They give a general view of the economic development in respect of areas under cultivation, stocks of cattle, foreign trade, markets for the supply and sale of goods, and main exports from the former German colonies, according to the position in the year 1935; they also give the maximum position in the various items in previous years. The German Colonies as Suppliers of Raw Materials and Purchasers of Manufactured Goods

Before going into the fundamental question as to whether Germany's former colonies offer the possibility of opening up plentiful sources of raw materials, we must first deal with the question as to how far Germany is dependent on foreign countries for her supply of colonial raw materials.

Without wasting many words on this subject we will allow the following four tables to speak for themselves. They are taken from the following publications: Raw Materials and Colonies. The Royal Institute of International Affairs; London. Raw Materials in World Politics, by John de Wilde, in Foreign Politics Reports. Foreign Policy Association, Incorporated, New York, No. 13, September 15th, 1936. The Economist, of October 26th, 1935. Report by the League Secretariat for the Negotiations of the Raw Materials Committee of March 1937.

While all the tables, together with the annexed text, make Germany's position clear in respect of raw materials, they endeavour to mitigate this fact by pointing out that even the countries blessed with raw materials do not possess all or even all those which they require; they further point out that the tables also show how little the mandated territories are able to contribute to the relief of this distress. As these arguments are constantly advanced in colonial discussions, it is necessary to consider them in some detail. As regards the first remark Germany can reply without hesitation that she would be glad to have at her disposal the quantities of raw materials which the others allege are so small. In reply to the argument constantly advanced, especially by the English, that Great Britain, which herself suffers from a lack of many raw materials, cannot simply apply to her Dominions with their independent economic policy in order to relieve her distress, it may be pointed out, as is moreover done in the above mentioned inquiries, that in spite of this independence, the close connection of the mother country with the dominions and colonies are naturally of vital importance for the supply of raw materials to Great Britain.

The following observations on the problem of the supply of Germany with foodstuffs and raw materials are taken from a work by Dr. Eicke, "Why Foreign Trade?" published in 1936 by the Verlag für Sozialpolitik, Wirtschaft und Statistik, Berlin SW 68.

"Germany is at present compelled to be extremely economical in the use of foreign exchange and to adopt a cautious import policy. At the same time the development demands the utilisation of all possibilities of domestic production in order to adapt the imports to the reduced yield from exports. The policy of self-supply which Germany is compelled to follow does not aim at

The Opinion of an Englishman:

From the work by E. D. Morel:

Africa and the Peace of Europe

The part which Germans have played in the discovery and scientific exploration of the Dark Continent is admittedly conspicuous: in the matter of scientific exploration, Germany's contribution would probably have been acknowledged, before the war, to have been pre-eminent. Although more than sixty years have elapsed since Barth, crossing the Sahara desert from Tripoli, carried out his protracted and fruitful journeys in the Western Sudan from Timbuctu to Lake Chad, and although many changes have occurred in those regions since that time, the five monumental volumes in which he narrates his experiences remain to-day the standard work upon that part of Africa. He threw a perfect flood of light upon those fascinatingly interesting countries, entering with a minuteness and accuracy of detail into their political, social and economic life which has been of invaluable assistance to the British and French administrators who have come after him and who turn to his printed labours even now as to a text book.

Nachtigal, Schweinfurth and Rohlfs were worthy imitators of Barth's thorough methods. For its knowledge of the ethnology and philology of Africa the world is immeasurably indebted to them and to Reichardt, Koelbe, Schoen and many other of their compatriots. In the priority of geographical discovery in the western part of the continent, Barth and his later coadjutors come second only to Mungo Park, Clapperton and the Lander Brothers, while the former's contribution to our general knowledge of Africa on comparison with the latter's is as an encyclopaedia to a diary.

In the East, Centre and South it was Schweinfurth who discovered the Bar-el-Ghazal and the fluvial system of the Upper-

German Path-Finders

Nile; Krapf, Rebmann and Von der Deken who made known the famous peaks of Kenia and Kilimandjaro; Mohr who discovered the Victoria Falls; Mauch a considerable part of the Zambezi, including the wonderful Zimbabwe ruins; Vogel, Wadai, Schweinfurth and von Wissmann large sections of the Congo basin. These, and other Germans—some of them like Barth and Hornemann under British scientific auspices—were the chief pioneers of British Imperial expansion in Africa, Mauch of Rhodesia, Barth, Overweg and Hornemann of Northern Nigeria.

These feats are cherished national traditions in Germany, just as similar feats are cherished national traditions in Britain, and the notion that Germany—compatibly with a peaceful Europe—can be driven from a Continent which so many of her sons have leavened with their devotion, their intelligence and their blood seems to me to be conceived in ignorance of the deepest wellsprings of the human nature and national sentiment.

Nor must we forget, in considering Germany's historical connection with Africa and the strands of sentiment which have been woven into the national life as a consequence thereof, the outstanding fact that the first great international conference called to deal with the future of the non-colonisable area of Africa was summoned by Bismarck, and held at Berlin.

Passing from sentimental influence to utilitarian issues—if indeed, these can be entirely divorced—Germany's claim to a share in the distribution of African territory is broad-based upon an internal situation created by her population problem and by the national economic necessities arising therefrom. The European statesman who pursues a national policy in disregard of and whose international outlook ignores that problem is closing his eyes to one of the most powerful factors moulding for good or evil, the destinies of the modern world.

The Opinion of a French Colonial:

German Cultural Work in French Colonies

by Jacques Aissa, Dipl. E. P. C. H.

From the "Deutsche Kolonialzeitung" No. 12 of December 1st, 1936

That Germany achieved great things in her overseas possessions is well known in impartial quarters. But the contribution made by German explorers and other colonials in the construction of the French colonial empire is doubtless less well known. As a French colonial of many years standing and a sincere friend of Germany, I think that, in the interest of truth, I should state a few facts regarding these creations of German men and the German spirit. These facts are all the more remarkable as Germans wishing to work in the French colonies have always had difficulties placed in their way. France always regarded them rather as rivals than as co-workers. At the same time, in cases where co-operation has really existed, it has always resulted in the best harmony.

The achievements of the Germans lie in the sphere of geographical, ethnographical and medical research, mission work, practical colonisation and trade. The latter was, however, almost entirely crippled after the War.

Germans have done excellent work, especially in the French colonies in Africa. While the efforts of the great European colonial Powers were directed mainly towards the military and commercial utilisation of Africa, German scientists and missionaries were interested in the natives of these vast territories, quite apart from a commercial utilisation of the country.

The Hildesheim explorer Hornemann who travelled in the Niger basin, and Gottfried Ehrenberg who travelled on the African West Coast, at the beginning of the last century, by means of their research work, helped to prepare for the subsequent penetration of West Africa by the French.

Barth, who was born in Hamburg in 1821, was considered in France as the first authority in the knowledge of North and Central Africa. After a short journey in Morocco, he went through Algeria to Tunis, which he explored thoroughly. In 1853—1854 he stayed for many months in Timbuctoo, from which he brought rich booty to Europe, after having on this journey thoroughly explored the present French Sudan. The journeys of Overweg, Vogel and von Beurmann also contributed largely to the opening up of Central Africa, although all three lost their lives in Africa and their inheritance was mostly lost.

In particular, Rohlf's, by his adventurous journeys in Morocco, the Sahara and the Chad district, should render possible a valuable insight into the life of the tribes in those districts. His meteorological observations and botanical collections, in particular, contained much information. Nachtigal's contributions in respect of the Sudan were the means of reawakening French interest in that country. The Sudan was shortly afterwards conquered by the French army. The geological work of Lenz regarding great districts in Morocco, the Sudan and Senegambia were of the greatest value to the French in the utilisation of these countries.

In recent times also we often find German scientific expeditions which, by their research work, brought a valuable addition in knowledge also for the French. As examples may be mentioned Theobald Fischer's fundamental geographical studies in Morocco 1907—1908 and the work of Duke Adolf Friedrich of Mecklenburg in 1910 of French Equatorial Africa. After the War, German exploration was naturally very difficult, but we nevertheless find, inter alia, the well-known anthropologist Prof. Bluntschi in Madagascar in 1931—1932. I would not like to close this list of well-known German explorers without recalling the many extraordinarily valuable expeditions of Prof. Frobenius which have infinitely enriched the knowledge of colonising countries especially in the ethnographic sphere.

In medical research, Germany's share is the greatest. It is true that France has had Pasteur. But Germany produced Robert Koch. As a result of his work the greatest scourges of the tropics have lost their main sting. Apart from the discovery of new methods of treatment for malaria, apart from research in respect of rinderpest and the discovery of the cholera bacillus, the comma bacillus, which is called in France "Koch bacillus" in honour of Koch, he introduced in particular the scientific campaign against sleeping sickness. His initial work was subsequently crowned by the discovery of the atabrin-plasmochin against malaria and Germanin against sleeping sickness which, like Yatren which was discovered by the Germans against tropical dysentery, were made available for medical treatment by Prof. Dr. Mühlens, the present director of the Hamburg Tropical Institute. Germanin has unfortunately not been used for some time past in the French territories, although it had been the means of excellent cures. The French doctors at present use an imitation of Germanin which is not yet free from objection and which usually results in the blinding of the patients and rarely in their cure. But the French product is nevertheless preferred for more or less political reasons. Thus the population of Central Africa has dropped from four millions in 1911 to two and a half millions. In the German Cameroons at present under French mandate the number of persons affected by the disease has been quadrupled.

Survey Troop

Although Germany has at present no colonies, she occupies a predominant position in the campaign against tropical diseases. This is shown by the Hamburg Tropical Institute, created by the world famous Prof. Nocht, and the German Institute for Medical Missions at Tübingen.

German missionaries have also always worked in various French colonies and have faithfully and honestly fulfilled their duties. It is true that there were no evangelical missions even before the War. We also find no German Catholic Congregations; but Germans are active in French and Alsatian societies. For instance we find in these societies before the War a few German missionaries who did excellent work in spite of all difficulties. Several of them distinguished themselves by preparing dictionaries of the native languages, for instance, the Padres Dahin and Fuchs in Equatorial Africa and Michel Schuh in Dahomey and many others.

As regards settlement work, the German settlement "la Stidia" in the Oran district should be mentioned. Here German emigrants from the neighbourhood of Treves were settled at the cost of the French State, as it was desired to settle Algeria as rapidly as possible. This sole great experiment in the settlement of Germans in French overseas territory must be regarded as a complete success, as the settlement has developed a sound prosperity. A number of Swabians also settled in Algeria about the middle of the last century. But all these settlements were gradually penetrated by French influence, so that there can now be no question of local Germanism, although one often meets descendants of these Germans who remember their origin with pride.

Otherwise, there is no question of an actual settlement of Germans, as the Germans have always been forbidden to stay for any length of time in French territory.

In spite of the comparatively small number of Germans in the French possessions, the Germans have done everything to create regular commercial relations. In this respect Germany has had a particularly hard struggle since the War. While the French look upon the German salesman as a keen competitor (for Germany does not sell inferior goods), the position has been made worse by the agitation generally carried on in France since the War and the anti-German propaganda again stirred up by the emigrants. It is to be hoped that France will soon come to realise this position. For Germany not only sells, but is in particular a purchaser, as she is compelled by her present lack of territories producing raw materials to apply to foreign countries, including the French colonies, in order to obtain the necessary raw materials.

But Germany can only buy when she has the possibility of selling. Although there has been much talk on the subject, France has unfortunately never taken any positive steps to give Germany any economic compensation after the War.

We French colonials do not wish to take part for years in a political game which endangers French overseas possessions in the worst possible manner, merely in order to serve a feeling of hegemony on the part of France. The reputation of the whites in the colonies is seriously endangered. In view of this constant strife on European soil, the native impression as to the superiority of the Europeans is undermined.

The time has come to solve the problem of the colonial crisis. There is only one way to do this, i.e. to restore normal relations and to give back to the Germans what cannot be morally refused them. Only in this way can the French colonies be placed on a sound basis, for the mandated territories in their present form represent severe competition in view of the absence of markets.

Germany is fully worthy of direct colonial activity; otherwise Marshal Lyautey, the greatest of all French colonials, would not have uttered the following words regarding the mandatory question: "Instead of taking the colonies from the Germans, they should have been given more." And he was certainly no friend of Germany.

German Marine Exploration in African Waters

Marine exploration has a twofold task. In the first place it endeavours to solve certain practical questions of interest for navigation, overseas trade and high sea fishing. In addition scientific marine exploration, in the constant urge for increased knowledge, tries to solve the many riddles which the sea still holds for man.

Almost all seafaring civilised nations have sent out expeditions to the high seas. German participation in these expeditions in general, and particularly in African waters, ranks very high.

No fewer than eight great expeditions have been sent out from Germany to explore the deep waters of the sea. Each of them has touched on the Southern Atlantic and at any rate came near the African continent, while five of them also explored the African waters of the Indian Ocean. These voyages, which are all known by the names of their ships, were as follows: The voyage of exploration round the world on H.M.S. "Gazelle" 1874—1876, which took place at the same time as the first great British expedition on the "Challenger;" the Plankton expedition in the North Atlantic on the "National" in 1889, which was epoch-making in respect of research of minute forms of life in the ocean; the mainly zoological voyage of exploration in the Atlantic and Indian Ocean on the "Valdivia" 1898-1899; the German South Polar Expedition on the "Gauss" 1901-1903, in which marine research was carried on during the voyage in the Atlantic and Indian Ocean under the guidance of Prof. E. von Drygalski; the voyage of the survey vessel, H.M.S. "Planet" in 1906-1907 in the three oceans of the world; the German Antarctic Expedition of 1910-1911 on the "Deutschland"; the voyage of exploration of the survey vessel H.M.S. "Möwe" in 1911 and 1913 along the African coast, which later fell a victim to the Great War.

The last and, at the same time, the greatest German deep sea expedition, is entirely different in plan and execution from these first seven voyages of exploration, as is shown by the map of the route. This voyage, which is known as the German Atlantic Expedition, was carried out on the survey and research vessel "Meteor" in 1925-1927. While vessels on previous expeditions, in proceeding to their destination, have merely taken samples from the unknown depths of the world ocean, the "Meteor" for the first time covered an entire ocean, namely the Southern Atlantic, from the southern ice boundary to 20° N. with an equally distributed network of 310 stations. To do this, it was necessary to cross the ocean between Africa and South America fourteen times. Thus the "Meteor" marks an advance in the entire marine exploration to the systematic research of the ocean.

In addition to the results of exploration in respect of the vast spaces of the ocean, there have recently been valuable individual investigations of the African coastal currents. Although the dictated peace of Versailles deprived Germany of her colonies, German science has never ceased to occupy itself with the African zone. Within the last three years alone, the Berlin "Institut für Meereskunde" has investigated three African current zones. The surface movements of the Guinea current which washes the coast of Togoland and, in its offshoots, the coast of the Cameroons, were established together with their annual fluctuations. The deeply extending Agulhas current was followed in its construction and course. A part of its masses of water is brought round the southern point of Africa and flows combined with water from the South Atlantic as the Benguela current along the coast of German South-West Africa and Angola. This Benguela current has recently been investigated. The collection zone of the cold water in front of the coast of South-West Africa, which is considered to be the cause of the desert of Namib, was examined in its inner connection with the Benguela current and the south east trade wind.

Even 25 years ago, Prof. G. Schott, to whom we owe two great collective works on the Atlantic and on the Indian and Pacific Oceans, described the African half of the Southern Atlantic in which at that time there were five German as against three older British expeditions, as the German part of the ocean. With much greater justice at the present time, after the results of the "Meteor" expedition, the whole of the Southern Atlantic could be described as a German sea, if names were decided by the share in scientific research. But the numerous German marine voyages of exploration were not due to imperialistic strivings for power, but were rather an expression of cultural desire of the German nation.

systematically cutting ourselves off from the world market, but is a result of the hard necessity of having to live and work in the present chaotic state of world economy.

German agriculture is at present making the greatest efforts to improve Germany's own supply of agrarian products. The firm determination of ensuring our own supply of foodstuffs, at any rate in case of need, is a part of the political confession of New Germany. According to the National Socialist ideology, a healthy nation must endeavour to obtain its food from its own soil. This view is expressed in the new German agrarian policy which grants every imaginable assistance to agriculture, while demanding that agriculture must do everything to increase German agrarian production to the utmost extent of its power. Germany is not so favoured by nature in respect of her climate and soil as many other countries.

By far the most difficult problem of the self-supply of Germany consists in the supply of fats and fodder, which are closely connected with each other. Germany is dependent on foreign countries for about 60% of her total supply of fats. Last year, she was obliged to import butter to the value of 87 million RM., and lard, tallow, margarine and other oils and fats to the value of 56 million RM. As regards the supply of fruit and vegetables, Germany is also dependent on large imports from abroad. Imports of fruits of all kinds rank first in the German foodstuffs imports; the imports of vegetables are also considerable. In 1935 Germany imported ordinary fruits to the value of 97 million RM., southern fruits 144 million RM., vegetables 43 million RM., and legumes 37 million RM. On the whole Germany only requires small supplies of meat from abroad. In 1935 the imports of meat and meat products amounted to 55 million RM. The supply of eggs and fish has substantially improved in the last few years. The imports of eggs declined from 128 million RM. in 1932 to 62 million RM. in 1935. The imports of tobacco, coffee, tea and cocoa are still very high. Last year Germany imported raw tobacco to the value of 119 million RM., coffee 121 million RM., cocoa 28 million RM., and tea 7 million RM., mostly from overseas. In spite of the German shortage of foreign exchange, which should have called for certain restrictions in the consumption of these commodities, there was scarcely any decline in imports as compared with previous years. The high imports of articles of consumption are no doubt partly due to the fact that we obtain these goods from overseas countries, together with vital raw materials such as wool and cotton, by means of compensation. Here also an important part is played, not only by treaty obligations, but also by considerations of a commercial nature for the needs of other economic systems. On the whole, the supply of the population with the most important food stuffs is at present already guaranteed. The supply is completely covered in the case of grain and the products manufactured therefrom, potatoes, milk and sugar. About 85% of all the foodstuffs consumed in Germany are of German production. This percentage is, however, reduced to about 75% when it is considered that part of the foodstuffs is produced with the help of foreign fodder. In all investigations into the position of the supply of foodstuffs it is observed that consumption has considerably increased in the last few years.

Apart from the supply of foodstuffs, the German requirements of industrial raw materials call for considerable imports. Germany's importance as a purchasing country for foreign raw materials is in proportion to her position as a supplying country for industrial manufactured goods. In the last few years, German industry has taken about 20% of the world production of copper, 11% of the wool, 10% of the cotton and 7% of the rubber. It is at present of special importance to ensure the supply of raw materials, since the execution of the great economic programme of the German Government is essentially dependent on the imports of adequate quantities of raw materials. By far the greatest portion of the imports of raw materials is represented by textile raw materials of a value of about 700 million RM. per year. Germany imports in the first place wool and cotton and to a smaller extent flax, hemp and jute.

After textiles, the most important German imports of raw materials are metals and ores. In 1935, the imports of metals and ores required an amount in foreign exchange equivalent to 431 million RM. The principal metals obtained by Germany from abroad are copper, lead, tin, zinc, nickel and chromium, while the ores are mainly iron and copper. The German timber imports in 1935 amounted to 227 million RM., i. e. double the quantity in 1932. The most important kinds are timber for paper-making and tropical woods of high quality.

Only about half the requirements of hides and skins are at present covered by German agricultural production. The imports of these materials which are of such importance for the German leather industry amounted last year to 165 million RM. Hides and skins are a valuable by-product of cattle-breeding. The German production can only be raised by an increase in the stock of cattle, but this is prevented by the difficulties of obtaining fodder and of disposing of the meat. The requirements of particular kinds of hides and skins, especially those used for sole leather, are difficult to cover in Germany. In regard to mineral supplies, Germany is also dependent on large imports. Last year the imports of foreign mineral oil amounted to 165 million RM. The other raw materials imported by Germany include a number of products which are of vital importance for German industry, e.g. chemical raw materials, rubber, fats for industrial purposes, etc. For the present completely satisfactory substitutes for these raw materials can only be partly supplied by home production. The necessity for importing rubber represents a particularly heavy burden.

In view of the present position of science and technique, there are considerable possibilities of self-supply. Germany is in a position to make herself independent of foreign countries in respect of many products.

All the successes achieved and in prospect in respect of self-supply must not prevent us from promoting foreign trade to the utmost. Though the measures for self-supply are important in the present period of depression in world trade, they must not lead to the isolation of Germany which, as an industrial country and a Great Power, maintains valuable world economic relations. Without world trade there can be no question of maintaining the standard of living of the nations, their culture and — what is specially important — the number of their population and their national energy.

Germany does not desire to be self-sufficing; she attaches importance to having a share in all fruits and products of the soil with which our country is not, or only inadequately, supplied. Germany will, moreover, never be able to be entirely self-sufficing; that is clearer now than ever before, when she is trying to maintain her population and her standard of living by means of her industrial achievement alone. In the present position of German economy which, like that of all industrial countries, is closely connected with world economy, a permanent economic revival cannot in the long run be successful without taking care of world market conditions. For that, the inter-relations between production, population, maintenance of life and foreign trade are too many and too peremptory.

The smooth waging of the labour battle and the fulfilment of other State necessities depend not least on the adequate supply of Germany with raw materials. The problem of raw materials thus links up with the general problem of business prosperity, of which it is a part, and a particularly important part. The leaders of the German economic policy are aware that the question of the supply of raw materials cannot be solved without making Germany's relations with foreign countries more intensive. Dr. Schacht, the President of the Reichsbank, has stated more than once that no nation can permanently close itself to the world market without severe damage. Germany is therefore making the utmost efforts, by straining all her forces, to increase German exports and thus to ensure the country with a supply of the raw materials required for its existence and industry."

This brings us to the above mentioned second remark, that the mandated territories cannot contribute at all or only very slightly to alleviate the German lack of raw materials.

In the previous chapter we have proved by statistics the growth of colonial activity in the German colonies before and after the War. We will now give a review of the resources of raw materials in the colonies.

In the first place, there is cotton, of which Germany imported 4,779,000 tons with a value of 607 million Marks in 1913. The possibility of cotton growing in the colonies had to be carefully considered. There could be no question from the outset of overcropping, but it was necessary to examine the natural conditions for a rational cultivation of cotton in the territories concerned and, with the help of all scientific means, to revive any former cultivation which existed or to introduce fresh cultivation. In Africa, Germany carried on pioneer work in this direction, and at a cost of 2 million Marks concluded the experiments in the last years before the War. Cotton cultivation on a large scale was to be started in the colonies suited for the purpose, i. e. Togoland, the Cameroons and East Africa, and the natives were trained and encouraged. In the ten years before the War, the surface under cultivation rose from 1965 ha. to 12,918 ha. and in 1914 704 plantations of a total area of 526,829 ha. had already taken up this important crop. During this period the cotton crop of East Africa increased from 9.29 tons to 2191.91 tons and that of Togoland from 32.11 tons to 503.37 tons with a total value of nearly 3 million Marks. In the last year before the War, it might be said that the experimental stage had been passed and the conditions had been created for a large-scale cotton cultivation.

As regards other colonial fibres such as hemp, flax, jute, sisal, kapok, etc., Germany's imports in 1913 were 1,975,000 tons. Of this quantity East Africa alone supplied 208,000 tons with a value of 10.7 million Marks, although this crop had only been introduced eight years previously. It cannot be pointed out too clearly that the introduction of sisal cultivation is exclusively due to German science and German enterprise. In this manner two-thirds of the German requirements of sisal hemp in 1913 came from East Africa.

The production of rubber, of which Germany imported 205,000 tons with a value of 125.9 million Marks in 1913, also developed favourably. The share supplied by the colonies was 14 %, mostly plantation rubber.

As regards the development of the mineral resources, it cannot be definitely stated what minerals and what quantities are available for development, as the exploration of all the areas in questions had not been concluded. Nevertheless, the copper production of South West Africa was already considerable in the last few years before the War, and the particularly great increase which took place in 1907 was due to the opening of the Otawi Railway in 1906 and demonstrates in a remarkable manner the importance of means of communications in colonial territories. Germany's imports of raw copper amounted in 1913 to 225,400 tons with a value of 335.3 million Marks. Of this quantity South West Africa supplied 47,345.4 tons with a value of 7,728,700 Marks. In addition, gold, silver, tin, lead and other ores were mined in increasing quantities and bore witness to the richness of the deposits. In addition German South West Africa supplied as from 1910 increasing quantities of marble, and in the year 1913 supplied diamonds to the value of 58.9 million Marks, as against 0.05 millions in 1908.

The utilisation of tropical wood and tropical tanning materials could only start after the development of the means of communication which are of much more decisive importance for wood exports than for other colonial products. As regards the supply of fine woods, East Africa and the Cameroons were of primary importance, together with New Guinea. The vast forest regions of these colonies possessed rich supplies of tanning materials. That the German colonies did not export any appreciable quantities of these products was not due to the fact they were unable to produce, but mainly to their insufficient exploration. The natural conditions for their production existed in these colonies just as in the other African territories, in particular British South Africa, and this was one of the factors that caused the German African possessions to be investigated in respect of the possibility of supply.

The raw materials of fats and oils were transformed in Germany in 1913 to the extent of 1,785,000 tons. Of this quantity only 50,000 tons were produced in the country. The sum required for the import of the remainder amounted in the last year before the War to 537.5 million Marks. It is true that the colonies were only able to supply a fraction of this amount, but the increase in this portion during the last twelve years before the War shows what amounts could have been produced. This increase was from 19,000 tons in 1899 to about 80,000 tons in 1913. In this case also the preparations for starting cultivation were difficult and took time and depended on means of communication, since oil fruits and oil raw materials are mass goods and can only be used when it is possible to bring the products, which are themselves of low value, to the coast at small transport cost. For this reason great hopes were placed in the railways in the last few years of German colonial rule. There was, however, no reason to doubt that the measures taken for cultivation, in view of the almost unlimited capacity of the market for vegetable oil products, would have fulfilled the expectations placed in them. The most important factor was the natural conditions which already existed.

In respect also of colonial goods the share contributed by the colonies only represents a fraction of the consumption of the mother country. But it must be borne in mind in this connection that these cultivations were all introduced without exception for the first time by Germans, and had to be tried out, frequently at considerable sacrifice and at the cost of mistakes. The production of cocoa products, particularly in the Cameroons, Togoland, East Africa and Samoa, developed very favourably. The exports from all the German colonies together amounted in the last year before the War to 6332 tons.

That the future prospects attached at that time to cocoa growing were by no means exaggerated is proved by a glance at the cocoa development in the British Gold Coast. In the short period of fifteen years, i. e. from 1910 to 1924, the Gold Coast has developed from very small beginnings to the first cocoa country in the world. In 1924, with its production of about 227,000 tons, it already supplied more than half the total world requirements. Coffee growing has continued to increase, especially in East Africa, and the quality has been improved, while experiments in the Cameroons and Togoland offered favourable possibilities for the future.

As regards the capacity of the German colonies to compete with foreign countries as suppliers for home requirements, it may be pointed out in the first place that the development of tobacco growing in the colonies was in its initial stages before the outbreak of the War. In the last few years of German colonial work, however, the efforts to encourage tobacco cultivation in East Africa, the Cameroons and South West Africa gave good results. Banana growing on a large scale was newly introduced in the Cameroons. On May 9th, 1914, the first German banana steamer was launched, and was intended solely for the transport of bananas from the Cameroons to Hamburg. Large banana plantations had been laid down and the export was to begin in 1914.

As regards animal raw materials, the share of the colonies up to the outbreak of War was small. Nevertheless, the efforts made, especially in German South West Africa, registered a certain success. Even at a cautious estimate, the cattle breeding and farming industry in the German colonies gave grounds for the opinion that the further development in the colonies would supplement German agriculture and produce an additional supply of food for the German people.

* * *

The results achieved in the former German colonies in the production of raw materials are of special importance for the present review of the position. It has been proved that many particularly important raw materials could be produced. If only the final figures are considered, it must be admitted that they were not high, while the quantity of raw materials exported from the colonies in the last year before the War was still too small to have any appreciable influence on the production of world raw materials and the supply of Germany. The significance of German colonial economy appears in a totally different light when its development is examined, as there was unquestionably a relatively great increase in a comparatively short time.

It is naturally difficult to determine what the subsequent development would have been, if the War and the resultant expropriation had not destroyed the entire development. There is, however, no reason to underestimate the future possibilities of the territories in question; a glance at the colonial territories adjoining the German colonies and possessing on the whole the same geological and climatic conditions, is very informative in this connection.

Reference has already been made to the British Gold Coast, which adjoins Togoland, in connection with cocoa production. But in other respects also, the exports from the Gold Coast have enormously increased. The same applies to the British Colony of Nigeria which adjoins the Cameroons, and British East Africa which is adjacent to German East Africa. On following the trade figures in these territories, it appears that the development of these colonies has in fact led to very substantial results, which by no means represent the final stage.

Though we cannot conclude from the development of those colonies that there would naturally be the same or a similar development in the German colonies, there are nevertheless certain indications in the reports by the mandatory Powers to the League of Nations. They show, in spite of all relapses and difficulties, that the seeds sown by German labour in the soil of Africa, in spite of difficult years of depression, have again begun to grow and to show a powerful development. The seeds sown by years of German colonial work, which began to germinate before the outbreak of War, have borne further fruit in the last few years; but the harvest goes to other nations.

In German East Africa a new period of development only began in 1925. In 1936 Germans were again admitted, and not only returned to their old settlements and plantations, but also took up the exploitation of new land. At present the German element represents 50 % of the productive white population and is again the most important economic factor.

The two great overland railways built under German rule, which bear permanent witness to German science and German labour, must be considered as the great arteries of economic life.

As before the War, sisal production was the main item. After constantly rising, it amounted in 1935 to 84,000 tons i. e. about a third of the total exports. After sisal come the following products: coffee, also with a constantly rising production, amounting to about 19,000 tons, or 14.1 % of the export trade; groundnuts, the production of which declined considerably in 1934, amounting to about 17,000 tons or 6.5 %; cotton, after a heavy drop from 1930 to 1934, with about 10,000 tons, or 16.5 % of the exports; raw gold, after a constant rise, with about 64,000 oz. or 10.8 % of the exports; hides and skins with 4.4 % of the exports. The diamond production, which was still considerable in 1929 and 1930, has entirely ceased. The same fate overtook the production of rubber, which was the most important export in 1912 but which declined considerably after the War. There is a slight increase in tin ore, mica, salt, tanning bark, vegetable oils and fats, while the production of rice is growing in importance.

While cattle breeding in the British mandate among the native population and in European farms is of much less importance on the whole than the products of agriculture and of the cultivation of tropical plants, the extensive cattle breeding carried on by the natives is of decisive importance for the economy of the Belgian territories of Ruanda and Urundi which have been incorporated in the Customs union of the Belgian Congo. This is also shown by the increasing exports of hides and skins (1550 tons in 1935), after which come at a considerable distance small quantities of coffee, cotton, gold and tin concentrates.

In German South West Africa also, the years during and immediately following the War were years of severe crisis, especially as the Versailles Treaty provided the possibility of expelling more than 6000 Germans.

One of the vital elements in German South West Africa is cattle breeding and farming, especially the breeding of caracul and black head Persian sheep introduced by the German Government, as is shown by the rapidly increasing exports of skins (for Astrakhan fur) which rose from about 84,000 skins in 1928 to 514,000 in 1935. The importance of farming and agriculture is shown by the increase in the exports of these products as compared with the total exports, i. e. in 1930 24 % with about £ 605,000; 1931 48 % with about £ 698,000; 1932 75 % with about £ 784,000; 1933 82.1 % with about £ 1,195,000; 1934 82.2 % with about £ 925,000 and 1935 62.8 % with about £ 1,566,000, while the exports of mining products were in 1930 72 % with a value of £ 1,836,000; 1931 40 % with £ 587,000; 1932 18.7 % with £ 195,000; 1933 6.2 % with £ 90,000; 1934 10.6 % with £ 121,000 and 1935 31.7 % with £ 791,000.

Diamond mining which was for many years of decisive importance for South West African economy and which yielded about 2 millions in 1926 and 1927 and about 1½ millions in 1928 and 1929 and then dropped rapidly to its lowest figure of £ 10,000 in 1933, again rose to £ 588,000 in 1934/35 when the Consolidated Diamond Mines Ltd. resumed operations. Copper mining, which ranks second, is exclusively in the hands of the Otawi Mining and Railway Co. which owns the well-known Tsumeb mines. After the production had dropped from 1929 to 1932 from 66,700, 53,700, 36,600 to 21,500 tons with an export value of £ 703,000, £ 425,000, £ 170,000 and £ 42,000, the Company stopped working in July 1932, and has not yet resumed operations. The development of vanadium mining from 1932 to 1934 was no less disastrous; the production, which amounted in 1929 to 5268 tons with a value of £ 211,000, after the decline, again rose in 1935 to 3500 tons with a value of £ 133,000. The production from tin mining has developed favourably.

This decline not only severely affected the workers and employees, but had also an effect on the financial position of the mandated territory, which was already seriously undermined by the difficult conditions in agriculture. Apart from these external difficulties, the mandated territory has been placed at a great disadvantage not only by the Customs and commercial policy of the Union of South Africa, with which it forms a Customs union, but must also bear the costs of the forced settlement of the Boers which is carried out for political reasons in order to weaken the strong German influence.

In the two mandated parts of the Cameroons, the British part of which is joined up with the administration of the British colony of Nigeria, the Germans were ruthlessly expelled after the War, and it was only in 1925 that the German planters were able to reacquire their former possessions in the British part, including in particular the old plantations on the Cameroon mountain.

In the two mandated parts of the Cameroons, the cultivation of the oil palm is of far the greatest importance. The exports of palm kernels in 1935 amounted to about 40,000 tons, i. e. 20.6 %. Nine-tenths of these exports come from the French mandated territory. The exports of palm oil in 1935 amounted to about 8000 tons, of which four-fifths came from the French part. In addition to the cultivation of the oil palm, in the last few years the cultivation of groundnuts and sesame has developed favourably, though to a small extent, especially in the French part (1935: 7725 tons). The cultivation of cocoa in the French part and bananas in the British part has constantly extended; the cocoa exports from both territories rose from about 13,000 tons in 1929 to 27,500 tons or 30.5 % of the total exports, in 1935, while the banana exports rose from 1100 tons to 46,000 tons. This rapid development is the achievement exclusively of German farmers who now supply 40 % of the German requirements of bananas.

The production and export of rubber show an entirely different picture; in 1913 the exports of rubber represented 50 % of the total, but are now considerably lower.

For the production of useful and fine wood, the forests of the French mandated territory are of primary importance; the exports rose from about 25,800 tons in 1929 to 48,600 tons in 1934 (in the British part from 500 to 5000 tons).

In Togoland also the cultivation of the oil palm ranks first in the French mandated territory, as is evidenced by the constant increase in the exports of palm kernels and palm oil (the figures for 1935 being 13,100 and 2055 tons). The proportion of 42 % of the total exports reached in 1912 has, however, not been again attained. The cultivation of cocoa has made unusually rapid progress, and the total crops and exports, amounting to about 19,000 tons in 1934/35, represent an increase of nearly 50 times compared with the pre-war period (42 % of the total exports). There has been a steady though slow development in the cultivation of the cocoanut palm and in the exports of copra, mainly due to the fact that the plantations laid down by the German administration have in the meantime reached the bearing stage. The British mandated territory is under the administration of the British Gold Coast, and this has not a very favourable effect on the finances.

In New Guinea and the island territories, in which Germany worked hard for ten years to open up and develop completely unknown and inaccessible countries scattered far over the ocean, with a population living for the most part in the stone age, the authority granted by the Versailles Treaty to the mandatory Powers to expropriate the Germans and their possessions was utilised to the full.

While Japan immediately paid amounts up to 70 % of the agreed or fixed value, Australia and New Zealand, like all the other mandatory Powers, referred the expropriated owners to Germany for compensation.

In the plantations of New Guinea the cultivation of cocoanut palms (which were planted before the War but did not enter the bearing stage) ranks easily first, as shown by the increasing yield of cocoanuts (1934/35: 1600 with a value of £ 45,000) and copra, which amounted to about 59,000 tons in 1934/35. The exports of copra, amounting to 57,000 tons with a value of £ 361,000 have been about 60,000 tons since 1928, though the value has decreased by more than half on account of the decline in price (from about £ 13.10.10 in 1929 to £ 6.8.6 per ton in 1934).

As regards mining, the gold production started after the War has constantly gained in importance. No less than nine new workable alluvial gold deposits were prospected in 1934 and 1935 and entirely new primary gold deposits were discovered. Since 1931 the exports of raw gold have risen from 108,647 oz. with a value of about £ 400,000 to about 300,000 oz. with a value of nearly a million Pounds in 1934/35. From May 1921 to June 1935 the total gold exports were about 1,266,000 oz. with a value of £ 5,517,000. The communications between the coast and the mining districts are maintained by several air companies.

As the price of copra fell continuously until 1933/34, the centre of gravity in the total exports was entirely displaced in favour of gold, which accounted for 81 % in 1934/35 (1925/26, 2 %), while copra was only represented by 15 % (1925/26, 92 %).

"The native quarter in Daressalam lies immediately behind the town and is a convincing example of the thoroughness of the German system and the seriousness with which the Germans carried on their colonising work. The streets are fine and absolutely clean. For each house there is galvanised iron dustbin with a lid. And this in the middle of Africa. We should have expected rather to find it in an English town in which the health authorities have developed unusual thoroughness."

"As regards internal regulations, the German in Togoland may appear to be despotic when he issues laws in respect of domestic and even of personal cleanliness; a conserve tin thrown away behind the house, a broken jug half full of water — the abode of fever-carrying mosquitos — an uncleaned doorstep or a defective roof, will make the culprit liable to a fine of one Pound. The result is, however, that even the worst grumbler will find pleasure in a walk through Lome."

A particularly characteristic proof of the common interests of Great Britain and the Dominions of Australia and New Zealand is supplied by the island of Nauru, comprising about 22 sq. km., which, under the dictated Peace of Versailles, became an independent mandated territory; its enormous value lies in its deposits of phosphate which were estimated before the War at about 40 million tons. Their utilisation for the purposes of the British Empire is the exclusive object of the mandatory administration, in opposition to other colonial territories which, in addition to being the home country of the native population, are used for the cultivation of tropical plants and render possible the production of natural products and the extraction of mineral resources.

The exploitation of the enormous phosphate deposits by a British-Australian-New Zealand Condominium, the British Phosphate Commissioners, has assumed an entirely capitalistic form, and the quantities mined have, with certain fluctuations, shown a steady increase, namely from 326,000 tons in 1929 to 488,000 tons in 1935 with a value of £474,000. Except for a very small percentage, these quantities are shipped to Australia and New Zealand. It is quite obvious that such a policy of exploitation which places the Mandatory in the position of a monopoly, is entirely contrary to the meaning of the mandatory idea.

In the island territories of the Carolines, the Mariannes, the Marshall and Palau Islands, the main products are copra and sugar, while there is also a production of phosphates the export of which amounted in 1934 to 60,000 tons. The sugar exports amounted to 35,900 tons with a value of 10½ million yen.

In spite of its small area of only about 2600 sq. km., the mandatory territory of Samoa produces a larger yield for economic work than is generally assumed. In the first place there is the cultivation of cocoa nut palms, cocoa and bananas; the exports are increasing and amounted in 1934 to about £125,000, though the value had declined considerably as compared with previous years (£420,000 in 1928). The production of rubber, which was formerly considerable (the figures for 1927 to 1930 were approximately 160,000, 170,000, 110,000 and 100,000 tons) has entirely ceased since 1932.

The above account does not claim to describe in detail the economic development of the former German colonies since the existence of the mandatory system. The result is that, after overcoming the war period, and the almost worse post-war period, the productivity of the territories opened up by Germany has again risen and in some respects exceeded that of peace time.

Until the year 1929 there was an increase in the figures of foreign trade, since the imports amounted to 247 million RM. and the exports to 243 million RM., making a total of 490 million RM. for the colonies under foreign mandatory rule, as against 320 millions in 1913. There was thus a rise of 170 millions. This is certainly a notable achievement, but it nevertheless appears in a different light when compared with the growth of foreign trade in the German colonies in the last ten years before the War. From 1903 to 1913, it increased from 66 millions to 318 millions, and the exports alone from 25 millions to 161 millions. From this it may be concluded that, if the colonies had remained in German possession, the development would have been much greater than under mandatory rule. This also applies to the period after 1929, when the general world economic depression naturally affected the mandated territories as much as the other colonial countries and an improvement only took place in 1932.

The various changes in production and export, and the development of certain branches of production which have in some cases not, or only slightly, gone beyond the pre-war position, show that the resources in their own colonies more or less caused the mandatory Powers in the first place to take up only the production that was easiest and in the second place only to promote the production which was insufficient in their own colonies. The binding of the colonies to the mother country, as far as their requirements were concerned, made it necessary, especially in the French mandated territories, as far as possible only to promote such economic and production areas as supplemented the economic system of the mother country, and to check any competitive production. In a number of cases it has also been proved that planting and production, together with the entire economic organisation, were backward because the mandatory Power could not find in its own country sufficient people who were willing to go out as settlers. During the German period, geological investigations were also made in respect of deposits of raw materials. This exploration of the German colonies has scarcely been continued by the mandatory Powers. But the slight research that has been made has shown that the mining and geological development is still in the initial stages. Lastly the comparatively small extension of the system of communications is with few exceptions also due to the fact that the economic interests of the mandatory Powers are of a secondary nature, since their own colonies also in some cases contain wide expanses of virgin soil.

When, in addition to these factors, it is also considered how much was destroyed in the first eight or ten years after 1914, it must be admitted, in view of what has nevertheless been accomplished, that the prophecies of a great future for the German colonial possessions have merely been confirmed. That has been to a great extent recognised and also expressed by the present administrators of the former German possessions. There is for instance a speech in the Chamber by the French Colonial Minister Perrier on December 17th, 1925, in which he opposed the project of handing over the French African mandates to Germany which had been raised in connection with the Locarno negotiations. He said that Togoland and the Cameroons were the colonies from which France's liberation from the economic point of view might come. We have reproduced above the recent statement by the Deputy Archimbaud.

But something else has been proved in the course of the last few years. The economic progress made on former German soil has been obtained by the means which were formerly used by the German administration. The lines which Germany laid down for the development of the country were also considered by the new masters as the most suitable, and wherever German cultural institutions have fallen a prey to destruction, they have had no choice but to build them up again in the same form, though not always with the same value. The Mandatories of the League of Nations have had no other course—after disappointing experiments in new methods—than to return more and more to the German methods of development. The German agricultural schools, research institutes and experimental stations have proved indispensable, the sanitary measures for combating animal diseases and plant diseases were resumed, if at all, on the German model, and the means tried under the German administration for raising productivity have been again applied, as is made constantly clearer by every fresh report by the mandatory Powers. This recognition has also been given officially, for instance by the British Parliamentary Commission which visited German East Africa in the spring of 1925 and recognised the German colonial achievements as exemplary and noted with regret "the regrettable difference between the attitude of the British and the former German colonial authorities towards scientific research in the colonies". In the journal "West Africa" of June 6th, 1925, a prominent British financier, the head of the Bank of British West Africa, after travelling through the Cameroons, writes as follows in his report: "I must confess that the Germans worked on the plantations with their usual thoroughness, and I wonder what high degree of development would have been reached at present, if the Germans had remained uninterruptedly since 1914." Such remarks, which are not isolated, contain the best justification for German colonising activity as it really was, and the strongest condemnation of the pretences on the basis of which the German colonial possessions were taken away.

In order to prove the incorrectness of the assertion that the former German colonies are either a "luxury" or a "burden", it is necessary to consider somewhat more closely the dimensions of the economic relations between Germany and her colonies which are now under mandatory rule.

A fairly clear idea of this problem is obtained by comparing the requirements of a mother country in tropical colonial products of a vital kind with the quantities of goods of the same kind that are available for export from her overseas territories, and by drawing from the ratio thus obtained and from the volume of traffic in goods conclusions as to the economic significance of these relative figures.

An investigation of this kind was made by Dr. Weigelt, Director of the DD. Bank, in the "Berliner Tageblatt" of March 3rd, 1935, the result of which is given in the lecture by Herr Eicke, Director of the Reichsbank. This investigation shows that, even according to the position in 1934, the exploitation of the former German colonies would render possible the total supply of German requirements of some of their products, and that considerable quantities would still remain for disposal elsewhere.

This is most evident in the case of sisal hemp and mineral phosphates, in which the annual production is much greater than German import requirements. What advantages could be obtained for German agriculture and the German food supply by using on German soil all these quantities of phosphates, which it is at present impossible to obtain from these former German territories. The position is also very favourable as regards copra, which is not given separately in the table, but which would cover, for instance in 1933, no less than 77 % of the German import requirements. Next to these come bananas and cocoa, which would have covered in 1934 37 % and 35.6 % respectively of the import requirements. The percentage in the case of coffee is 9.4 % and in oils and fats 7.3 %. The great importance which might attach to gold and diamond mining is clearly shown by the table.

The figures in the table naturally do not exhaust the quantities and values of goods coming from the German colonies, and we have already proved in our inquiry that the existing quantities of production can be considerably increased.

The development which we have described and the examples which we have given of the economic progress in respect of similar foreign areas of production show that this possibility is a very real one. It is true that German colonial work could not immediately result in extremely high production figures. Nevertheless, it is wrong to describe what has been attained as an inadequate result of more than thirty years of colonial activity and therefore to dismiss the economic exploitation of the German colonies as a hopeless undertaking. In reality, of these thirty years, it has been possible to apply barely more than ten to the development of the German colonies according to a fixed plan, and in this period the value of their foreign trade increased sixfold and the value of the German trade with the colonies fivefold. The post-war figures of the mandatory reports show, moreover, that, in spite of all obstacles, this development was only the beginning of a rising curve.

But if the production of raw materials in the colonial territories to be developed by Germany could not be raised to such great amounts that, as is quite possible, the territorial distribution of the world production of important raw materials could be decisively changed and new sources of raw materials might come to the fore, there is a much more tangible possibility that German national economy might derive immediate advantage from its own overseas work, i. e. the direct connection between the production of raw materials and the transforming industry, a form of organisation of mixed economic industries which already exists in economic life.

No one can seriously deny that the possession of colonies would result in a considerable improvement in the German raw material position and a corresponding alleviation of the position in respect of foreign exchange.

For the economic importance of colonial possessions is by no means restricted to the question of raw materials.

The advantages offered by colonies as a market for the industry of the mother country are particularly striking in a period when preference duties have been introduced in a considerable part of the world. From the point of view both of trade and foreign exchange, there are some widespread misapprehensions which should be cleared up in respect of the results to be expected and the functioning of trade with such German colonial territories.

The value of the total foreign trade amounts to very considerable sums, and it is of great interest to observe the amount of Germany's share in the foreign trade of her colonies under mandatory rule in the course of recent years.

G. = Exports of Foreign Goods; the sign — means no share whatever in the trade in question; the sign . means that the share cannot be ascertained or is not known; 0.0 is inserted when the share in the trade in question cannot be expressed in figures.

A cursory glance at the figures contained in this table shows that Germany has been almost or entirely excluded from trade with certain mandated territories.

In addition, it shows to what extent Germany is compelled to pay to foreign economic systems for necessary or indispensable colonial products from her former colonies, since the value of exports from Germany to the mandated territories is in general insufficient to pay for the imports.

The most important change among countries participating in the trade with East Africa is the far-reaching exclusion of Germany, whose share in imports and exports in 1912 was more than half, while after the War her share in the trade of Tanganyika exceeded 10% only in very few years; in 1935 she supplied 10.6% of the imports of Tanganyika and took 8.1% of the imports. The trade of Great Britain benefited most from the exclusion of Germany. Her share of the imports jumped from 4.9% in 1912 to 42.3% in 1930, and only began to drop in 1931 until it reached 29.0% in 1935, when it was pressed back by the Japanese export offensive which was particularly successful on the East Coast of Africa. Japan's share of the imports rose from 6.7% in 1930 to 21.9% in 1935. Trade from British India and the Netherlands lost greatly as from 1931, also mainly in favour of Japan (from 17.2% and 8.9% respectively in 1925 to 4.9% and 1.5% respectively in 1935).

The markets of Tanganyika include the British neighbouring colonies of Kenya and Uganda, to which only a very small part of the exports went before the War; they rank first and take on an average over a quarter (1935: 25.6%) of the exports, though the traffic is almost entirely a transit trade. The second place is taken by Great Britain, which raised her share from 10.7% in 1912 to 23.1% in 1935. Belgium is the next most important market (1935: 11.3%); British India ranks fourth with a greatly increased share of the exports (10.4%).

In the imports of Ruanda-Urundi, Belgium, Great Britain, British India and Tanganyika have lost ground in the last ten years (from a total of 73% in 1927 to 35% in 1934), mainly to Japan which supplied only 1.6% of the imports in 1927, but 33.7% in 1934, i.e. almost twice as much as Belgium (18.5%). The United States of America and the Netherlands Indies have also increased their exports to the territory. In 1934, Germany's share of the imports was 6.7%. In 1934, 94% of the exports from Ruanda-Urundi went to Belgium.

The regional changes in the foreign trade of South-West Africa consist almost entirely in the exclusion of Germany by the Union of South Africa and Great Britain. In 1935 almost 50% of the exports went to Great Britain and about 30% to the Union. As regards the supply of goods to South-West Africa, South Africa ranks first—with an average of over 70% since 1931—while Great Britain has in recent years only supplied 4 or 5%. Germany supplied four-fifths of the import goods before the War; in 1925 her share was still 26%, but was reduced by 1935 to 13%. On the other hand Germany has gained ground as a market for South-West Africa in recent years; in 1934 she took about 20% of the exports as against approximately 3% in 1926; in 1935 her share declined to about 13%, mainly as a result of the door to South-West Africa being opened wide to the Union of South Africa and the other British possessions by the Ottawa agreements.

The position was better in the British mandated territory of the Cameroons; Germany's share in the imports in 1935 amounted almost to half, while she took the main part of the exports. In the French mandated territory, France's share of the imports rose rapidly and amounted in 1934 to 35.4%, while her share of the exports was 54.3%. Germany's share (far behind Great Britain and the United States and rapidly falling) amounted to only 7.7% of the imports, while her share of the exports was 18% (second after France, but rapidly declining).

Among the countries supplying the imports of the French mandate of Togoland, Great Britain easily ranks first with 34%, while France (11%) and the United States follow at a considerable distance. Germany's share in the imports is uncommonly small (6.5% in 1935), and this is all the more evident since the cessation of reparation deliveries in previous years (27% in 1931). As a purchaser of Togoland products, Germany accounts for 20% and ranks second after France and her colonies (50 to 60%). The payment of these products which greatly exceed in value the exports to the Cameroons and Togoland naturally represents a burden for the German foreign exchange account. In the British mandated part of Togoland, it is impossible to get a picture of Germany's share in the foreign trade, as the British mandatory reports only give figures regarding trade via the Franco-British mandatory frontier.

In New Guinea the countries belonging to the British Empire have in the last three years supplied far more than half the total imports, and Australia easily ranks first. Germany's share, which was equivalent to that of the United Kingdom in 1930/31, dropped considerably in 1932/33 and rose slightly in 1934 (5 %). The share of the United States has greatly increased and has almost doubled since 1930/31. The foreign trade of the Japanese mandatory islands is carried on almost exclusively with Japan, which is a good customer for the products of the islands and is in a position to supply all their requirements. The most important suppliers and customers of Samoa are New Zealand, Australia and the United Kingdom. Since the War Germany has supplied practically no goods.

The above short review of the commercial relations between Germany and her colonies again shows clearly and unequivocally what has been proved before, namely that the principle of the "open door", i. e. participation especially in import trade, has been maintained, it is true, for the mandatory Powers but not for Germany. The figures of trade statistics show that the great colonial empires obtain their raw materials as a matter of course from the colonies, and they also demonstrate how much more easily they find a market for the products of their industry through their influence and the requirements of the administration.

The statement made by The Economist on November 16th, 1935, applies not only to England: "Trade to some extent follows the flag, even without compulsion. A colony administered and brought up by the English will always give the preference to British goods. Contracts for public works in the colonies will naturally go to the mother country."

All proposals put forward as a substitute for the transfer, or, more correctly, the re-transfer, of the German colonies under foreign mandate to Germany, do not touch on the main point of the German raw material problem. The German lack of raw materials is not caused by the lack of raw materials in the world, or by the refusal of the colonial Powers to sell them, but by the lack of sufficient foreign means of payment in order to pay for the raw materials obtained from abroad. "It would be idle and unconstructive merely to state that colonial raw materials are at the free disposal of all who can pay for them, when it is clear on the other hand that certain countries for various reasons do not possess the necessary means of payment. Even within national tariff and currency areas raw materials must naturally be paid for. But purchases outside such areas, unless there is a certain system of barter, must be paid for in foreign currency, which can only be obtained by the export of goods or services, by drawing on foreign credit or by the transfer of gold or securities. So long as there are obstacles to international trade which do not exist for the home trade, it will always be easier to purchase raw materials within one's own currency area, although the importance of this factor can be easily overestimated."

With regard to this view expressed in the inquiry of the Royal Institute of International Affairs, we would add that it is not correct to state that it is indifferent whether products come from one's own colonies or from foreign countries, since they must be paid for at the world market price. It is not at all the same, for what the mother country imports from its own colonies is paid for in its own currency. The payment is made by the supply of goods to the colonies, of which the mother country will always deliver a considerable part, supplemented under certain circumstances by receipts from capital investments made by the mother country in the colonies. Everything takes place in the currency of the mother country. There can be no transfer difficulties, since no transfer in foreign currency is required. There is no doubt that Germany's transfer difficulties would be removed to the extent that she could import raw materials from her own colonies. For payment would be made in German currency and would be compensated by the delivery of industrial commodities to the colonies and by services.

The German raw material problem, which finds expression in the foreign exchange account, cannot be solved except by the supply of raw materials in the German currency sphere. How is Germany to buy raw materials under the system of the "open door", when she requires foreign exchange for the purpose? And how can the principle of the "open door" make it possible to export German products for an additional value of several hundred million Reichsmarks a year to the tropical raw material territories? As Germany is willing to take up colonial work in tropical territories, she may point out at the same time that by this work the foreign exchange position of the Reich would be alleviated and it would be possible to transfer the foreign debts which must be present be held over. The greater the possibility for Germany to obtain raw materials from the colonies by her own work and her own goods, the greater will be the saving of foreign exchange which will thus be set free for the transfer of the debts. The colonial commercial policy should also be regarded from these wider interests of the States concerned.

When it is stated in reply to this that Germany could adjust the deficit with the colonies in the greater economic possibilities of the mother countries, such as England and France, with which she has a favourable balance of trade, this is poor consolation. For the incapacity of Germany to transfer debts and to establish a proper balance of payments shows that this method of adjustment is inadequate.

In any case, if Germany—as she must do—regards the question of raw materials as a vital question, no one has a right to reject the German demands unless he is prepared to indicate other solutions. Up to the present, however, no opponent of Germany's colonial claims has been able to state or to show how Germany's production of raw materials can be guaranteed except by the future development of her own resources.

Neither the numerous previous attempts nor the Geneva negotiations based on Sir Samuel Hoare's proposal of September 1935 have hitherto shown the faintest sign of a solution, but have intentionally or unintentionally served the purpose of indefinitely postponing such a solution.

The Geneva Raw Materials Negotiations

For the past seventeen years the problem of raw materials and their distribution has been on the agenda of the League Assemblies and Council which have hitherto vainly tried to find a solution. Whenever international commissions have made an inquiry, they have either found before the end of their investigations that the position on the world market has again changed or the deliberations have been broken off because the proposals brought forward have been in many ways defeated by the selfishness of the possessors of such materials. The records were then buried in the archives of the Secretariat.

Fire was first opened by the Italians in March, 1919, during the Peace Conference. A special raw materials committee discussed the matter for a long time without any practical result, and the Supreme Economic Council and other committees were unable in 1919 and 1920 to make any other recommendations than a reduction of customs barriers. On October 25th, 1920, again on Italian initiative, the League of Nations decided to take positive steps. But, as usual, a high-sounding resolution was the result, and the entire question remained in abeyance until the International Economic Conference in the year 1927. The agreement reached on that occasion on November 8th regarding the abolition of prohibitive import and export duties and restrictions, however, never received the necessary number of accessions to bring it into force. An agreement was, however, concluded in 1928. It related to access to the raw materials — hides, skins and bones. In 1929, the question of raw materials was again brought before the Assembly by Italy, but again without success. The extent of the failure of the 1933 Conference for which such elaborate preparations were made is still within the memory of all.

Italy then decided to solve the question on her own account by the conquest of Abyssinia. This then led to the famous proposal which Sir Samuel Hoare made on September 11th, 1935, during the Sixteenth Assembly of the League of Nations and which was again taken up a year later, on September 25th, 1936, at the Seventeenth Assembly by his successor Mr. Eden and described as ripe for discussion. On October 10th it was decided to create a Committee and the Council of the League was instructed to appoint and convene it. This took place on March 8th, 1937. The members taking part were representatives of Great Britain, Japan, Switzerland, the Soviet Union, the United States, South Africa, Czechoslovakia, Brazil, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Sweden and Belgium.

A basis for the discussion had been prepared by the Secretariat in a memorandum which, after a short historical account of the previous action of the League, gave lists of raw materials of essential and secondary importance and a list of the percentage of production of the colonial Powers, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and also of the United States and the U. S. S. R. This list clearly shows the poverty of Germany in raw materials. Lastly, the memorandum gave an analysis of the proposals and suggestions contained in public statements and investigations since 1935.

1. The surest and most effective remedy for the dangerous position brought about by inequality in the distribution of, and access to, raw materials would be a revival of commercial exchanges through the abolition of the obstacles at present placed in the way of the international circulation of goods.

2. The establishment of an effective Open Door régime in all colonial territories.

3. The transformation of the colonies into mandated territories or the transfer of colonial administration to an international authority.

4. The international organisation of the distribution of the world's raw materials with control over such materials.

5. The conclusion of international agreements under which the distribution of raw materials would be secured through reciprocal exchanges of goods or services or the conclusion of general international agreements under which all countries would enjoy equality of treatment in all markets — or at least in all colonial markets — as regards both the sale of their own goods and the purchase of local goods.

6. The general adoption of the practice of certain cartels to admit consumers' representatives to a seat on the controlling body.

7. The formation of chartered companies to organise and develop colonial territories administered by other States; the creation of an International Bank for carrying out large-scale financial plans in order to guarantee to certain States free access to raw materials; the formation of a Mines and Forest Trust administered by the League of Nations, with the twofold object of guaranteeing joint control and free circulation of raw materials, and also their conservation.

This memorandum had a curious fate. Some delegates thought it dealt with the question onesidedly, i. e. too favourably for the countries which complained of the irregular and unjust distribution of raw materials. It was therefore regarded not as a basis but merely as information for the negotiations. No copies were given to the press and M. Avenol, the Secretary General, moreover stated in his opening speech that it did not reproduce the view of the Secretariat, which had "no view to express". Lastly the public were excluded from the discussions and the press was consoled by communiqués which were to keep them informed of the proceedings. In order not to commit the Governments, it was decided from the outset that the members of the Committee were acting merely on their own behalf (à titre privé) in order, it was said, that they might express their opinions "in complete freedom". All the speakers then introduced their remarks by stating that they would not speak on behalf of their Governments and would not represent their countries.

We have reported on page 103 how the British representative, Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, complied with the request for a free exchange of views.

It is worth while to study this speech. The wording is admirable, though more for English ears than for a international body, not to speak of those who are poor in raw materials. We will not contest Sir Frederick's opinion that the world production of raw materials is sufficient for actual requirements; he no doubt wishes to imply that speculation played no small part in the rise in prices of raw materials. But the question at Geneva is — or at any rate should be — not whether the world produces too much or too little raw material, but whether the sources of raw materials in the world are reasonably distributed.

When Sir Frederick goes on to add that the British Government is prepared to increase certain raw materials in certain of its colonies, even if they were required by foreign consumers, this statement has nothing to do with the subject under discussion. But it is more to the point when he adds that the British Government cannot go beyond this.

For the subject under discussions is: In what manner can industrial countries which have difficulty in working and are short of foreign exchange and raw materials have access, without special expenditure of foreign exchange, to the raw materials which they require in order to give employment to their workers and contribute to the general prosperity of the world? To this there is only one reply: colonies. Sir Frederick is clever enough to admit that the supply of raw materials from one's own colonies offers certain advantages; otherwise he would lay himself open too easily to the question as to why, in that case, England is so interested in maintaining her own colonies and mandates. But he adds that in some cases Great Britain pays higher prices for certain raw materials from the colonies than on the world market. Obviously he is thinking exclusively of Pounds Sterling. If England did not count on the excess prices (in Pounds) paid to the colonies being indirectly of political and economic advantage to the Empire, London would certainly not pay these excess prices. Why should not the countries which are short of raw materials and which are referred to, with a mixture of condescension and pride, as the "have-nots", also use such arguments? For them, for instance for Germany, under present circumstances the account is paid not in Pounds, but for instance in Reichsmarks and foreign exchange—foreign exchange which is to a great extent lacking because the imports of German goods are prevented.

Against this argument, the principle of the open door has again been put forward; but Leith-Ross only recognises this idea very conditionally—and we also think it scarcely offers real guarantees—and demands "counter-services" from the purchasers of raw materials; he then proceeds to attack the import restrictions and the policy of certain countries that are short of raw materials. Germany was not expressly mentioned in this connection, nor was any other country, but everyone at Geneva observed that these remarks were aimed at Germany. As if she did not concentrate her imports so laboriously in particular in order to be able to pay properly for the necessary imports of raw materials.

It is not quite clear why Sir Frederick, at the end of his speech, found it necessary to enter into the question of artificial raw materials. That Germany was again meant is clear from the fact that the speaker used the expression "Ersatzstoffe" which, since the desperate exertions of the War, has been included in the dictionary of the nations with a distinct German flavour. For Germany, in view of the achievements of German science and technique, these artificial raw materials long ago became national materials with good qualities for exchange against old materials and with new qualities of economic and technical progress. These remarks by the British expert were, however, somewhat imprudent. For England in particular produces synthetic fuel on a great scale (some 100,000 tons) and cellulose wool (10% of the world production), not to speak of artificial silk. England ranks third in the world as a producer of artificial press materials to the United States and Germany. England goes in a good deal for "Ersatz". This fact leads to the question as to why Sir Frederick calls these synthetic materials a greater burden on the national economy than the purchase of natural products: because in these arguments he is constantly thinking in Pounds Sterling.

For if England really pays more than the world market price for her colonial products, it is logical that Germany should at any cost promote her artificial materials; for she calculates in Reichsmarks. The meaning of the German colonial claim is to be able to operate in Reichsmarks, since Germany cannot find a sufficient guarantee in a foreign exchange agreement corresponding to her capacity in manufactured goods.

The British press regarded Sir Frederick's speech as a definitive refusal of the German colonial claim. The speaker endeavoured, however, very skilfully to avoid the real subject, i. e. again to evade any real decisions.

That the representative of South Africa should agree with his British colleague is entirely natural.

The only clear statement was made by the representative of Japan, who threw into the scale the weight of a population of a hundred millions crowded into a very narrow space. Japan demands the suppression of all attempts to form raw material monopolies, freedom of emigration for the nationals of all countries to territories that are still undeveloped, and freedom of trade which should not be separated from the question of the distribution of raw materials.

The Polish representative also raised the demographic problem of the 34 million inhabitants of Poland with its annual increase of 450,000. He attached special importance to the consideration of financial and currency questions and the question of colonial raw materials.

It was reserved for Mr. Rosenblum, the representative of the Soviet Union, to make a definite attack on the countries which "though they have no money to pay their debts, have money to build guns in order to unleash the next war". Russia's only interest is the organisation of peace. It is a very great and a very rich country that does not claim any territory in other countries, does not demand the exploitation of foreign territories and asks for no special advantages in the access to raw materials. It has of course everything, voilà tout.

After a number of other speeches had been made (the French representative had not put in an appearance), the Chairman of the Committee noted that the Committee was agreed that all questions relating to a redistribution or a transfer of colonial territories were not within its competence. On March 12th, the discussion was concluded with the appointment of three sub-committees, one for the collection of statistics on the production, imports and geographical distribution of industrial and food raw materials, and the other two for examining complaints and difficulties arising out of the supply, purchase and payment of raw materials.

The Committee had, however, the courage to state that, in view of its restricted terms of reference, it could not say whether it was in a position to make suitable proposals for solving the question.

Germany and Italy did not take part in the discussions. They were continued in June.

It can hardly be said that the start was very promising.

What hopes and expectations may be coupled with the work of the League of Nations in connection with the problem of raw materials? Prof. Dr. Ludwig von Mises gives the following reply to this question in the June number, Vol. III, No. 1, of the "New Commonwealth Quarterly," London, Constable & Co.:

In the political sphere the League of Nations has completely failed in its present form of organisation. There is no point in deceiving oneself in this matter or, for the sake of misplaced courtesy, hesitating to speak the truth against the persons responsible. The League Secretariat, it is true, continues to work, the statesmen still come to Geneva for meetings of the Assembly, the Council and Committees, but the great political negotiations are carried on at the side. The League of Nations deals with questions which, however important they may be, in themselves, are of minor importance compared with the main task allotted to it. The Secretariat publishes interesting statistical records, which could, however, be prepared equally well by an international organisation of statistical offices.

But now the League is again faced with a task which is in line with its duty of ensuring the peace of the world. Leading statesmen have publicly mentioned abuses which cause them to describe the present political order of the world as unsatisfactory. They have described the "unequal distribution" of raw materials as a serious disadvantage for their people. While affirming their love of peace, they have stated that there is nothing they desire more than that their complaint may be settled in a peaceful manner. These statements have made a deep impression on the public opinion of the whole world. In the face of such a state of affairs, the League of Nations must

"The hygienic measures of the German Government in Rabaul and elsewhere are being continued by the new authorities. They are characteristic of the 'thoroughness' for which the Germans and especially German science are justly famous. The two German doctors in Rabaul, both men of great knowledge, look after not only the European hospital but also a comfortable and well equipped native hospital outside the town on the road to Herbertshöhe. They are also responsible for the other natives living near Rabaul and visit the various centres to carry out small-pox vaccination, medical attendance and supervision. The conditions created by the Germans in Herbertshöhe and Friedrich-Wilhelms-Hafen are similar though on a smaller scale, and one of my pleasantest memories is the interesting morning I spent in visiting the native hospital at Herbertshöhe under the friendly guidance of the amiable and capable German doctor who was proud to show everything that was done for the health and well-being of his patients."

not keep silent. If it did so, then it would really be wiser to do without the League altogether.

It was, moreover, quite indicated that the League should take up the problem of raw materials. It is, however, another question whether the method chosen for its treatment was the best.

The League of Nations must not be a debating club or a statistical seminary. It must not regard it as its duty to compile data from the available statistical information regarding raw materials, to present them in print and then to discuss them. It is natural that the Secretariat must prepare for the discussions of the Committees by providing all available materials. But that has nothing to do with the actual work that has to be done.

What is necessary is a discussion for and against the complaints raised. This discussion should take place in the full light of publicity. No word spoken about these matters in the League of Nations should be concealed from the world. A properly organised press service should see that the discussions are known everywhere by the press and broadcasting. It is quite incomprehensible why the press representatives are kept out of the meetings of the Committees. What secrets are there in this sphere, which should not be made public?

It is not only representatives of the Governments who should be allowed to speak before and in the Committee. Of more importance than the Government representatives, whose freedom of action is hindered by their diplomatic task, are the free experts who should be brought in without regard to their nationality.

In general, the importance of the question of personality should not be under-estimated. The League work should not result merely in the production of a further mass of League documents which will be buried in archives and libraries. It must move the world; it must be effective. But it can only do this by the strength of the personalities who find expression in it.

It cannot be denied that such a procedure would make a break with the former diplomatic and bureaucratic tradition of the League. But the League of Nations was not intended by its creators to be an official department or a fortress of diplomatic sophistry or unwieldy treatment of business. It was intended to replace the antiquated methods of secret diplomacy by a procedure more in accordance with democratic demands.

That it has not fulfilled these expectations is one of the reasons for its failure. It is an intolerable position that there is more interest to-day in everything except what goes on in the spacious rooms of the Palais des Nations, and that scant attention is paid to the utterances in the meetings of the League of Nations. All States are arming feverishly, all statesmen are on the move in order to secure for their country the best possible position in the new war that threatens. The League of Nations can only do one thing: it must openly discuss the materials of conflict. It must show them to the world in their true form, and must raise the question: how is it possible that a war can do any good?

The League of Nations must not be content to be an official department which regards it as its most important duty to give as little offence as possible to the Governments of the fifty or more Member States. It must endeavour to become a moral instance which is taken seriously by the world. Its committees, which have more freedom than the Assembly and Council, which consist of official Government representatives, must be a sort of world parliament. Here the differences must not be hushed up by fine speeches; here the struggle between the nations must be openly settled in spirit with the greatest passion and with the full use of all available arguments. It must not be regarded as the duty of the committees to puzzle out draft international agreements which either mean so little that it is useless to ratify them or that they never get as far as ratification. Under present circumstances the League of Nations has the sole possibility of exercising a moral effect by furnishing information. Only narrow-minded bureaucrats will regard the moral successes that could be accomplished as less important than the accurate drafting of documents which only come to the knowledge of bureaucrats and diplomats.

The importance of what is taking place in the Raw Materials Committee of the League of Nations should not, therefore, be under-estimated. Here the League of Nations has an opportunity—perhaps for the last time—of playing a decisive part in world policy. Here the League may show whether it is in a position to take part in the appeasement of the world. The reform of the League cannot start with a change in the provisions of the Covenant. Deeds, not paragraphs, are decisive. As an office at the side of a thousand other offices, as a debating forum at the side of a thousand other debating societies, as a publisher of writings at the side of a thousand other publishers, it is truly superfluous.

C. The British Standpoint on the Colonial and Raw Material Question

I. The raising of the problem by Sir Samuel Hoare at Geneva

Extract from the Speech by Sir Samuel Hoare, British Foreign Secretary, at the Sixteenth Session of the League Assembly on September 11th, 1935

It is not enough to insist collectively that war shall not occur or that war, if it occurs, shall be brought to an end. Something must also be done to remove the causes from which war is apt to arise. Some other means than the recourse to arms must be found for adjusting the natural play of international forces. I do not underrate the delicacy of the task. Not every demand for change deserves to be listened to. Too often the artificial excitement of national feeling is made the excuse for the repudiation of an obligation or for a threat of force. Yet the world is not static, and changes will from time to time have to be made. The Covenant itself admits this possibility. But such changes will have to be made when they are really necessary and when the time is ripe, and not before; they will have to come about by consent and not by dictation, by agreement and not by unilateral action, by peaceful means and not by war or threat of war. The members of the League must address themselves to this as well as to other aspects of security if the rule of law in international affairs is to be established and confirmed.

I have now tried to describe the aims of the League and the conditions in which the League is actually working. I have tried to describe once again the British attitude towards the League.

I have spoken in particular of the sincerity of our ideals. The sincerity springs, I admit, from enlightened self-interest, but it springs also from an enlightened interest in what we believe to be best for all. Let me illustrate what I mean by enlightened self-interest, and I will choose as my illustration a question that is exercising the minds of many people and many Governments.

I will take as an example the problem of the world's economic resources and the possibility of making better use of them in the future. Abundant supplies of raw materials appear to give peculiar advantage to the countries possessing them. It is easy to exaggerate the decisive character of such an advantage, for there are countries which, having little or no natural abundance, have yet made themselves prosperous and powerful by industry and trade. Yet the fact remains that some countries, either in their native soil or in their colonial territories, do possess what appear to be preponderant advantages; and that others, less favoured, view the situation with anxiety. Especially as regards colonial raw materials, it is not unnatural that such a state of affairs should give rise to fear lest exclusive monopolies be set up at the expense of those countries that do not possess colonial empires. It is clear that in the view of many this is a real problem. And we should be foolish to ignore it. It may be that it is exaggerated. It may be also that it is exploited for other purposes. None the less as the question is causing discontent and anxiety the wise course is to investigate it, to see what the proposals are for dealing with it, to see what is the real scope of the trouble, and if the trouble is substantial to try to remove it.

The view of his Majesty's Government is that the problem is economic rather than political and territorial. It is the fear of monopoly—of the withholding of essential colonial raw materials that is causing alarm. It is the desire for a guarantee that the distribution of raw materials will not be unfairly impeded that is stimulating the demand for further inquiry. So far as his Majesty's Government is concerned, I feel sure that we should be ready to take our share in an investigation of these matters.

The Government that I represent will, I know, be prepared to take their share in any collective attempt to deal in a fair and effective way with a problem that is certainly troubling many people at present and may trouble them even more in the future. Obviously, however, such an inquiry needs calm and dispassionate consideration, and calm and dispassionate consideration is impossible in an atmosphere of war and threatenings of war.

Extract from Mr. Eden's maiden speech in the House of Commons, February 24th, 1936

I must make it clear that his Majesty's Government have in no way withdrawn from the proposal of my right hon. friend the member for Chelsea (Sir Samuel Hoare) on this subject. They are perfectly willing at any time to enter into an examination of this subject, and they think that such an examination could usefully be held at Geneva. The appropriate moment, however, for such an examination must clearly depend on many factors, including the attitude of other Powers towards the proposals. Useful though we believe such an examination would be, I think that the House would be mistaken if it were to imagine that from a pursuit of it we should discover some magic touchstone for all our ills. Clearly it is not so. The international situation is much more complex than that, but this problem may be an element in our difficulties, and therefore I repeat that his Majesty's Government are willing at any time to enter into an examination in an attempt to remove it.

II. Extracts from the Parliamentary Debates

House of Commons May 3rd, 1935

Sir John Simon.—Apart from the objection that the Covenant was in Herr Hitler's view tied up with the treaty of Versailles, this further objection was very strongly insisted on. Japan, it was said, had left the League and yet she still had the administration of a former German colony. If Germany was to be regarded as not fit to administer any colony where was the equality? And to that, as he and Mr. Eden pointed out, we surely had a good answer which reasonable men should consider. The distribution of mandates was not a question for any individual member of the League. The distribution of mandates was a question for the League itself.

Sir A. Chamberlain.—No; certainly not.

Sir J. Simon agreed that it was not originally.

Sir A. Chamberlain.—Surely this is very important. If my right hon. friend's words stood unqualified as he has spoken them, it would give rise to a wholly false impression and indicate a new departure on the part of the Government. The mandates were allotted by the Powers at Versailles. The territories mandated were placed under the guardianship of the League. It has never been held or pretended that it was within the power of the League to transfer a mandate from one country to another.

Sir J. Simon said that he was very much obliged. He did not think, although he was sorry that he should have stated his point not quite accurately, that he conveyed any false impression, for his right hon. friend and himself made it perfectly plain that the transfer of mandates was not a discussable question; and they left the German Chancellor under no misapprehension as to their position in the matter. He was led to make an inaccurate observation—he was glad to be corrected—because it appeared to him that this view that Germany was in a position of inferiority in this matter was a contention which, having regard to the structure of which we wanted Germany to form part, surely could not be maintained.

House of Commons, December 12th, 1935

Colonel Wedgwood asked the Prime Minister whether he could give an assurance that neither Tanganyika nor any other British colony would be transferred from British sovereignty, save with the consent of all classes, creeds, and races, within the territory primarily affected.

Mr. Baldwin.—The right hon. gentleman can hardly expect me to give such a categorical assurance in reply to such a purely hypothetical question. I can, however, assure the right hon. member that no British territory and no territory under British protection or mandate would be transferred from British sovereignty or authority without the fullest regard being had to the interests of all sections of the population in the territory concerned.

Colonel Wedgwood.—Does that apply to the Protectorates of South Africa?

Mr. Baldwin.—I think the answer is entirely comprehensive.

House of Commons, February 6th, 1936

Mr. Lansbury called attention to the question of peace and of the need for a new world conference to consider the supply of raw materials and the provision of markets; and moved:

That this house affirms its profound belief in the futility of war, views with grave concern the world-wide preparations for war, and is of opinion that, through the League of Nations, his Majesty's Government should make an immediate effort for the summoning of a new international conference to deal with the economic factors which are responsible, such as the necessity for access to raw materials and to markets and for the migration of peoples, with a view to arriving at an international agreement which will remove from the nations the incentive to pile up armaments and establish the peace of the world on a sure foundation.

Dr. Salter seconded the motion. He said that we were witnessing to-day in Europe and Asia events and movements among people similar to those which in the past had altered the destiny of the world. The fundamental cause and the urge which had produced those movements were operating to-day. Was there any actual justice in the claims of Japan, Italy, and Germany that they were unable to live because they could not get either food or raw material, while other nations had a super-abundance? He found from Sir Thomas Holland's book on the mineral sanction that out of a long and formidable list of commodities absolutely necessary for the full life of the modern State there were 25 essentials, none of which could be dispensed with. In the possession of these first prerequisites of modern life the British Empire had a predominating and overwhelming position. Out of the 25 essentials the Empire had adequate supplies in the case of 18, some supplies in the case of two, and none at all in the case of five. Japan had adequate supplies of three only of these essentials, some supplies of five, and of 17 none at all. Germany had adequate supplies of four, some of two, and of 19 none at all. Italy had adequate supplies of four and of 21 none at all.

If those facts were even approximately correct it meant that there was a group of nations that might legitimately describe themselves as the "have-nots" of the world. It could not be expected in these times that virile, enterprising, and spirited nations like those were likely to sit down quietly and accept the situation, to be restricted in self-development, and to be deprived of the actual necessities of modern civilized life, while many of their people were actually semi-starving.

We had to ask why it was that we possessed a sufficiency of these things. There could be only one answer, and that was, of course, because we were first in the field in seizing, often with brutal violence, territories that were delectable and exploitable. It was only human nature that the "have-nots" should endeavour to obtain some of the possessions of the "haves", and that the "have-nots" would combine among themselves to get some of these necessities of modern life.

A new war was certain unless there was a radical change in the economic policy of the Western nations, and particularly Great Britain. There must be a voluntary reorganization of the world. Coupled with that there must be some agreement as to the restoration, or partial restoration, of the free movement of populations which existed 30 or 40 years ago. Our present policy was, "What we have we hold". In view of the world's needs that seemed to him to be a policy of selfish greed. He believed that there was no necessity for such a clash as he had referred to, but he felt sure that time was pressing and a settlement could not be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. Lloyd George did not believe they would have peace in the world until they reconsidered mandates. Belgium with a population of 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 had got the best part of German East Africa. She had got the whole of the Congo. Portugal, with a small population, had got millions of square miles. Holland was in the same position.

Sir A. Chamberlain said that those were not mandated territories.

Mr. Lloyd George said that those countries had got tropical territory, and here they had got Germany with none and Italy with practically none. He did not believe they would make peace in the world until they met all the nations in a friendly spirit and said that the British Empire was prepared to reconsider the question of the mandates. He would plead with the Government first of all to consider whether the time had not come—and whether it ought not to be soon—when all the nations of the earth should be summoned together.

Mr. Amery said that surely Mr. Lloyd George knew that unless there was some measure of agreement as to what they meant to do at a conference before it was summoned it was doomed to futility. They saw the futility of the international conference of 1933. What hope was there, if they convened a conference to-day, of any of the powers concerned coming to the conference prepared to surrender any of their territory? What was the good of summoning a conference like that? Germany had a colonial Empire before the War, and it only played a very small part in her economic life. It only took a minute handful of settlers. Having lost it in a war which she herself provoked, why should she have a prior claim?

Referring to the mandated territories, he said that the essence of the mandate was our obligation and trust to the peoples concerned in those territories. Would it be better fulfilled by handing them over to Germany or any other Power that wished for a larger economic field? Why could not the countries faced with the economic difficulties enter into some economical arrangements with the great markets of Central Europe for mutual trade and mutual preference and thus follow among European countries the good example which the nations of the British Empire set to the world at Ottawa?

Sir H. Page Croft said that any Government that gave the impression that this country had become so weak-kneed as to offer to give back the mandated territories, or even all the Colonies, to the Mandate of the League of Nations would be kicked from power by an infuriated people. To talk about satisfying Germany's population and economic needs by handing over part of East Africa was no solution of the problem, for he did not believe that in the next 10 years the whole of tropical and semi-tropical Africa could absorb more than 100,000 white settlers. He did not think it was wise to tell this country or the world that these problems could be solved by any idea that the raw materials of the British Empire were going to be made more accessible. Let them consider that if they liked but do not let them raise false hopes. Nor was there any mandated territory where the British Empire was at present allowed to exercise its influence—except Palestine—where there was any hope of another country being able to solve its economic or population problems. Was it suggested that Palestine should be handed over to Germany? Nor did he think it was wise to consider for one moment the handing over, without their consent, of native populations at present under British rule to a foreign flag or any combination of flags. He believed that if a poll was taken of the natives in any country under the British flag they would express an almost unanimous desire to remain under the rule of the gracious Sovereign who have given them freedom, liberty, and justice such as they had never had before.

Viscount Cranborne. Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.—The third proposition in the motion was that, through the League of Nations, his Majesty's Government should make an immediate effort for the summoning of a new international conference to deal with economic factors. So far as the general aim was concerned the Government had no quarrel with the wording of the motion. But these question were not easy; they were exceedingly complex.

Could any of us say that the time was quite ripe for a new world economic conference? We had one in 1933, and that conference was not a success. It was a failure because the world was not ready for it. Could we honestly say that it was prepared for it at this moment—"immediately", in the words of the motion? He did not think so. If there was any failure it would not only be unfortunate, it would be disastrous. The time for the next step to be taken could not be fixed here and now this evening, it must depend on circumstances.

The Government were not shirking this issue. They all wished to arrive at international agreement which would remove from the nations the incentive to pile up armaments and establish the peace of the world on a sure foundation.

House of Commons, February 12th, 1936

Sir H. Page Croft asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he would give an assurance that his Majesty's Government had not considered, and was not considering, the handing over of any of the British Colonies, either under mandate or otherwise, to a foreign Power, and that they were not prepared to make British Colonies the subject of barter in any world conference.

Mr. Mander also had a question on the same subject.

Mr. Thomas.—No, Sir, his Majesty's Government has not considered, and is not considering, the handing over of any of the British Colonies or territories held under mandate.

Mr. Sandys.—Does the right hon. gentleman's statement refer equally to British Protectorates?

Mr. Thomas.—My answer covers the whole question of Colonies, Mandated Territories, and Protectorates.

House of Lords, March 25th, 1936

Lord Arnold called attention to the problem of Dominion and Colonial raw materials and also to the need, in view of the effects of the Ottawa Conference Agreements, for a return to freer trade in the fiscal arrangements of the British Empire, particularly having regard to the claims for economic expansion of Germany, Japan, and Italy.

The noble lord said that the British Empire owned about one-quarter of the world's wheat, one-half of the world's wool, more than half of the world's rubber, one-quarter of the world's coal, nearly one-third of the world's copper, about 94 per cent. of the world's nickel, and so on.

In these circumstances, it was not surprising that there was unrest in Germany, Japan, and Italy. It was true that Great Britain was probably the most peace-loving country in the world; that was because she had got all that she wanted. The central difficulty of the three nations was the same; they wanted freer access to markets abroad for the sale of their manufactured goods.

The question arose whether the problem of raw materials, vital as it was, was at the root of the trouble. The three dissatisfied nations had no difficulty in obtaining what they wanted of British Empire raw materials if they could pay for them. That meant if they could have bigger exports. Owing to tariffs and so forth it had become increasingly difficult for the three dissatisfied nations to sell sufficient goods abroad.

The system of preferences within the British Empire should be done away with, and the British Empire should go back to the policy of throwing its markets open on equal terms with its own nationals to all the countries of the world. Such a policy would do a great deal to remove from the minds of Germany, Japan, and Italy a sense of exclusion and grievance. The Ottawa Agreements had greatly increased the preferences for British goods entering the Dominions and Colonies.

It was said by supporters of the Ottawa policy that trade between Great Britain and the Dominions and Colonies had increased since 1932. Of course, it had increased, but the increase of Imperial trade had been achieved at the cost of foreign trade. But in general the increase in Imperial trade had been disappointing, and the policy had made for discord rather than harmony in the Empire. The dissatisfied foreign Powers saw the trade in which they might have had a share being diverted from them by the Ottawa policy, and if we were in their position we should feel as they felt. The British Government should not only urge that the Ottawa policy be reserved, and it would have the help of the Canadian Government. The adoption of the policy of reversal by Great Britain and the British Empire would be a real contribution to the alleviation of a serious, not to say menacing, situation.

Lord Lugard said that he did not share Lord Arnold's views on free trade in so far as the British Empire and the British Dominions in their own home markets were concerned, but he strongly supported the noble lord's appeal for a reversal to the policy of the open door in the non-self governing Colonies and protectorates. The trouble appeared to lie in the alleged difficulty in selling in the local markets. Germany had dissipated her credits in the foreign exchange markets by unprecedented expenditure on armaments. Italy and Japan had similarly been engaged in heavy war expenditure. Thus it was not surprising that there was little left for ordinary commercial expenditure.

The problem before them was how they could share the advantages enjoyed by the British Empire without compromising their pledges to the inhabitants, black and white. In British West Africa and Somaliland practically prohibitive quotas had been established against certain Japanese imports. Germany's contention was that she was unable to obtain the raw materials she required because she could not sell her goods in the local markets and thus obtain local currencies.

It seemed reasonable that the vendor of imported goods should purchase produce of the country into which the imports went, and that a proviso of this kind would not in any way contravene the principle of equal opportunity. To remove effectively any suspicion of monopoly and to share as far as possible the economic advantages the policy adopted should be on the lines of equal commercial opportunity as imposed by the African mandates.

Lord Redesdale said that he was one of those who considered it high time that some arrangement should be made whereby Germany should have some of her colonial territory restored to her. We harboured no hatred towards Germany; where such hatred existed it was bred of fear. Why should we take any part in the desire which apparently existed in Europe at the present time for the encirclement of Germany? For some reason which he had never been able to understand, we appeared to have taken our instructions in these matters from abroad. The general treatment of Germany did not appear to him to bear the stamp of British. Why could we not say to the other Powers that if they wanted to go on nagging at Germany they must do it alone?

There had been a tremendous amount of anti-Nazi propaganda going on in this country, some of it of a very doubtful character, and all of it bore the appearance of importation.

Whatever might be said against certain details of this administration, it was certain that Herr Hitler saved Germany from going Red, and for this, if for nothing else, he deserved the deepest gratitude not only of Germany or of Europe, but of the whole civilized world. In three years he had raised the people of Germany from absolute, black despair and restored to them their self-respect. Could anyone doubt his sincerity or his desire, expressed over and over again, to live in peace with his neighbours? He wanted to see this country take some step on its own account with reference to the restoration of colonial territory to Germany.

International conferences were too much like an auction. At such conferences Germany would certainly have to ask for more and take less than she deserved. Why could not we do something generous and big, and so create the sort of understanding which should exist, between two great nations?

Lord Noel Buxton said that the significance of Sir Samuel Hoare's utterance at Geneva last September had not been fully grasped by the public. None of them could have foretold that the Colonial question would then be raised, and anyone not in the highest authority who had raised it would have aroused strong resentment at doing so. Sir Samuel Hoare had forced the question into the front rank, and since he had done so he had repeated his case and led to a flood of debate on the subject and consequently to quite a revolution in public thought.

Why did Sir Samuel Hoare spring this surprise on the world? It could hardly have been his mere sense of the degree of injustice. Some more urgent cause must be sought for this surprising fact. Sir Samuel Hoare must have seen, as many men saw in the Colonial situation, elements of great danger and apparently the necessity not to defer its discussion any longer.

It was dangerous to let the situation drift. Even before the war the desire for colonies on grounds of prestige was keenly felt, and it was undoubtedly one of the causes of unrest that led to the war. Something more than return to freer trade was required, because it was part of the case of the dissatisfied Powers that they had no assurance of a continuance of access to the markets of the British Empire, and the best security of that kind would be extension of the mandate system. Such extension to the tropical colonies now in our possession would secure the open door that was the main genuine need of the dissatisfied Powers.

Acceptance by us of the mandate system for British colonies in Africa need not be regarded as a derogation of dignity, because we had always boasted that we were trustees of those lands for the natives and for the rest of the world. We must be ready to revise many of the ideas which we had long held.

The Earl of Plymouth, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, said that it was definitely the policy of the Government to do what they could to lower the barriers which were hindering world trade, and to do anything in reason to try to increase the flow of international trade throughout the world. The policy of the Government, however, must take into account the fact that the conditions in which the theory of free trade could be converted into practice did not exist at present. It was unthinkable that we should now adopt a policy of free trade unilaterally, or even that we should take any steps which would considerably lower the protective duties which we had to adopt as a result of the policy of other countries.

The Ottawa Agreements were not an intensification of protection, but rather a modification in the direction of freer trade over a very wide area. He did not agree that the abrogation of the Ottawa Agreements would result in freer trade. In the great majority of the African colonies, the position was controlled by certain treaties by which this country was bound. In all these territories Germany and Italy enjoyed exactly the same economic opportunity as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and there was no discrimination whatever.

The economic policy of the Dominions was, of course, a matter for the Dominion Governments. He could see no reason why, if the Ottawa Agreements were abrogated, those Empire countries which lost their preference would be likely to reduce their general tariff to non-Empire countries. The view of the Government definitely was that the Ottawa Agreements were not a step away from free trade, but a distinct step towards it, over a very large field—freer trade within the Empire.

The Government had hoped that a further step would be taken at the World Economic Conference in 1933. Unfortunately, their hopes were not fulfilled, but the Government were still anxious that the next step should be taken as soon as there was a reasonable prospect of success. It seemed to be somewhat doubtful whether at present there was such a prospect.

In his speech in the House of Commons last Friday, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs mentioned a proposal that a world conference should be held to consider, among other questions, the economic relations between the different nations. Clearly, that could not be brought about with any prospect of success unless the other Powers were willing and ready to come in and discuss those questions. His Majesty's Government were only too willing to cooperate with other nations to see what was possible to bring about a more satisfactory economic state of affairs throughout the world, but it was not possible for them, in the present circumstances, to take any unilateral action in regard to the matter which would have any useful result.

He did not think that Germany, Italy, and Japan would be satisfied by a return to freer trade. What they wanted was not equal trade, but, to all intents and purposes, exclusive opportunities over certain defined areas. Of the restrictions which had been placed on the trade of Germany and Italy it was fair to say that the majority were the result of their own deliberate policy. It had nothing to do with the Ottawa Agreements, nor anything else that this country had done or could do in the future.

The main difficulty facing these countries was that of obtaining foreign currency in sufficient quantities to cover their requirements of raw material. Germany, and Japan, and Italy could have all the raw materials they wanted from our Colonies on the same terms as our own friends—they should be prepared to pay for them. The fundamental necessity was to solve the difficulties of exchange and currency throughout the world, and that could not be done by abrogation of the Ottawa Agreements or by any action we could take by ourselves at the present moment.

It was unthinkable that we could withdraw the Ottawa Agreements; they did not stand in the way of freer world trade. The Government were ready to discuss way and means to that end when other countries showed any disposition to do so. The Government were prepared at the same time to discuss the availability of raw materials.

House of Commons, April 7th, 1936

Mr. Sandys asked the Prime Minister whether the declaration made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on February 12th, to the effect that his Majesty's Government had not considered and were not considering the handing over of British mandated territories to any other Power still represented the policy of his Majesty's Government.

Mr. Baldwin.—There has been no change in the attitude of his Majesty's Government in this matter.

Mr. Sandys.—In view of the existing anxiety, can the right hon. gentleman give us an assurance that this will continue to be the policy of the Government?

Mr. Baldwin.—I have answered the question on the paper; I have nothing more to say.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd asked if the right hon. gentlemen's attention had been called to a statement in the Press concerning a speech reported to have been made by the Under-Secretary (Lord Stanley) showing quite another point of view.

Mr. Baldwin said he saw many statements in the Press. He noticed one in the Daily Mail this morning, but the one he had just made was authoritative.

Mr. Churchill.—There was one more evil consequence which had arisen out of the policy which the Government had pursued. Sir S. Hoare, in his memorable speech at Geneva, made a declaration about raw materials which, though carefully guarded, did in fact bring up the whole colonial question. Where did we stand on the question of the return of the mandated colonies to Germany? The House ought to know. What were the principles by which the Government would be guiding in dealing with this matter in the future? The statements of Ministers were very conflicting. The Colonial Secretary made what seemed to him and many of his friends a very satisfactory statement in the context, in which it was uttered. But the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs was reported in the Press as having said, that on this matter he had an open mind. The late Minister without Portfolio (Lord E. Percy) in a speech said, that we must alter our conceptions of the British Empire and be prepared to make considerable concessions.

What did all that mean? What was the conviction of his Majesty's Government? Had they an open mind upon the future? Were they waiting to see who pushed the hardest? He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to give them a plain answer. Did he, or did he not, accept the view put forward the other day by Sir A. Chamberlain that there should be no question of handing over even mandated territories to Germany while race persecution was rife in that country?

Was it not a fact, also, that we could not in any case hand over these territories to Germany but only to the League of Nations, which alone could decide upon their future destiny? The Government must have a view, and they were bound to declare it to us.

We did not want to have another muddle about our colonies—similar to that into which we had been led about Abyssinia. We did not want to excite all sorts of hopes, and in this case arouse all kinds of appetites, and then, when it came to this issue, refuse point-blank to do anything effective. He hoped that they would be told that Sir A. Chamberlain rightly interpreted the view of the Government on this question.

Mr. Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:—In the first place, let me point out that there is a clear distinction between colonies and mandated territories. So far as I know no one has ever asked or suggested that the British Empire should give up any of its colonies, and I need hardly say that if such a demand were made, it could not possibly be entertained for a moment. Mandated territories are not colonies.

I think perhaps there is some confusion as to the way in which these mandated territories were allocated in the first instance and as to the manner in which it would be possible to alter the present arrangement. The mandated territories—the territories formerly belonging to enemy Powers—were allocated to the principal allied and associated Powers who voluntarily undertook a mandate from the League. By one of the articles of the Covenant they are bound to render a report from time to time to the League as to their administration of these mandated territories.

So far as I have been able to make out, it was not contemplated at the time that these mandates were allocated that there ever would be any change in these mandates. There is no provision made for the transfer of a mandated territory from the original mandatory Power to any other Power. I believe it may be taken that in order to effect a transfer, there will be at least required the assent of the mandatory Power, the Power to whom the territory was to be transferred, and finally the assent of the Council of the League of Nations.

The position of the Government of this country on this subject has already been made clear by the Colonial Secretary in answer to a question, when he said:

His Majesty's Government have not considered and are not considering the handing over of any of the British Colonies or Territories held under mandate.

As to what might happen in the future I think it would be unreasonable to ask me to attempt to pledge, even if I could do so, the action of future Governments, but I will say this, at any rate, the mandates are not held by this country alone. I cannot conceive that any Government would even discuss the question of the transfer of its own mandates quite irrespective of what was to happen to the mandates held by other countries. I would say in addition that we do recognize that we have definite obligations to the people who inhabit these territories and that we would not think of surrendering those obligations or handing those territories over to any other Power, even for the sake of obtaining that general peaceful settlement which all of us so much desire unless we were satisfied that the interests of all sections of the populations inhabiting those territories were fully safeguarded.

House of Commons, April 27th, 1936

Mr. A. Williams asked the Prime Minister whether, in order to prevent the development of an agitation inimical to the interests of peace, he would make a declaration that his Majesty's Government would not at any time consent to a transfer of the mandated territories.

Mr. Baldwin.—As there may be some misapprehension as to the conditions under which mandates are held and the circumstances in which their transfer could take place, I should like to make a short statement on the subject.

The mandated territories were allocated at the end of the War by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. The mandatories thus chosen accepted mandates from the League of Nations and undertook the specific obligations contained in Article 22 of the League Covenant and in the mandates themselves. These include the primary obligation to promote to the utmost the moral and material welfare and social progress of the inhabitants of the territories themselves.

There are no provisions, either in the Covenant or in the peace treaties or in the mandates relating to the transfer of a mandate from one Power to another Power, and no such transfer has ever been made. I am advised that before any such transfer could be effected it would be necessary that the consent, at any rate, of the present Mandatory Power and the Power to whom the territory was to be transferred, and also the unanimous consent of the League Council, should be secured.

I hope that what I have said will make it clear to hon. members that the question of the transfer of a mandate is one which, were it to be contemplated, would require the most careful consideration and which would be subjected to a procedure of a very elaborate nature. It is not a matter which could in any circumstances be the subject of a sudden and hasty decision.

As regards the policy of his Majesty's Government, I repeat once more in the most categorical terms that we have not considered and are not considering the transfer of any mandated territories to any other Power. I think that a great deal of the apprehension which hon. members claim exists on this subject must be due to a belief that his Majesty's Government have already been considering such a possibility, notwithstanding the denials which have been given, and that the House might at some stage be faced with a decision on the subject. This apprehension is unfounded. Hon. members may rest assured that his Majesty's Government have no intention whatever of raising the question themselves and that, in the event of any question arising regarding the future status of mandated territories, they would not commit themselves to any settlement of the problems at issue without giving the fullest opportunity for discussion in the House.

Mr. Thorne asked whether the inhabitants of mandated territories had any voice in the matter.

Mr. Baldwin said a completely reassuring reply had been given by the Secretary of State for the Colonies of that point. It was obvious that if a question of transfer ever did arise that would be a primary consideration.

Mr. Thurtle.—Is it not a fact that when the mandates were originally given to the Powers concerned the people in the respective territories were not consulted at all?

Mr. Baldwin.—I do not think that anybody was consulted at that time.

Miss Wilkinson.—May we take it that there is nothing in that reply which would preclude this country from taking part in any international conference called for the rearrangement of mandated territories if such was felt necessary for the maintenance of world peace?

Mr. Baldwin.—I would rather not enter at this moment into any very hypothetical questions.

House of Commons, July 9th, 1936

Mr. de Rothschild.—There was another question which was occupying the public mind at present, and that was the future of the mandated territories. He hoped that the Government through the Secretary for the Colonies was keeping in touch with the views of the natives on the important matter of the administration of the mandates and of the claims which had been put forward for the return of certain mandated territories to other Powers. The German claims had not been officially formulated as yet, but there was no doubt that they had been formulated already by Herr Hitler and some of his Ministers, and there could be no doubt that in some form or another they would shortly be put forward in a manner which would require the consideration of the Colonial Office.

If this question were considered apart from the wishes and interests of the native inhabitants it would be contrary to our duty as a mandatory Power and contrary to the system under which the mandates had been set up. We could not divest ourselves at will of the mandate clauses of the Treaty. There was only one case as yet where we had surrendered a mandate, and that was the case of Iraq. Native interests must, of course, be paramount both in regard to questions of present administration of the mandates and any question of transfer or return of mandated territories to another Power.

He could not imagine that natives would care to exchange British for Nazi rule, or that they would care to be ruled by German governors who would share Herr Hitler's view that the black man should always be subordinated to the white man. That theory was absolutely contrary to the mandatory system, which aimed at bringing native peoples gradually to share in their own government. He hoped that the Colonial Secretary would inform himself about native feeling in this matter, and would bring his influence to bear in those circles which would barter these mandates in order to buy off some foreign Power which threatened European peace. It would, however, be to the advantage of the native peoples if the technical branches of the mandate administration were opened to men of non-British nationality, so as to admit non-British doctors, architects, and bacteriologists.

Our colonial policy might well have justified some of the claims for colonies which were advanced on economic grounds. Since Ottawa we had sought deliberately to make colonial markets into a preserve for British trade, and this policy hampered other nations in the purchase of raw material. Had the fiscal policy of Ottawa been to the advantage of the Colonies themselves? The interest of the Colonies was to produce and sell as much as they could, and Great Britain could not supply a market for the whole of colonial produce. The effect of the restriction had been a reduction of the standard of life of the natives.

A result of the restrictions was that other nations were making themselves as independent as they could of colonial raw materials. They were manufacturing synthetic products, huge vested interests in these were springing up, and the demand for the produce of the Colonies was being reduced. The Colonies had everything to gain from the most free trade possible. It was suggested recently that the Government should take steps to denounce the Congo Basin Treaty. He hoped that no such departure was contemplated.

Earl Winterton said that it was quite incorrect to say that Germany was deprived of raw material by the fiscal policy of the British Empire. She could get all she wanted. He agreed that there should be the fullest consultation with the inhabitants of mandated territories not only before discussing surrendering a mandate but even altering the terms of a mandate.

Mr. D. O. Evans said that he regarded the open-door policy not so much from the point of view of free trade and protection as from that of the relations between this country and other Powers. It was no use shutting our eyes to the fact that foreign countries which were highly industrialized, like Germany, recognized this powerful weapon of restriction of exports from the Colonies to foreign countries which the British Government had in their hands and might at any time use against these countries. The power was there to restrict the export of raw materials and to impose prohibitive tariffs, and the Germans and others knew it and it had an important psychological affect on their minds. This was a matter of grave importance in view of the unsettled state of the world to-day.

Mr. M. Jones.—Our function became one of trusteeship and must be characterized by a genuine endeavour to assist the indigenous people of these areas to equip themselves for the ultimate task of self-government. It was inconsistent with the concept of trusteeship to administer the estate for the primary benefit of ourselves or our own kin and colour who might happen to reside in these areas.

The policy of the open door should be our main objective as between our administration of these areas and countries outside the Empire. One of our first tasks was to give these people ample opportunities to educate themselves for the task before them. The British Government were rather open to the charge, generally speaking, throughout our Colonies of neglecting the provision of educational facilities. The amount of money we spent on education of the natives was comparatively small, and it was not true to argue that these people would not respond to the provision of educational facilities.

House of Commons, July 16th, 1936

Captain McEwen asked the Prime Minister whether his Majesty's Government in their consultations with the South African Minister of Defence, during his recent visit to this country, officially discussed the question of Germany's claim to territories in Africa; and whether they gave him any reason to believe that the putting forward of such claims would be sympathetically entertained by his Majesty's Government.

Mr. Baldwin.—My answer to the latter part of the question, is in the negative.

House of Commons, July 28th, 1936

Mr. Eden.—Many questions have been addressed to the Government on their attitude in respect of the transference of territories at present held by them under mandates. A subject which has of late grown up, as it were, alongside this question is whether any arrangements are necessary or desirable for giving foreign countries freer access to such raw materials as are produced in the mandated territories and in the Colonies.

This is a matter which has frequently been raised in debate by hon. members in all parts of the House, and the Government fully realize its importance. They are alive to the interest which is displayed in many quarters in these matters, and are fully prepared, and will be glad, to discuss the subject at some international conference under the auspices of the League of Nations. At such a conference they would, for their part, be entirely ready to discuss such problems as wider guarantees for access to Colonial raw materials and obstacles in the path of such access. The approach to this matter might well be made, in our view, at the forthcoming meeting of the Assembly in September.

Having expressed that view, which I hope will command general acceptance, I return to the question of whether an actual transfer of territory held by them under mandate is contemplated by the Government. Let me make it clear that this question is one which affects, of course, all mandatory Powers, the United Kingdom, the Dominions Governments, and foreign Governments.

The Government have not had any consultation with them upon it, but so far as his Majesty's Government are concerned, the question of any transfer of mandated territories would inevitably raise grave difficulties, moral, political, and legal, of which his Majesty's Government, must frankly say that they have been unable to find any solution. His Majesty's Government, therefore, hope, with so many other international questions still unsolved, but with new opportunity of advance towards their settlement having been afforded during the last few days, there will in no quarter be the desire at this time to introduce further cause of serious differences between the nations.

House of Commons, August 1st, 1936

Mr. Amery.—Many hon. members had been mystified and alarmed by answers given in the House, by the evasive character of the replies given, and by the underlying assumption, that the Government might be inclined to yield to the German demand for territory which many years ago was hers. There was no difference between the position of a Mandated territory and a Protectorate. There was nothing in the mandates that gave any member of the League except the member controlling the territory, and least of all Germany, who was not even a member of the League, any say in the disposition of these territories. We were there by indefeasible right, and for all time.

Mr. Price.—What Mr. Amery said about the relative legal position of Crown Colonies and Mandated Territories seemed to have rather a one-way mind. He did not seem to realize how important was the role of the League in the mandatory system. We received the territories of the Tanganyika and German South-West Africa from the League to administer on behalf of the League.

Mr. Amery.—We did not receive them from the League but from the other Allied and Associated Powers to which Germany surrendered.

Mr. Sandys said that there was nothing in the constitution of the League or in the mandatory code which gave to the League any power to interfere with the disposition of the mandated territories. The Government should make a declaration that the transfer of mandates was not a discussable question. There was anxiety throughout the Empire about this matter.

Viscount Cranborne said that Mr. Amery and other hon. gentlemen, who had spoken of the question of the mandates, had put forward very important considerations which, of course, we must all bear in mind. But, while recognizing that, he hoped they would understand if he did not add anything to what had already been said. The Foreign Secretary made a statement on this subject in the debate last Monday, and, what was more, he made it perfectly clear in the speech in which he wound up the debate that it had been a most carefully considered statement by the Government. The right hon. gentleman then said that he could not possibly amplify it, and certainly it would be improper in view of that for the Under-Secretary to try to do so. He (Lord Cranborne) would only say that he would recommend Mr. Amery, Mr. Sandys, an other to read the Foreign Secretary's last words, in which he said, "I would only ask hon. members to read it carefully, and then I think they will appreciate that that statement is as definite as the Government could possibly make it in existing circumstances".

Mr. Sandys.—All we are asking is, that the Government should make their statement to-day as clear as the statements which they were able to make in years gone by. I cannot accept the suggestion by the Foreign Secretary that it is impossible for the Government to make this statement. What we want is to know if any change has taken place. If the position has changed, then, at any rate, we shall know that our fears are justified. We cannot accept that a direct, clear answer has been given which an ordinary person can understand.

House of Commons, December 18th, 1936

Mr. Mander asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether, in view of the continued German campaign for the return of her former colonies, he would make it clear beyond misunderstanding that the satisfaction of legitimate German claims, in so far as Great Britain is concerned could not be satisfied on that basis in view of our obligations as trustees for the native races in these territories?

Mr. Eden.—I would refer the hon. member to the statement which I made on this subject 27th July, to which I have nothing to add.

House of Commons, February 4th, 1937

Mr. Mander asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he would state what action the Government proposed to take with reference to the German demand for colonies, as reiterated in Herr Hitler's speech on Saturday: and whether he would make it clear that this matter, whether dealt with by extension of the mandate system or otherwise, could only be considered as part of a general settlement, in which Germany would return to the League of Nations and cooperate in the collective system and that the paramount consideration, in any event, must be welfare of the natives.

Mr. Eden.—I would refer the hon. member to the answer which I gave him on December 18th last, to which I have nothing to add.

House of Commons, February 16th, 1937

Mr. V. Adams asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, to dispel ill-founded German expectancy, he would state in unmistakable terms that his Majesty's Government could not contemplate the cession to Nazi Germany of any territory whatsoever under British political control.

Viscount Cranborne.—As has been previously stated, his Majesty's Government have not considered and are not considering such a transfer.

Mr. V. Adams.—Have discussions, in fact, been proceeded?

Viscount Cranborne.—It is inherent in my answer that no discussions are proceeding.

Commander Locker-Lampson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he could now announce the result of the negotiations between his representative and Herr von Ribbentrop; and whether he would undertake, that no return of colonies or offer of oversea commercial opportunities were made without debate in the House.

Viscount Cranborne.—As regards the first part of the question, my hon. and gallant friend is under a misapprehension. The recent conversation between the Lord Privy Seal and the German Ambassador was in no sense a negotiation but merely an exchange of views on a number of topics of interest to the two Governments, such as takes place in the ordinary course of events from time to time. As regards the second part, I would refer my hon. and gallant friend to the concluding words of the reply given by the Prime Minister to Mr. H. G. Williams on April 27th last.

House of Lords, February 17th, 1937

Lord Noel-Buxton moved:—

That this House, realizing the dangers that may arise in applying to Colonial possessions a policy which excludes other States from participation on equal terms in the advantages of Colonial development and trade, calls upon his Majesty's Government to consult with the Governments of the Dominions and of other Colonial Powers with a view to the application of the mandate system in suitable cases to British and other Colonies, and to the revision of the Convention of St. Germain (1919) in accordance with the fifteenth Article of that Convention, in such a way as to extend its operation.

The noble lord said that a Government which believed in the League of Nations must find many points of agreement with the motion. The policy of extended mandation was part of the attempt to secure peace, and without it the attempt was not complete. If we kept the Colonies as a close preserve we were heading for war, and if there were no other grounds for extended mandation this was a common-sense ground for it.

It was true that the German claim at the moment was the claim for the return of her Colonies, but the need of markets was an important part of the German claim. Herr von Ribbentrop, speaking in London two months ago, dwelt on what he called a reasonable solution, meaning wider markets. The dissatisfied Powers said that they could not buy as freely as they wished, and the satisfied Powers replied that markets were open, but the dissatisfied Powers had a reason for their inability to buy in the fact that they could not sell freely and get currency with which to buy. They could not solve the German economic crisis by Colonial changes alone, but Colonial trade was a large factor in the German situation. It was not enough to say that Germany had only herself to blame and must get herself out of the mess.

Good will was an essential factor in preserving peace, but good will was tempered by economic injustice, and to monopolize trade conflicted with modern ideas. To impose duties and preferences on Colonial trade for the benefit of the governing State, and to treat Colonies as private possessions, conflicted with a true sense of international order. The policy of mandation offered an advantage to the unsatisfied Powers while it did not represent a special concession to Germany, since it affected the world. He was not proposing any change in the mandate system nor unilateral action, and he was not proposing to transfer any territory.

Africa was the main colonial field, a field of unlimited development in the future. German industry and science were needed in Africa. Germany should be brought back into the African colonial system. Her real need would be largely met by extending mandation and extending the Congo Conventional basin.

Lord Lugard moved:—

To leave out the words "the mandate system in suitable cases to British and other Colonies, and" and to insert the following words: "this policy, and if need be."

The noble lord said that the effect of the amendment would be to eliminate the proposal to place certain Colonies under a mandate system while supporting the principle of equal participation in economic advantages. The words which he suggested should be omitted would not only be ineffective but positively harmful to the cause they all had at heart. Recent events had taught us that in giving a lead we should have some reasonable hope of finding a follower. Germany would appreciate the right of commercial equality.

If the proposed consultation with other Powers about the adoption of the open door should prove unfruitful, it would still be open to his Majesty's Government to give a lead by adopting it as the British policy.

The sovereignty of a Colonial Power over its Colonies was to some extent impaired if its administrative acts were placed under international supervision. He did not think that the British people were prepared to surrender their sovereignty over their Colonies, and he felt certain that France and other Colonial Powers were not willing to do so. It was essential that there should be a clear understanding of the meaning of the term "equal commercial opportunities." The term would denote every kind of advantage and facility enjoyed by the nationals of the sovereign States, but it would necessarily exclude such rights as were essential for administrative purposes. There would be a necessity for an arbitral authority, under the auspices of the League, to investigate any complaints of infringement, and this might be entrusted to the Mandates Commission or to some smaller body. The adoption of such a régime should be a real benefit to countries like Germany and Poland, which needed access to raw materials, and it was not asking more than could reasonably be asked of the Colonial Powers. The placing of Colonies under mandate was not in any way essential to the main object of the motion, and he hoped that Lord Noel-Buxton would accept the amendment.

Lord Arnold said that the Ottawa Agreements, which were a clear violation of the principle of equal trading, had aroused great anxiety among the "have-not" Powers particularly Germany, Italy, and Japan. British statesmen had many virtues but they did not excel in the virtue of seeing things from the point of view of other nations. It was not surprising that Germany, Italy, and Japan looked with jealous eyes upon the British Empire and demanded trade facilities. If the motion or the amendment were adopted, the psychological effect on international relations, principally with regard to Germany, would be enormous, and the material loss to Great Britain, if the motion were carried out to the fullest possible extent, would be quite small.

The Marquess of Crewe said that at the back of the whole of this discussion was the German claim for consideration in the matter of oversea possessions. The complete stripping of Germany of her colonial empire by the Treaty of Versailles was a political blunder. It did not follow that it would be possible to restore those possessions to Germany. Had those who were responsible for the treaty thought less of revenge and more of the future of the world it would not have been done. While there could not be anything like a general redistribution it was surely possible that some advance could be made on the economic side in giving to Germany what she evidently had not got—an equal chance of obtaining the primary products of which she stood in need.

The farther the system of the open door could be extended, the better it would be. There were some who would prefer that a system of mutual preferences on the lines of the Ottawa Agreements should be adopted, but in any agreement of that kind there existed the seed of future discontent. The manner in which the British Empire was regarded by foreign countries had been dangerously modified by the adoption of the protective system by this country. When all ports were open and all goods were free, the fact that we possessed by far the largest part of the Colonial Empire, if not applauded, was at any rate condoned. If the Government could assure the House that there was good hope of getting the Dominions and the Colonial Powers to discuss the extension of the mandate system, with a prospect of success, he would be well content to support the motion. Failing that assurance, the amendment seemed to offer a good way out.

The Earl of Plymouth, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, said that any proposal actually to abandon full sovereignty in favour of a mandatory status must evidently present many difficulties in territories which were British territory and whose inhabitants were his Majesty's subjects.

He had the privilege of visiting the West African territories some two years ago, and could bear testimony to the fervent devotion of the inhabitants of those territories to the Crown and the Empire. Any proposal to alter their national status in any way would be very strongly resented. His Majesty's Government would expect great difficulty in inducing the Dominion and foreign Governments to accept the proposals made in the motion. He could not say whether these objections would be the same as those of his Majesty's Government. In any case his Majesty's Government could not even invite other Governments to consider such proposals unless they were themselves convinced that they would be both useful and practicable at the present time.

He assumed that Lord Noel-Buxton's intentions were to demonstrate beyond all question that the Government fully accepted the doctrine of trusteeship as applied to Colonial Dependencies as well as mandated territories and to assist certain foreign countries to expand their trade and so obtain larger quantities of the raw materials they needed. The Government were fully in sympathy with and shared the noble lord's ideals, but they differed from him in their estimate of the value of the proposals he had put forward for attaining those ideals.

The doctrine of trusteeship in regard to colonial dependencies was essentially a British doctrine, and it was not necessary for the Government to take further steps to prove their devotion to this ideal. The position of this country in this matter was fully understood by the Colonial Empire and even by the least advanced native peoples. There were not more cordial messages to his Majesty on his accession than the messages of loyalty and devotion which came from every part of the Colonial Empire.

If the open-door policy were imposed upon the Colonial Empire it would be impossible for all time to give full fiscal autonomy to any Colonial Dependency, and this would be the gravest obstacle to the evolution of self-governing institutions. The proposal was one not only for the complete reorganization of the Colonies, but also for the complete reorganization of the machinery at Geneva for supervising the operation of the mandate.

The principles on which this country governed the Colonial Empire were those of trusteeship, and these proposals must ultimately be judged by whether they would be advantageous to the inhabitants of the Colonies or not. The Government were in full accord with the noble lord's desire to see an increase in international trade. If the policy of the open door in Colonial territories would merely result in such an increase there would undoubtedly be something to be said for it. There were, unfortunately, many reasons why it would be unlikely to do anything of the sort, and it would in present circumstances have some very unfavourable results in certain territories in which it was introduced.

The open-door policy was a permanent restraint imposed from outside upon the Government of the territory concerned. The privilege of giving preference gave a territory the advantage of being able to secure preference in return. The right of discrimination was one which no country desired to use if it could avoid it. The power to discriminate was, however, the only weapon to secure its possession against widespread discrimination obtaining in other countries. While he agreed that the mandatory system had not been an embarrassment to the mandatory Powers, it was clear that it did not necessarily operate to the advantage of the population of the mandated territory in all commercial matters. Under the terms of the existing mandates, the discrimination clause theoretically applied only to members of the League. Consequently, if the system were extended to-morrow to all colonial empires, there was no guarantee that, if the preferential system were abolished, it would not be replaced by another tariff system which would discriminate against Germany, Japan, and other countries which were not members of the League.

It was clear that the abolition of preferences in the colonial empires would not, by itself, do much to solve the payment difficulties experienced by many Powers at the present day, and in particular by Germany. These difficulties were real, but they were caused essentially by very different considerations from those of trade facilities with colonial territories, and they involved currency questions of great complexity. The question of difficulties of payments would fall within the scope of the Committee on raw materials which was about to meet at Geneva.

It was quite clear that whatever views the noble lord might have regarding the advantage accruing to Germany if his proposals were adopted, the German Government themselves had no illusions on this score. It was clear enough from the public pronouncements of German statesmen and the German Press that there was in Germany no particular desire to see the principle of "equal access" extended throughout the world. What they might be assumed to want on the economic side was some arrangement by which some colonial territory might be included within the German currency area, and, in present circumstances, within the area of the German exchange restrictions. In face of these restrictions the "open door" would become entirely meaningless. For these reasons alone it was difficult to believe either that Lord Noel-Buxton's proposals would be very desirable in themselves, or that they would result in any appreciable lessening of political tension in the world as a whole.

It was quite wrong to suppose that Germany was unable to export goods to the British Colonial Empire. The latest complete figures available were those for 1935, but he thought it would be found that the figures for 1936 were more favourable to Germany than those of the previous year. In 1935, according to the Colonial Blue-books, goods imported from Germany were valued at about £5,600,000 and goods exported to Germany were valued at about £6,400,000. After allowing for the fact that the former figures were c.i.f. and the latter f.o.b., it would be safe to conclude that Germany's unfavourable balance of trade with the Colonial Empire in 1935 did not exceed more than about £1,250,000 to £1,500,000, if, indeed, so large a figure. That was not in any case a very serious figure, but it had to be read in conjunction with the figures relating to the balance of trade between the United Kingdom and Germany.

In 1934 Germany exported goods to the value of £30,600,000 to the United Kingdom, while the United Kingdom domestic exports to Germany were only £14,000,000. In 1935 the figures were £30,000,000 and nearly £19,000,000. In 1936 the figures were nearly £33,000,000 and nearly £19,000,000. It was fair to say that the United Kingdom had nothing to be ashamed of regarding her commercial policy towards Germany, and indeed she was the principal source of Germany's supplies on free exchange for the purchase of raw materials which she required.

In the figures relating to the trade between Germany and individual Colonial Dependencies there could not be found any close relation between the balance of trade and the existence of Imperial preference. The largest individual Colonial export to Germany was cocoa from the Gold Coast, Nigeria, and Trinidad to a total value of a little less than £1,400,000. Only just behind came copper from Northern Rhodesia to a value of a little short of £1,150,000, which must be taken with copper pyrites from Cyprus valued at about £50,000. Other large items were palm kernels from Nigeria and Sierra Leone valued at about £900,000, rubber from Ceylon and Malaya valued at about £750,000. No other items were anything like so large, but there were quite substantial quantities of groundnuts, copra, cotton, sisal, and other raw materials. There could therefore be no question that, in spite of the difficulties alleged to exist, the Colonial Empire was a very important customer of Germany and a very important supplier to her of raw materials of all sorts.

It was clear both that Germany was doing a very considerable trade with the British Empire and that she would not be likely to benefit very greatly from any abolition of Imperial preference, or indeed, from any modification of the colonial quota system, though it was true that her powerful barter system of foreign trade might in those circumstances enable her exports to make some progress as compared with those from the United Kingdom.

Turning to the question of the revision of the Convention of St. Germain, the noble lord said that he took the proposal to mean that other territories, over and above those in the Congo Basin, should be placed under a similar regime to that imposed by the Convention of St. Germain, which implied absolutely complete freedom of trade. This was a point which was, however, not one which commended itself to his Majesty's Government. While the gradual freeing of trade was the goal of their policy, his Majesty's Government would not in fact be in favour of such violent uprooting of established connexions and possible diversion of the course of trade as would be caused by the immediate application of the principle of complete freedom of trade in all colonial territories.

If, on the other hand, Lord Noel-Buxton merely wished to "bring Germany back into the circle of participants in colonial economic opportunity by inviting her to rejoin the "Consortium of Congo Basin Powers", then his desire was to a large extent irrelevant. Germany was, and always had been, except for the immediate post-war period, treated within the Congo Basin as if she were a party to the Convention of St. Germain. There could therefore be no grievances on her part in that particular respect.

I have said enough (Lord Plymouth continued) to show that on several points we are in agreement with Lord Noel-Buxton. We can see that there would be considerable advantage if a joint and general declaration were made by the colonial Powers expressing their willingness to be guided in the administration of their colonial territories by the spirit of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Though this would be unlikely, in the view of his Majesty's Government, to do much of itself to lessen existing tensions, it might still have a certain value, if it formed part of a general political settlement. But for the reasons which I have given his Majesty's Government regret that they are unable to accept either the noble lord's motion or the amendment moved by Lord Lugard.

They believe that a more fruitful line of approach to the solution of the economic difficulties to which the noble lord has referred is to be sought in the deliberations of the Committee on Raw Materials, which will shortly be meeting in Geneva.

Lord Strabolgi said that the Opposition were disappointed that there was nothing constructive in Lord Plymouth's speech except a reference to a Committee meeting in Geneva which the principal complainant refused to attend.

House of Commons, February 19th, 1937

Mr. Garro-Jones said he found himself frankly in opposition to some of his hon. friends. Mr. Mander repeatedly pestered the Government to give a pledge that in no circumstances would they restore to Germany colonies that were taken from her. He believed that to be a dangerous and untenable attitude. If we were to put ourselves in the position of Germany to-day, with the Polish Corridor, with her minorities and her lack of colonies and economic opportunities—when Great Britain were in Germany's place she would never accept permanent peace until there had been some rectification of that position.

Mr. Mander said he wished to make his position clear. He agreed that so long as we and other countries retained individual colonies Germany had a legitimate claim; but he would get over that by a development of the Mandates system, placing all colonies under the international control of the League.

M. Garro-Jones said against this policy he had no complaint, but that had not been the burden of Mr. Mander's appeals to the Government that in no circumstances should Germany's Colonies be returned to her.

Mr. McGovern.—Is the hon. member in favour of giving Colonies back to Germany?

Mr. Garro-Jones said that he was in favour of bringing the question before a tribunal of equity and if, as part of a general pacification, Germany was prepared to enter into disarmament on a basis of justice all round and a complete measure of disarmament, he would give to Germany such measures of territorial and economic adjustment as an international tribunal of equity might decide upon. If we were going into such a tribunal with our minds made up that in no circumstances would we give this or that nations any concessions then there would be no permanent pacification in the world. We must remove these causes of war, whatever they were. Without that we must go on arming and in the end it would mean a conflagration. He was glad to have had the opportunity of stating this point of view, even though it might cause offence in some quarters.

House of Commons, March 2nd, 1937

Mr. Bellenger said that if the Government were prepared to give a lead with a policy which would have one end only—namely, that of peace, he would support the Government. And he would support a policy of rearmament if that rearmament was to take its place in the collective system of security which was the only safe measure for peace. The Government's foreign policy was a collection of bits and pieces not forming one cohesive whole or complete picture. What was the use of denying Germany her colonies, the demand for which was not made under the Hitler or Nazi regime, but which came from the whole nation. It was impossible for Britain to say that she would for ever deny Germany access to some of those colonies of which we had stripped her.

Sooner or later some of the mandated territories would go back to Germany.

Mr. Emrys-Evans. The surrender of colonies to Germany would be an act of strategic madness, apart from being a political error.

Mr. Grenfell. There were people who said that Germany was unjustly treated after the War. He would say she was stupidly treated, but they had to remember the feelings of all peoples who had stood on their own defence.

What was the reply to the German demand for the return of her colonies, and he would ask if that was all the Germans wanted? If a bargain was struck and Germany was given any or all of her colonies, would she promise not to cause further disturbance to her neighbours? Would Germany give guarantees? What was the British Government prepared to do? After all they could not look forward to these international difficulties with equanimity. What was his Majesty's Government prepared to offer? The step they should take was to invite all the nations to join in a world peace convention now, without waiting, and before war might come upon us like a thief in the night.

Mr. Eden.—The hon. gentleman put to me just now a very fair question on the subject of colonies. I had not intended to mention this subject, but since the question has been asked I think it is desirable that I should answer it, lest there should be any misunderstanding anywhere. A few days ago a question was put by the hon. member for Leeds, W. (Mr. V. Adams), to this effect: Whether to dispel ill-founded German expectancy, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will state in unmistakable terms that his Majesty's Government could not contemplate the cession to Germany of any territory whatsoever under British control. My noble friend (Viscount Cranborne) answered: "As has been previously stated, his Majesty's Government have not considered, and are not considering, such a transfer." That statement of my noble friend remains the policy of his Majesty's Government, and I have nothing whatever to add to that reply.

III. From the Declaration of Sir Frederick Leith-Ross before the Committee for the Study of the Problems of Raw Materials — Geneva, March 8th, 1937

(According to a Communiqué by the Secretariat)

Sir Frederick Leith-Ross said that, in accordance with the Chairman's request, he was ready to open the discussion by giving his own views on the subject. He thought that the memorandum distributed by the Secretariat was interesting and gave a reasonable account of the opinions that had been expressed during recent years on the problem of raw materials. He thought that the memorandum was valuable as information, but should not be regarded as a basis of discussion. He thought that the first thing to do was to define what the Committee meant by raw materials.

In this connection, he pointed out that the list of such materials given in the Secretariat's memorandum was perhaps too restricted. Perhaps the memorandum drew too much attention to colonial raw materials. That was perhaps why foodstuffs had been neglected in the list. He thought that they should be inserted, for they were more important than industrial raw materials. They were not only more indispensable than the others, for no country could do without them, whereas it could more or less do without industrial raw materials, but further, if a country had to purchase foodstuffs

The Opening up of the

At the end of 1913 there were altogether 4176 km. of railways in operation in the former German colonies, including 310 km. in the Cameroons, 327 km. in Togoland, 2104 km. in South West Africa and 1435 km. in East Africa. In addition 300 km. were under construction at that time.

Former German Colonies

According to a reliable calculation of the German Colonial Office, at the end of 1912, 399 business firms with a capital of 506.08 mill. gold Marks were taking part in the economic development of the German colonies. They included 10 banks, 9 shipping companies, 7 railway, traffic and telegraph companies, 47 mining companies, 138 plantations, 109 mixed business (trade and industry), 79 diamond mining companies.

abroad, it would have less money for buying materials necessary for its industry. Sir Frederick thought that they should begin by making a list including, not only foodstuffs, but also materials necessary for the maintenance of animals and likewise industrial raw materials. On the other hand, they should make a statistical investigation of the various materials on the list, especially as regards: (1) world production, world consumption and price movements during recent years; (2) the production and consumption, imports and exports of each of the chief countries concerned and for each of the raw materials.

They must also consider what raw materials were really essential and could not be replaced by substitutes. Also what should be regarded as a single country; and in this respect the position of the British Empire was somewhat peculiar, seeing that the United Kingdom Government had no power over the economic policy of the Dominions. The speaker referred to a study made by the Institute of International Relations showing that no country was completely self-sufficing. He thought the question could not be settled by any transfer of territory, even if it were decided to transfer whole continents.

He observed that they had to meet two other apprehensions expressed by certain countries: on the one hand, certain countries feared that they would not be able to obtain sufficient quantities of certain raw materials and, on the other, they were anxious as to their general situation in respect of their imports of raw materials. He considered that each case must be taken separately, for each country and raw material. They must determine whether each raw material was really difficult to obtain and whether certain countries really had difficulties in procuring it. Perhaps special sub-Committees must be set up for each of the materials in question; on these sub-Committees the chief importing and exporting countries would be represented. But generally speaking production of raw materials was at present sufficient for almost all real requirements. But if difficulties were put forward on that subject, they might be considered. As certain of these cases might concern products of certain British colonial dependencies, it might be well for him to give the view current in his own country. The United Kingdom Government was always ready to encourage the production within its colonial dependencies of raw materials desired by consumers not only in the British Empire, but even elsewhere. But it would evidently be difficult for his Government to go further. He referred to the statement made in certain publications to the effect that it would always be an advantage for a country that consumed a raw material to find that product in one of its colonies. He did not deny that there was some truth in this; but he pointed out that, in certain cases in Great Britain, a higher price was paid for colonial produce than the price on the world market. Further, for the opening up of the colonies, large investments of capital had been necessary. If the mother country received certain advantages in exchange, these were rarely obtained without reciprocity.

As regards the policy of the open door which was recommended for all colonies, such a policy might in certain cases be harmful to the development of the colonies and even to the welfare of the natives. He did not think moreover that such a policy could be applied in regard to all countries without reciprocity. Amongst the countries that desired the adoption of the policy of the open door in other States, some themselves practised a policy of restricting the circulation of goods and endeavoured to maintain an artificial level for their currency. The policy of the open door in the colonies must not be considered independently of economic policy in the mother countries.

If certain countries had difficulties in securing certain raw materials, it must also be considered whether this was not due to their own economic and monetary policy, whether it was not owing to an excess of quotas or an unsuitable financial policy that they had placed themselves in an inferior position. Finally, he observed that the production of artificial substitutes involved a heavier burden on national economy than the purchase of natural products, and that the inevitable result was a lowering in the standard of life of the people.

IV. Resolutions, Memoranda and Petitions

The Colonial Problem at the Conference of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Association at Margate October 1st, 1936

Mr. Sandys, moved:—

That this conference urges his Majesty's Government, in order to dispel grave anxieties within the Empire and dangerous hopes abroad, to give an assurance that the declaration made by the then Foreign Secretary, Sir John Simon, to the German Chancellor in Berlin in March, 1935, to the effect that the cession of any British Mandated Territory was not a discussable question, still represents the unaltered attitude of his Majesty's Government.

The Germans based their demand for colonies, Mr. Sandys said, on the grounds of economic necessity, need for an outlet for their surplus population, need for access to raw materials, and, lastly, currency difficulties. They were certainly not going to find an outlet for their surplus population in semi-tropical African territories. Before the War all the German colonies put together only managed to absorb 20,000 white people. The climatic conditions in those territories were not suitable for large white populations.

With regard to Germany's second argument—the need for access to raw materials—one would think, by the way Germans talked, that we were guilty of cornering colonial produce. The fact was we were at our wits' end to find somebody to buy it. There was no tariff or any other form of discrimination against Germany. She had exactly the same facilities for buying raw materials as we had ourselves.

It might be thought from German speeches that they could not obtain the necessary British currency with which to buy raw materials from the Mandated Territories. That was a myth, like the other arguments. Official figures showed that Germany had a favourable balance of trade. Last year in Tanganyika alone she had a credit balance of £67,000. Far from having currency difficulties, she was actually taking British currency out of the Mandated Territories and spending it elsewhere.

From the economic standpoint the loss to us of the transfer of these territories to Germany would be as insignificant as the gain to Germany. But from the military and strategic standpoint the danger to us would be immeasurable.

One consideration, which overrode all others, was the interests and the welfare of the inhabitants for whom we had accepted guardianship. Every successive British Government, including the present National Government, had repeatedly given assurances both to the British settlers and to the natives that the protection of the British flag would never be withdrawn. There could be no question of going back on our word.

An amendment was moved by Captain E. C. Cobb to leave out all the words after "conference" and insert:—

Recognizes the fact that the mandates allocated to this country were accepted from the League of Nations and cannot be transferred except by the unanimous consent of the League Council as well as the present Mandatory Power. It accepts the clear declaration of the Prime Minister that his Majesty's Government have no intention of raising the question themselves and that, in the event of any question arising regarding the future status of Mandated Territories, they would not commit themselves to any settlement of the problems at issue without giving the fullest opportunity for discussion in the House of Commons.

He said nothing created a more unhelpful attitude than a blank refusal to listen to what the other side had to say. It would be most unfortunate if they were to give the impression that they wished the Government to refuse to listen in any circumstances at any future time. He hoped the conference would agree that the Prime Minister's declaration was sufficiently real and reassuring to justify the delegates in accepting the amendment.

Sir S. Hoare said there had been two very clear statements made on this very difficult question. The first was made by the Prime Minister last April, and the second by the Foreign Secretary at the end of July. The Prime Minister, on April 27th, first of all made clear in the House of Commons the legal position as to Mandates. He made it clear that the Mandates were originally mandated by the Allied and Associated Powers, and, secondly, that the Mandatories accepted the Mandates from the League of Nations with special obligations under Article 22, and particularly with special obligations for the moral and material welfare of the inhabitants of the territories.

Thirdly, there was in the Covenant no provision at all for the transfer of those Mandates. Fourthly, supposing there was a provision of that kind, even so it would be necessary that the Council of the League, including the Mandatory Power, should be unanimous. Fifthly, the Government had not considered the question of any transfer, either, themselves or with the Dominions; and they had no intention of raising it. Sixthly, the Government had given the definite understanding that they would enter into no commitments without the fullest discussion in the House of Commons.

Since April there had been another statement, equally considered and equally approved by the whole Government, made by the Foreign Secretary at the end of the Session, on July 27th.

That statement supplemented and brought up to date the declaration made by Sir John Simon to the German Chancellor in Berlin in March, 1935.

It was precisely because the situation had developed since March, 1935, that his Majesty's Government felt it necessary to make a further statement on this subject at the end of the last session. In the present delicate international situation, Sir Samuel Hoare continued, he hoped that he would not be expected to elaborate or to add to that statement. The Government were as fully aware as anyone in that hall of the difficulties and the objections to the transfer of Mandates. The passing of the resolution, therefore, could not make them any more cautious than they were already.

On a show of hands the amendment was defeated, and the resolution carried by a large majority.

An Investigation by the Labour Party

An advisory committee of the National Executive Committee of the Labour Party has made a study of the Colonial problem, which was published in September 1936 as a pamphlet with the title, "The Demand for Colonial Territories and Equality of Economic Opportunity".

In the first place the pamphlet examines the claims of the "dissatisfied Powers" under the headings of prestige, strategy, and economic considerations, and says that although the first two play some part in the aspirations of dissatisfied Powers towards empire, it is economic beliefs and objects which are the most advertised causes of the desire for the possession or control of colonial territories.

The economic advantages attributed to colonial possessions are:—(1) that they ensure access to raw materials and foodstuffs and that a great Power without colonies cannot hope to make itself industrially self-sufficient; (2) that they afford markets for the products of industry and that the monopoly of colonial territory by a few Powers shuts out others from colonial markets; (3) that they provide a closed field for the export of capital and the exploitation of concessions; (4) that they are of great economic and social advantage to the "upper" classes in Imperialist countries because they provide lucrative and attractive administrative and military jobs and (5) that they are a necessary outlet for surplus population.

Each of these contentions is examined and the committee's conclusions are summarized as follows:—

- (1) Colonies are of some but not of great economic importance.
- (2) The non-possession of them is only really injurious in so far as discriminatory practices are adopted by the "possessors".
- (3) The abolition of discrimination rather than the exchange of territories should consequently be our aim from this point of view.
- (4) This abolition of preferential and discriminating practices will not remedy the dissatisfied Powers' principal economic troubles; the real remedy of those troubles is in their own hands.
- (5) Nevertheless the removal of discrimination, both for its modest economic and its general moral importance, should most emphatically be undertaken.
- (6) Such return to multilateral trade as is possible in present circumstances is desirable not only on general grounds but also because of the great dependence of certain of the so-called dissatisfied Powers upon a multilateral system.

The report suggests that the most effective part which the British Empire could play in averting the threats to world peace implied in the present strangulation of international trade would be (a) by re-establishing the principle of the "Open Door" and equality of trading opportunity in all the dependencies, and (b) by freeing ourselves from the Ottawa Agreements and working towards the formation of a low tariff group open to all countries on equal terms, subject to the requirements of planned international trade through import and export boards.

The first of these proposals would best be linked up with the mandate system, and the second would have the advantage of avoiding the difficulties which have arisen in connexion with the "Most-favoured-nation" clause, since it would not permit any country to benefit unilaterally from the lowering of barriers within the low tariff group. All countries wishing to benefit would have to give as well as take.

"Such a scheme would, it is true, call (the report continues) for the abandonment not only of the Ottawa Agreements but of the whole principle of Imperial preference. But . . . that from the standpoint of world needs Imperial preference is an anti-social principle, of doubtful advantage even to its supposed beneficiaries, and calculated gravely to prejudice any peaceful solution of the problems now confronting the dissatisfied Powers. . . . A distinction must, however, be made between such agreements and barter agreements made by Colonies themselves, primarily in their own interest, which may in some circumstances be justified by trading conditions."

It is suggested that guarantees for the uninterrupted supply of raw materials should be given in the form of an international convention. It is held that little or nothing can be done to meet the demands of dissatisfied Powers with regard to population by means of colonial territories, and that international action should be directed to bringing together idle men, idle land, and idle capital and to transferring people from overcrowded countries to other countries capable of absorbing them and finally to improve world trade.

As to the administration of colonial territories, the report opposes transfers of sovereignty and says:—

"It should never be forgotten that the colonial populations have not only a claim but actually a paramount claim to consideration in any revisional scheme which may vitally affect the conditions of their social development, and that therefore Britain should only be a party to such a scheme if it carries their full and spontaneous consent."

Transfers of territory under present conditions should therefore be resisted, but if it were proposed to transfer what is now colonial territory under mandate to one of the dissatisfied Powers (which would then be answerable to the League of Nations), or similarly to transfer existing mandates as part of a general settlement including disarmament, collective security, and the return of the dissatisfied Powers to a real League, and if the consent of the population were obtained, then the changes should be considered.

"It might perhaps be argued (the report says) that, so long as observance of the terms of a mandate is secured, it matters little, even to the subject peoples concerned, by what country the mandate is administered. But changing the nationality of the mandatory Power may mean changing also the official language of the mandated territory (with all the consequential upheavals in the system of education), changing the wonted principles of administration and the currency, and changing the type of native policy. Such changes might well put back the clock of advance for the indigenous population for a generation."

After discussing rather tentatively the possibility of the administration of colonial territories by an international authority under the League of Nations, the report advocates an extension of the mandate system. In the main the territories which should be brought under mandates are those of tropical Africa. The mandates would roughly correspond to the present B class mandates, the key provisions of which are that the well-being of the native peoples should be treated as a primary trust, that the "Open Door" should prevail for members of the League; that there should be no fortifications or military or naval bases; no military training of the natives except for police purposes and the defence of the territory, and that there should be an annual examination of the Permanent Mandates Commission. The report points out that the question of islands and other pieces of territory held specifically for their strategic value (Gibraltar, for example) is not raised by the claims of dissatisfied Powers for colonies.

"The colonial settlement contemplated," it is stated, "is part and parcel of an international system based upon a real League and real collective security. . . . In offering to bring her African tropical colonies under the mandate system, provided that such a League system of collective security is accepted and established, Britain should take steps to see that other Imperial Powers were invited to deal with their colonies on similar lines. Even if that invitation were not immediately and universally accepted, Britain should declare that it accepted the mandatory system in principle for all colonies inhabited mainly by peoples of primitive culture and would accept the scrutiny of the Mandates Commission in such cases, if it could be arranged. The offer should also be conditional on an extensive reform of the mandate system being carried into effect at the same time."

Some of the suggested reforms of the mandate system are that members of the Mandates Commission should undertake periodic tours of inspection in the mandated territories; that aggrieved parties in the territories should have a right to appear before the Commission; that there should be equality of opportunity for the nationals of all League members to enter the public services of mandated areas; and that mandates should be held in trust from the League and, in the event of a mandatory leaving the League, the mandate should revert to the League.

The report also suggests that an international conference might first discuss the questions of raw materials, access to markets, and migration, leaving the questions of territorial change and the mandate system until later.

The Petition of the "Four Hundred"

A "National Memorial on Peace and Economic Cooperation," conveying a demand for a British initiative in favour of economic appeasement as offering a way of escape from the threat of war, has been addressed to the Prime Minister on February 8th, 1937 by nearly 400 representative persons drawn from many sections of the public life of the country. The signatories include 35 lord mayors and mayors of the larger cities and towns; 13 Bishops of the Church of England and the leading ministers of other denominations; 35 professors and principals of universities and university colleges; 40 headmasters and headmistresses of public schools; the chairmen or secretaries of 17 national trade unions; and nearly 100 representative business and professional men, writers, publicists, artists, and others.

"There is an increasing public awareness (the memorial states) of the essential link between economic and political appeasement. Much of the tension underlying the general expansion of armaments and the drift towards war has its foundation in economic and industrial conditions, and especially in the breakdown of normal trading relations between the peoples of the world. The general economic crisis has led to a feverish search for economic self-sufficiency—'born in want and fear, and in turn begetting them'—which finds its counterpart in the rapid growth of national armaments and the development of a psychology of conflict which, unchanged, must sooner or later result in war.

"In these circumstances it would seem that there can be no political stability and no agreement to stop the competition in armaments without some substantial movement towards the mitigation of the distress arising out of economic and industrial circumstances. We believe indeed that measures of reconstruction altogether new in scope and magnitude—aiming at the solution of economic problems—offer the best, if not the sole, remaining hope of escape from the gathering threat of war. The moment is both urgent and opportune. The recent agreement, following the devaluation of the French franc, for a stabilization of exchanges between France, the United States, and Great Britain, has given an indication of, and opened the way to, democratic leadership for constructive ends. The victory of President Roosevelt and of his policy in regard to economic relations has underlined the encouragement afforded by United States' participation in the currency agreement—the first important breach in the political and economic isolation which has characterized American policy since the abortive World Conference of 1933.

"The significance for economic cooperation and world peace of the currency agreement must, however, depend on the measure of the freer exchange in real wealth in the shape of goods and services across the frontiers of nations which it secures. Can these wider advantages be achieved unless Britain, as the greatest of all the trading Powers, is prepared to take the lead? For our part we are confident that in the interests of world peace, in the interests of world economic advance, and in our own interests as a great international trading country, we ought to make an immediate declaration of the part we are prepared to play in a new and determined effort to achieve these ends.

"As far as contemporary economic difficulties are concerned, the remedy is to be found, we believe, along lines of general economic policy rather than in any administrative changes affecting the undeveloped areas of the world. At the same time, we are confident that a decision of the colonial Powers to accept in respect of all their dependent territories, not immediately ready for self-government, the international obligations imposed by a strengthened mandate system, would provide a guarantee of a non-discriminating and cooperative economic policy and, in replacing a purely nationalist control of such areas, would contribute towards a right solution of the colonial problem.

"We suggest, therefore, that at an early opportunity your Government should announce in a communication to all countries, Great Britain's intention:—

(a) to do all in its power to expedite the proposed investigation under the League of Nations into the question of access to raw materials and to take such action as is necessary to carry out the conclusions reached;

(b) to undertake a revision of the Ottawa Agreements, such revision having as its minimum objective the creation of a low-tariff group which all other countries would be invited to join on a reciprocal basis;

(c) to seek simultaneously with any group of nations outside the British Empire, an agreement—which would cover not less than one-third of world trade, including that of the Empire—for the removal of quotas and the lowering of tariffs by a substantial percentage of their present amount;

(d) to return to a policy of the Open Door for trade in all dependent territories under its control;

(e) to present and advocate to other colonial Powers concrete proposals for the general application of a strengthened mandate system under the League of Nations, to all dependent territories not immediately ripe for self-government.

"We commend these proposals to your most urgent consideration and venture to express the belief that the vigorous promotion of them by your Government would enlist the enthusiastic approval of responsible opinion throughout the country."

The Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, on May 22nd, 1937, received a deputation representative of the 400 signatories to the national memorial on the subject of "Peace and economic cooperation" and handed them a statement in reply to the national memorial, which he had had prepared. The statement pointed out that the Government fully shared the view of the signatories of the memorial that the cause of world peace would be promoted by the freer exchange of goods and services across the frontiers of nations. The question of what steps could usefully be taken to promote this policy of the development of international trade was one to which the Government attached the greatest importance. The main obstacle was the existence of the present systems of quota restrictions on industrial goods and exchange controls. It was clear that action in these matters had to be taken by other Governments, since there were no exchange controls in the United Kingdom and the only quota restriction on industrial goods was the flexible duty-quota control of imports of iron and steel which formed part of an industrial agreement with the chief supplying countries. All that the British Government could do was to take every opportunity to urge such action upon the Governments concerned. In this sphere the initiative did not rest with this Government.

As regards tariffs, those which existed had been imposed to prevent the increase of unemployment and to protect the standard of living in this country. In fact, they had not prevented the development of trade. Although when they were first introduced it was essential to rectify the balance of payments by a substantial reduction of imports, since 1933 imports into this country had considerably increased. This would undoubtedly provide a stimulus to international trade generally. The Peace Council suggested that the Government should seek agreement with other nations with a view to creating a low tariff group. Proposals of this kind had frequently been put forward, but in the view of the Government they were open to two fundamental objections. In the first place, the creation of a low tariff group would involve discrimination against non-participating countries and might lead to retaliation and tariff wars. It would involve the disappearance of the general application of most-favoured-nation treatment, to which the Government attached special importance. The political friction which would be created by reprisals and tariff wars was obvious. In the second place, experience went to show that practical results were not likely to be achieved, except by bilateral negotiations. But the Government did not reject the idea of multilateral negotiations, if it could be shown that the time was opportune. The difficulty was that the circumstances of each country differed so widely that multilateral negotiations were in practice likely to lead to a breakdown.

The policy which the Government had followed in recent years had been to negotiate bilateral agreements, both with British and with foreign countries. These agreements had resulted in the mutual lowering of barriers to trade; moreover, the benefits of the agreed concessions—and this was an important point—had been extended to other countries generally in virtue of the most favoured nation clauses of treaties. The Government had no doubt that their adoption of this policy had greatly contributed to the development of international trade in recent years. There was still much to be done to promote the further development of international trade; but, from the nature of the case, further initiatives in this direction fell to be taken by the countries which had developed their protective systems to a degree greater than we had, particularly by means of quota restrictions on industrial goods and exchange controls.

As regards the League of Nations inquiry into access to raw materials, his Majesty's Government initiated this proposal, they consistently pressed for the inquiry to be expedited, and, in fact, it opened on March 8th. They would give careful and sympathetic consideration to the conclusions of the inquiry.

There remained for consideration the proposals that his Majesty's Government should "return to a policy of the open door for trade in all dependent territories under its control" and they should "present and advocate to other colonial Powers concrete proposals for the general application of a strengthened mandate system under the League of Nations to all dependent territories not immediately ripe for self-government." Both these proposals had been carefully considered by his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, who regarded them as being open to objection. Full and immediate imposition of an open door would impair the authority of Colonial Legislatures and impede their progress towards self-government by limiting their authority in fiscal matters. Further, it would seriously weaken the right of the Colonial Empire to claim preference in the United Kingdom and other Empire countries which, in the absence of equivalent opportunities in other metropolitan markets, was essential to its economic well-being. Conversely, it would prevent the Colonial Empire from taking action in its own economic defence against discrimination by other countries; and, finally, it would, in present circumstances, tend to favour the trade of countries with an exceptionally low level of labour costs, to the disadvantage of the trade of other countries with higher labour standards. The question of economic policy in Colonial areas could not be divorced from the question of economic policy between metropolitan countries, and in present circumstances his Majesty's Government saw no justification for reserving the policy of Imperial preference, which had contributed greatly to the prosperity of the Colonial Empire.

The application of a mandates system to the British Colonial Empire would not be welcomed by the inhabitants of the Dependencies themselves, who were proud of their status as British subjects and would resent being placed in a different category from other members of the British Empire. Moreover, the authority both of Parliament and of the local legislatures over the Colonial Dependencies would to some extent be prejudiced. Finally, so extended a scheme would perforce necessitate the abandonment of the present machinery of a permanent Mandates Commission composed of distinguished experts, and its replacement by a kind of international Colonial Office.

On the other hand, his Majesty's Government would see considerable advantage in a joint and general declaration by the Colonial Powers expressing their willingness to be guided in the administration of their colonial territories by the spirit of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League. His Majesty's Government did not disguise from themselves the fact that such a declaration could have only a limited effect in lessening existing tensions; but they considered that it might usefully form part of a general settlement.

V. Important Statements by Private Persons

Letters to The Times

Lord Lugard's Articles in The Times

In his articles, Lord Lugard first replies to the critics who state that Great Britain quite naturally desires peace and the maintenance of the status quo, since she has everything and more than she needs, vast half-empty dominions in the temperate zones, and colonies in all parts of the tropics. The belief that Great Britain possessed vast and empty lands capable of colonisation in the Dominions was incorrect, since the British Parliament had no influence on the immigration policy of the Dominions (including South Africa and Southern Rhodesia) or on the foreign territories and mandates under British control.

He then replies to the statement that the present position of Great Britain in Africa is the result of a "policy of robbery". It was an historical fact that, at the time of the partition of Africa, the British Government adopted a negative attitude towards the acquisition of fresh territory. All opportunities and even requests that Great Britain should assume control over various territories were ignored both in West and East Africa. Decisions of the Cabinet to give up territories such as Uganda and Nyassaland which were already occupied only failed to be carried out on account of the violent resistance of the British people. It was only when the original policy of "peaceful penetration" with a minimum of interference in institutions of the natives failed on account of their maintenance of slavery that the Government went over to "actual occupation" and then to "indirect rule", in which, however, the institutions of the natives were as far as possible protected.

Even during the War, Great Britain declared that she had no intention of acquiring further territory. But when, at the end of the War, the question arose as to what should be done with the former German colonies, and it was decided to place them under mandatory rule, Great Britain felt obliged to claim such mandates.

The tremendous sacrifices of life and money required by the conquest of East Africa are much too little known; with the development of the aeroplane and submarine, the question as to which Power should control these territories became of vital importance for the position in the Indian Ocean and in the neighbouring African territories. It could therefore not be affirmed that the "Peace Conference was dominated by British desire for gain".

In reply to the proposals that the "satisfied" nations should give up some of their possessions to the "hungry" nations, Lord Lugard quotes a remark by the Prince of Wales that "British subjects are not for sale". The cession of Jubaland to Italy may find its excuse in the fact that it was the fulfilment of a promise given in the war, which was a war of life or death for England. Moreover this cession did not become generally known among the British public.

Extracts from Lord Lugard's Article in the "Times"

Many proposals have been made as to the share which Great Britain should accept should any sacrifice be demanded in view of the general agreement. The Labour Party desires "the international control of sources of supply of raw materials and the extension of the mandate system for colonial territories." This policy of placing all British Colonies under mandates deserves careful and respectful consideration, the more so since it is supported by the high authority of Sir Arthur Salter, who suggests the enactment of an international convention enforcing distribution of all raw materials on equal terms in peace or war except to any State declared to be an aggressor. It is argued that "this would not mean that we hand over our Colonies to other people," but unless the mandates were assigned to the dissatisfied countries the change would be of little interest to them.

The proposal to transfer British mandates—or even, as others have proposed, some of our Colonies and Protectorates—to a foreign flag, treating the inhabitants as mere chattels, is surely unthinkable since it would involve the breach of pledges repeated by successive Secretaries of State. It would be heart-breaking to the men on the spot to see their work frustrated by the adoption of new policies. The only condition which could be urged as a possible justification for the transfer of a mandate would be the willing consent—or at least the complete indifference—of the large majority of the population, ascertained by full and impartial inquiry by the League, with compensation to non-natives who had sunk capital in the country if their interests were prejudiced. I am sure that the reply to such a proposal in the British Mandated Territories would be an emphatic desire for no change.

Others have suggested that instead of handing over the Colonies, to a foreign flag the Colonial Power should agree to place some of them under the mandate system. We have seen that so far as Great Britain is concerned the principles of that system are already applicable to British Colonies. Such a gesture would not be held by Germany or Italy to be of any particular value to them unless they held the mandate. This would differ little from the proposal already discussed.

A third and more plausible proposal is that some or all of the territories under European control in Africa should be placed under a "Collective Mandate" administered by the League. It can hardly be meant by this rather vague term that a condominium of Power should jointly control a particular colony, for the "native policies" of the different Colonial Powers vary greatly and no device could be more sure of generating friction. It may be assumed therefore that the suggestion is that the League itself should take the place of a national mandatory, and assume "the direct government", primarily with the object of ensuring "economic opportunities to the whole world." Assuming for the moment that such a scheme were practicable so far as the League is concerned—and I hold it to be impracticable—its advocates could only hope that the dissatisfied nations would be appeased if they have a dominant voice in the collective control. In point of fact, the officer appointed as Governor would dictate the policy, and his nation, presumably Germany or Italy, would become de facto mandatory. From the point of view of the African inhabitants, the "collective" would differ little from the individual mandate.

But consider the position as it would affect the League. Each of the Colonial Powers has a Colonial Office of trained and experienced officials dealing from day to day with the many problems of administration. The final decisions rest with a Minister for the Colonies on behalf of the metropolitan Government. The League has no such machinery—and putting aside any question of cost there would be difficulty in creating a board of qualified men of different nationalities who could work together and reside permanently or meet constantly at Geneva or elsewhere. In whom would the final authority be vested to decide in questions on which opinion was divided; and to control the autocratic powers of the Governor?

The nearest approach that the League has made is the Permanent Mandates Commission. But the function of that body is confined to seeing that the terms of the mandate are being carried out. It is purely advisory to the Council and exercises no direct control. It disclaims any authority to advise regarding administration for which the mandatory alone is responsible. It has gained experience in the past 13 years, but as having myself been a member ever since the mandates were issued, I consider that it would be most unsuited to exercise administrative functions. Incidentally, the present Commission is quite fully occupied with the supervision of 12 separate mandates.

Clearly in these circumstances the Governor on the spot would have to be entrusted with very wide powers. Ex hypothesi he would not be selected from the "surfeited" Powers, and since the object is to propitiate the "Have-nots," preference would probably be given to a German or Italian.

The ultimate result of the "collective mandate" would probably be to create several Nazi and Fascist autocracies in Central Africa.

But if Great Britain cannot consider the transfer of mandates or Colonies, what can she offer if it is agreed that some sacrifice is needed to meet new conditions and preserve the peace of the world? I submit the following suggestion. Provided the other Colonial Powers are prepared to bear their share in the collective effort—not necessarily by adopting the same method—Great Britain should fulfil the promise to accept her share by reverting once more to her traditional policy of the "Open Door" in the African territories over which she has control. The departure from this policy in 1932, admittedly in the interest of British trade, has afforded some pretext for the complaint of monopolies.

To afford the guarantee which Sir Samuel Hoare said was demanded for the effective application of this policy I would further suggest that the Mandates Commission should be entrusted with the task of seeing that the "commercial equality" clause was strictly enforced. For this task it is exceptionally well qualified, for, as the rapporteur of the Assembly Committee observed, "there is hardly a session at which the question has not been raised." This would not impose too heavy a burden, since its role would be limited to receiving memorials or petitions from anyone who had grounds for considering that the pledge was being infringed.

This proposal would of course involve some adjustment of the Ottawa Agreements. The proposal to revert in Africa to the principle of "the Open Door"—which used to be our justification for our world-wide Colonies—does not, of course, apply to the policy which the United Kingdom of the Dominions may see fit to adopt for themselves to protect their trade in a tariff-ridden world.

I do not underrate the ideal of Empire reciprocity, and it is only in so far as trade with Colonies—especially Africa—is concerned that I suggest "the Open Door." Most Dominions have little trade with Africa, and the collective adoption of equality of commercial opportunity by other nations would more than recompense them—and the United Kingdom—for the loss of preference in those markets. The withdrawal of the demand for preference in them would moreover do away with the feeling by the natives that their interests were being sacrificed for the benefit of British merchants, as in the case of the Indian cotton duties, and the attempt after the War to restrict the export of oil-palm products to Empire markets.

Sir Samuel Hoare insisted that each Colonial Power should bear its share in the collective action adopted. If any such Power should prefer that its share in the collective sacrifice should take any other form than the adoption of the "Open Door" in its Colonies—for instance, a territorial adjustment—it would, of course, make its own proposal.

While I am convinced that foreign Powers would emphatically decline to place their colonies under mandate, I have gained the impression, from conversations and other indications, that some Colonial Powers in Africa not having made such pledges as have the British, would not lay the same stress on the consent of the Natives to a change of the mandatory and would prefer to surrender a mandate provided they received adequate compensation for foregoing their rights. If they are right in thinking that the inhabitants would be indifferent to the change and if the present mandatory preferred to surrender its mandate rather than to adopt the "economic equality" regime in all its colonies, the two methods in combination might perhaps provide an effective solution.

To the Editor of the Times

Germany's psychological desire for colonies is intensified by the insulting manner in which she was deprived of them. Far from being unfit to colonize, those who enjoy first-hand knowledge of German colonial methods know that these were excellent and in no way inferior to our own. I was General Smuts's Intelligence Officer during a long period of the Great War and was often struck by the excellence of their administration, which was reflected by two remarkable facts. Large areas of German East Africa were depleted of troops during the campaign with no resultant native rising. We had native trouble. Also, desertion from the German native army was less than that which disgraced certain of our coloured units in Kenya. And, finally, it is by no means certain that if the natives of Tanganyika were asked to-day whether they wished us to remain or the Germans to return they would favour us.

The second point is economic. Raw material from any non-German colony is quite useless to Germany, for she cannot pay for it except in sterling, which she has not got. To repeat the fallacy that Germany can get all the raw material she wishes from our colonies displays lamentable ignorance. Germany must be able to pay in marks for her raw material.

Lastly, let us drop the hypocritical doctrine that we cannot hand over Colonies without consulting the wishes of the inhabitants. Have we ever asked a single native if he wishes to be ruled by us? Did we consult the wishes of any German native in 1919?

Our present inexplicable inaction in this matter must be fatal. The history of Anglo-German relations during the past four years has been the story of lost opportunities. Must this policy of suspicion and this atmosphere of Versailles prevail for ever?

R. Meinertzhagen.

Sir,—Mr. Adams, endorsing in your issue of September 12th your leading article on "The German Claim to Colonies" asks:—

(1) Can the new Germany succeed, where the old failed, in producing raw materials?

One reply is that Germany did not hold them long enough to develop them, but, had she maintained from 1914 onwards the very modest standard of progress set by us in adjoining areas, her African colonies would by now be furnishing her with twice as large a proportion of her imports as is provided for us by all our African colonies. To quote pre-War percentages in this connexion is, to use his own phraseology in reference to those with whom he differs, "nonsense". The domestic achievements of the National-Socialist Party in the economic development of Germany in the last four years vitiate comparisons with her pre-War tempo.

(2) He then inquires whether the Nazi State would be a worthy trustee of native races.

My submission is that no State in Europe is better able or more likely to play a worthy part. Their early record was creditable, and as good as that of any other Power; all Powers have made and doubtless, are still making, grave mistakes. We ourselves have had riots in Zanzibar, trouble in Rhodesia, serious complaints from Nyassaland; the French and Spaniards have had long struggles in Morocco; the history of Belgian and Portuguese possessions includes some dreadful episodes. It ill befits any of us to pronounce judgment on Germany as an administrator. Can anyone seriously claim that the present distribution of African trusteeships between Portugal and Belgium, France and Spain, the Union of South Africa and ourselves must be permanent even at the cost of excluding the largest Power in Europe?

Let us frankly recognize that the clauses of the Treaty of Versailles which deprived Germany of all her oversea possessions must be reconsidered. The problem of Africa will soon be so difficult as to demand the co-operation of every European Power. To exclude Germany is to dam and to embark a torrent in its upper reaches, thus imperilling fertile lands below.

A great Scandinavian writer said to me recently:—

The world will respect Britain if she lets others enter some of the lands she has so recently taken under her charge; the world will not forgive her if she risks a European war in order to keep what she asserts to be of so little value.

I have reached the conclusion that the peace of Europe for the next few decades may well turn, for psychological rather than economic reasons, not upon a rearrangement of the frontiers of Eastern Europe, but upon our attitude towards the colonial clauses of the Treaty of Versailles.

The retention of former German colonies and the maintenance of the status quo in Africa do not, in my judgment, constitute one of those "just causes" for which the present generation in this country are prepared, or should be asked, to fight. If a clash must come, and I utterly deny that it need come, let us be on surer ground than this.

Your obedient servant

Arnold Wilson.

To the Editor of the Times

Sir,—I do not doubt that most of the letters which appear from time to time in your columns criticizing the proposal to return colonies to Germany are written with genuine conviction. That, however, is not enough. Knowledge of the actual facts is more important. Will you allow me, therefore, to state briefly certain considerations which no controversialist of just judgment and good will would wish to ignore when discussing this question, so profoundly important for the future relationships of the two countries directly concerned and for the peace of Europe.

(1) The German colonial movement dates from the seventeenth century, when the Great Elector of Brandenburg obtained colonies in West Africa. From that time forward it was kept alive by Prussian kings, German political economists, and a large band of intrepid explorers of the first rank who added greatly to the knowledge of North, South, East, and West Africa, as well as of the dark regions of Australia and the South American Continent.

(2) Before Bismarck in 1880 took steps to obtain colonies he was careful to satisfy himself that British rights and claims would not be invaded. On this subject readers may be referred to an easily obtained publication entitled "German Colonization", which was written by me at the request of the Foreign Office for use at the Peace Conference and which had the formal imprimatur of the Colonial Office. Not one of Germany's colonies was acquired by war or conquest, no rights of other Powers were violated, and some of the territories were formally confirmed to her by treaties to which Great Britain was a party.

(3) Many and generous tributes of praise and admiration were paid before the war to Germany's colonial work, not only by men of the highest standing like Cecil Rhodes, Sir Harry Johnston, Theodore Roosevelt, and Sir J. S. Keltie, but by Foreign Office Reports. In the early years mistakes were made, excesses committed, and in one case a rebellion was quelled by drastic measures. But was it different with any other Colonial Power, and was the suppression of the Hereros of South West Africa by the Germans harsher than the suppression of the Matabele and Mashonas? What, also, of the Belgian "Congo atrocities" and Portugal's cruel slavery record?

(4) Long before 1914 the administration of the German colonies left little to be desired in efficiency or the humane treatment of the natives. On the eve of the war our Government was about to transfer to Germany certain British colonial territory. Are we to believe that it regarded the Germans as unfit to colonize? The fine work done by German doctors and administrators in the combating of tropical disease and the relief of its victims alone discredited any such idea.

(5) One of your correspondents recently wrote that Germany would "militarize the natives". Germany never militarized her black subjects; only France has done this. (See Brigadier-General Fendall's book "The East African Force, 1915-19" (pp. 22-33). What has that correspondent to say about the fact that in giving France the mandate over a German colony her allies empowered her to militarize the natives? Marshal Foch boasted that his country would have a million colonial soldiers ready for the next European war.

(6) On the question of Germany's need of colonies as outlets for population and as sources of raw materials for industry, &c., I will only say that denials from subjects of an Empire which owns and controls over a quarter of the globe are not likely to impress the landless nations, and that so to argue is singularly impolitic.

(7) It has been objected that having once received their mandates the Powers now in possession cannot renounce them. Yet Great Britain has renounced the mandate over Iraq and France is about to do the same in relation to Syria.

(8) It has also been said that it is "unthinkable" that British subjects should be handed over to another Government. Yet in 1919 Great Britain and her Allies did not regard it as unthinkable to hand over arbitrarily millions of Germans to foreign Governments. Is the honour of one country superior to that of another? Of course reciprocal conditions of transfer would have to be negotiated.

(9) Germany's offer of October 5th, 1918, to surrender on the basis of President Wilson's Fourteen Points and his other peace utterances was solemnly accepted by all the allied Powers. The fifth Point stipulated that there should be "free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustments of all colonial claims", and that "the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined" should be considered equally with "the interests of the populations concerned", while another of the pledges given to Germany was that the peace should "not contravene her legitimate economic aspirations". Nevertheless, Germany's rights and title were never once considered.

The longing for a peaceful Europe is universal, yet so long as the material provisions of the treaties of peace remain unmodified we shall seek peace in vain.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. Dawson.

It would be an aid to clear thinking, and, perhaps, to an ultimate settlement of the question, if sympathizers with German aspirations would realize that there can be no general "return" of the former German Colonies in Africa. There are obvious reasons, for which no British Government will abandon Tanganyika, and the same may be said of the Union Government as regards South-West Africa.

In respect of the matter in question there is no special virtue in the former possessions of Germany. If ever any cession of territory is made to Germany it will be in the interests of peace and as a contribution to a general settlement, and not in recognition of past errors or to right a wrong. Also, may I suggest that it serves no purpose to persist in telling the Germans that colonies are of no use or advantage to the owners. One is reminded of the rich man assuring his poor neighbour that wealth brings only troubles in its train. The Germans remain unconvinced. Moreover, in this matter the Germans are largely actuated by psychological motives, as to which no argument is possible.

In these circumstances, and since you have opened your columns to a discussion of the subject, it may clear the air if we give the matter a practical aspect and consider how African territory can be ceded with the least inconvenience to the owners and with the best prospect of satisfying the natural, if not legitimate, wishes of Germany. A reference to the map of Africa shows that in the mid-western portion of the continent possessions of the four great African landlords follow one another in this order: British, French, Belgian, and Portuguese. I suggest, for consideration, that Britain should cede to Germany a section of Western Nigeria, with access to the sea, and to include the mandated zone which forms the frontier of the Colony; to this France would add a portion of the adjoining territory of the Cameroons of equal extent and value; south of this, Belgium would cede her share in the form of a section of the Congo, and to this would be added an equal Portuguese contribution from Angola, with access, presumably, to the mouth of the Congo. Germany would thus become the owner of two colonies, richer and more varied, if not more extensive, than her former possessions. She ought to be satisfied.

The above very tentative proposal may illustrate at once the ease and the difficulty of the problem. The ease, because if only the necessary sacrifice were consented to by the four Powers, I believe that their delegates could agree on details in as many days. But the difficulty will lie in the principle involved. Those of us who have served the State know the altruism of which British Governments are capable, and their ever-present readiness to make graceful concessions. But this spirit is less prevalent among the Governments of foreign nations. I anticipate that it would be very difficult to obtain the required agreement. Hoc opus, hic labor. But I would not say that it cannot be done if England were to give a strong lead.

I have no wish to appear an advocate of the scheme outlined above. There may be better methods of redistribution. My purpose is to put the question in the light of a concrete proposition which accords with the wise words of Sir Arnold Wilson, when he spoke, in a recent letter to you, of a "general settlement in which all must play a part and to which all must contribute."

If any cession is made, I hope that it may be in a sufficiently liberal spirit to achieve its purpose and in full sovereignty; also, that all non-German European residents and traders in the ceded territories who do not wish to come under German rule may be bought out and compensated at the expense of Germany.

Claud Russell.

I have recently returned from a mission to certain Empire countries, including Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, and in all these I have found the belief that there must be some solution of this issue not beyond the wit of men and statesmen to devise, and that it would be folly to risk another European War on account of not dealing with it. I am realist in politics, and do not believe in shelving a live issue because it is difficult to find a solution. If we do not face up to this issue now I have no doubt in my own mind that it would produce very serious repercussions in the future, and that generations to come will rightly blame us for our lack of foresight and prevision.

This is a question, however, which concerns not only our own nation but all the colony-owning nations. I submit, on the other hand, that it does not directly concern nations who are not colony-owning, and therefore I should be sorry to see such an international commission appointed as is recommended by Lord Allen of Hurtwood. On analysis it would be found that the colony-owning nations are:—Great Britain, France, Italy, Portugal, Holland, Belgium, Spain, the United States, and Japan. These countries between them should with good will be able to satisfy Germany's aspirations, Germany on her part making a contribution to the general pacification of the world and being reasonable, even if disappointed, if she does not receive back all her ex-colonial territories.

Personally I have never felt any strong reason against the return to Germany of Togoland, or of the Cameroons, and I believe, if European peace were at stake, New Zealand would not feel very strongly about the return of German New Guinea. Japan might even be persuaded to hand back some of the islands in the Pacific which she received under mandate.

So far as Holland is concerned she neither lost nor won anything during the last War in her comfortable position as a neutral country protected by the Allies on both sides. She has huge undeveloped areas in Dutch New Guinea—adjacent to German New Guinea—peopled by tribes still living in the Stone Age and regarding all white men as belonging to the same nationality and race. There, and perhaps elsewhere, she might be able to help. Portugal likewise has large areas of very sparsely developed territories whose inhabitants need not suffer by change of master-ship. Portugal could also help if so minded.

I do not wish to pursue this further, but I am satisfied that the time is now insistently ripe for seriously investigating this subject, in the first place, I venture to suggest, through a committee of experts set up by the colony-owning nations.

Lord Elibank.

From a Discussion between Sir Evelyn Wrench and Sir George Maxwell

Sir Evelyn Wrench wrote a letter to the Times in connection with the Italo-Abyssinian conflict, in which he expressed the view that the only satisfactory basis for European rule in tropical Africa in future was a trusteeship on mandatory principles, if there were not to be a conflict between the nations possessing colonies and those not possessing them. The British Empire should play a leading role in the realisation of this aim.

These proposals brought a reply from Sir G. Maxwell who asked Sir Evelyn Wrench a number of questions to which the latter replied.

Question.—Why should Great Britain set an example?

Answer.—Because Great Britain has a great task of moral leadership in the world. Journeying through a dozen countries this autumn I was convinced that it would have been much better for Europe and ourselves, if Great Britain had some years back given the lead Sir Samuel Hoare gave at Geneva in September.

Question.—Is there any hope of it being followed by Italy, whose "colony hunger" is the motive for the present war?

Answer.—So long as the nations share the views of the eighteenth century on economic nationalism, they will no doubt refuse to carry on a forward policy. I have made my proposals with the definite object of formulating a colonial policy which will remove the needs of the nations that do not possess colonial territories and are not in a position to obtain raw materials. If France or Great Britain, as the two greatest colonial Powers, merely try to "keep out the foreigners", they will make the conflict between the "haves" and the "have-nots" among the nations unavoidable.

Question.—Is there any hope that France will follow, under whose colonial principles and methods the inhabitants of a French colony are taught to regard themselves as worthy Frenchmen?

Answer.—An Englishman is getting upon dangerous ground when he attempts to prophesy as to political tendencies in France. This much I will prophesy—that when the French African possessions acquire in the future the status of "Brown Dominions" the policy of sending native troops for service overseas will cease.

Question.—Who would gain by this handing over? So far as the raw products, industries, and import and export trade of any British Crown Colony are concerned, has a British subject a penny-worth of advantage over a non-British person?

Answer.—Sir George Maxwell is taking me very far afield. If world unity is our goal, everything that makes its attainment more difficult is to be deplored. For this reason I consider the high tariff in the United States one of the causes of the world's present economic plight. If the colony-owning countries agreed to govern them on the mandate principle, I consider the whole world would benefit, because one of the chief causes of friction among nations would be removed. Ever since the War there has been a

The Fate of a Small German Industrial Town in South West Africa

An Example of Industrial Development: The Tsumeb Mine

The discovery of copper lying on the surface in German South West Africa between Otavi and Tsumeb led in 1892 to the formation of the South West African Company Ltd., which worked with German and English capital. In the same year the German Government granted extensive land and mining rights to the Company in the north-east of the Protectorate. The exploration of these areas showed the existence of a workable copper vein to a depth of 20 metres and furthermore, in the Otavi valley, in addition to copper, also lead and silver. In view of these facts the Otavi-Minen- und Eisenbahngesellschaft was formed in 1910 with considerable participation of the main German banks. As the name of the Company implies, part of the business consisted in railway construction. Thus the Otavi line came into existence, with a length of 567 km., which was put into operation in 1906 and connected up with the port of Swakopmund. The railway also opened up a farming district which in course of time became constantly more flourishing.

At Tsumeb copper deposits at a lower level were subsequently discovered. Shortly afterwards, in 1907, the extraction of these deposits was started. The yield of the ore was 13 % copper, 28 % lead and 280 gr. silver per ton. As rich iron deposits had been found in the immediate vicinity of the line at Kalkfeld, the mine was enabled to smelt the ore at Tsumeb itself, and this represented an advantage for the entire territory in respect of labour and profits.

In the course of the years the small Tsumeb became a flourishing centre. The mining plant, with shafts, smelting furnaces, workshops and ore dumps grew and expanded. Streets were laid out, schools and two churches were built, trade and traffic increased with the growing numbers of workers.

The mine employed 3000 natives and 250 Europeans. Even in 1930, 184,000 tons of ore were still mined.

On account of the slump in copper prices on the world market, the works were closed in 1931 as unremunerative. At present, all the works at Tsumeb are at a standstill. The lower levels of the mine, at a depth of 490 metres, are for the most part under water; the German school has had to close its doors; most houses in the town are abandoned. Most of the German workmen have found occupation in the Union of South Africa at the newly founded iron works near Pretoria. The many thousands of natives have returned to their tribes. No price drop in the world could have caused this flourishing industrial life in the midst of Africa to cease, if the creators of the works had remained the protectors. The mines of Tsumeb were allowed to fall into neglect, not because the ore deposits are exhausted, but because the world has a surplus of copper.

Whereas in the works and dwellings of a prim industrial town created by the German spirit of enterprise, nature is carrying on its work of destruction, Germany is not in a position to cover her requirements of copper, because she cannot either exchange goods or purchase in her own currency.

The Tsumeb Mine

Hauling Plant of the Tsumeb Mine

growing number of preferences in the British Empire and the process has been hastened by Ottawa. Sir George is no doubt familiar with the Colonial Office publications No. 83, 1933, and No. 97, 1934. British imports enjoy a very definite preference in a number of Colonial territories, especially in those not bound by the Congo Basin Convention.

General von Epp's case examined by the Rt. Hon. L. S. Amery, M. P.

The case for Germany's reacquiring the Colonies which she lost in the Great War is stated by General von Epp with such evident sincerity and conviction that it obviously deserves careful examination. If that examination shows that the case is one based on a profound misapprehension of the facts, both economic and juridical, and that the solution demanded by General von Epp is an impossible one, that does not mean that there is no German case to be dealt with and no solution for it to be discovered, still less does it imply an attitude of mere negative hostility to all German aspirations.

Let us examine the actual facts past and present. Before the War the whole of the German colonies together took 0.6 per cent., or 1/180th part of Germany's exports, and supplied her with 0.5 per cent., or 1/200th part of her imports. The average annual emigration from Germany to German colonies, in the ten years before the War, was about forty, say 1/600th of her total emigration. By 1914 the total German population of those colonies, including 3,000 military and police, was barely 20,000.

General von Epp is equally under a misapprehension when he thinks that by the loss of her territorial sovereignty she has been "cut off" from importing raw materials from her former colonies. The greater part of them, viz. Tanganyika, Cameroons and Togoland are, in virtue of the mandatory undertakings of their present possessors, precluded from pursuing any policy of trade discrimination, at any rate as regards members of the League of Nations. Germany has continued to benefit by this provision even though she has thrown over the League. She is not only as free to buy, but as free to sell, in those territories, and the adjoining territories, as those who directly administer them. In the three years 1933-35 she bought £1,080,561 of products from East Africa. But she could have bought more if she had wanted—so far at any rate as East Africa was concerned—for she sold to East Africa during the same period £1,429,415 worth. Taking Tanganyika alone, her favourable trade balance with it for 1934-35 was £67,628. In the British Cameroons, 42.5 of their import trade and 79.8 of their export trade in 1934 was done with Germany. Where is the "cutting off" of Germany's access to raw materials in that instance? Her former colonies in South-West Africa and in the Pacific have, it is true, come within the South African, Australian or New Zealand fiscal systems. But Germany does a large trade, both import and export, with these Dominions, all three of which would gladly sell more to her if she were in a position to import.

General von Epp, in this connection, lays great stress upon the importance of markets in which German currency would be legal tender, in which Germans could buy necessary raw materials with their "own money." There is something in this argument, though not nearly as much as he suggests. Unless those colonies were to be taken out of the free trade zone and included in a strict preferential system, or unless German currency were depreciated to an extent that would be equivalent to a substantial tariff against the non-German world, the mere fact that the currency was German would not lead to those colonies buying from or selling to Germany if other competitors could sell more cheaply or offer a better price for their products. Identity of currency is a convenience which, so far as it goes, facilitates trade intercourse. But in the main, the power of purchase, whether of raw materials, or of anything else, is created by the establishment of foreign credits through sale of one's own products either directly or to some third country. One can, of course, buy the products of one's colonial territories, as of one's home territory, with paper money, regardless of the balance of trade, but only at the cost of a depreciation of the currency whose final reaction may far outweigh any advantage secured.

In any case the question of the economic value of colonies has assumed, in German eyes, a wholly disproportionate importance. There is, after all, no evidence that the ownership of colonies is an indispensable condition of prosperity. It is clear that, in the main, the prosperity, or the reserve, of the various European countries

Question.—Does Sir Evelyn believe that, on its merits, the plan should be adopted, even if the other European countries reject it?

Answer.—Yes, I do believe that Great Britain should declare to the world that she will govern those of her Colonial dependencies not yet fit for self-government on the mandate principle. Sooner or later other nations would have to follow suit.

to-day is due far more to their respective financial and monetary policies at home than to their possession or non-possession of a colonial empire.

The problem, indeed, so far as there is one, is not primarily a colonial one, if by colonies are meant territories directly dependent on and controlled by the governing power. All the world's colonies, in that sense, added together are only responsible for a very small fraction, not more than 10 per cent., of the world's production of essential raw materials. It is quite true that they produce nearly all the world's rubber and palm oil; slightly more than half the world's tin and phosphates, and about a quarter of the world's supply of copper, ground nuts and sisal. Apart from these materials I have mentioned, the overwhelming bulk of the world's supply of raw materials comes from the U.S.A., from Russia, from the British Dominions, from British India, from Central and South America, in other words, from self-governing states.

The real trouble then, such as it is, is one dependent upon the policy of these self-governing states, and the fact is that most of these self-governing states have, in increasing measure, for the last 50 years, been determined to develop their own secondary industries as well as their primary ones. They are steadily setting up tariffs and fostering their own manufactures to the detriment of the exporters from the old industrial countries, and unconsciously making it more difficult for those countries to secure the raw materials they need. Any remedy then, to be effective, must be one which deals not merely with colonies, but with the whole problem of access to raw materials. That means dealing with sovereign states, not by negotiation with a few colony-owning principals but by direct negotiation with a number of free negotiators. There can be no question of imposing any particular policy upon all these countries; still less can there be any question of the redistribution of their territories.

But before dealing with the possibility of a solution to this, the economic aspect of the problem, I must first dispose of the juridical and historical contentions which form the other half of the case advanced by General von Epp.

The assumption here is that the German Colonies were temporarily impounded by the League of Nations which handed them over to the Mandatory Powers as tenants at will, but that their real ownership is still in some sense vested in Germany. For this assumption there is no foundation whatever in the facts. Germany ceded her colonial territories, as completely and irrevocably as she ceded Alsace-Lorraine or the former German territories which are now part of Poland. She ceded them by Article 119 of the Treaty of Versailles, not to the League but to the principal Allied and Associated Powers. These Powers proceeded to divide these territories between themselves by mutual agreement. With that division the League had nothing whatever to do. Whether the division was final and absolute, as common sense would suggest, or whether there still exists some sort of unsubstantial ghost of ultimate sovereignty in the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, as some ingenious lawyers have suggested, there is at any rate no question that, so far as territorial sovereignty is concerned, neither the League nor Germany have any juridical standing in the matter.

How then did the League come into the picture? It came in because the Allied Powers were concerned to make clear to President Wilson and to the world that were not taking over these territories for the sake of exploitation, but for their own security, and intended to administer them in the interests of the inhabitants and on principles of non-discrimination in trade. In order to give to that intention a more formal and explicit sanction they agreed to embody it in documents specifically setting out their undertakings, to submit these documents to the League, as representing the international conscience, for its approval, and to make to the League an annual report as to the fulfilment of these undertakings. The Mandates have nothing to do with the ownership or possible disposal of the territories concerned. They constitute, on the one side, a solemn undertaking by the Power in possession of the territory, and on the other the formal blessing of the League upon that Power's good intentions. A violation of the undertaking would give the League cause for complaint, as would the infraction of any other treaty registered with the League.

That is the juridical position. But General von Epp has an alternative line of argument on moral grounds. What happened should not have happened: (a) because earlier treaties had provided for the permanent neutrality in peace and war of the so-called Congo Basin area; (b) because one of President Wilson's Fourteen Points stipulated for a "free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims" with special regard to the interests of the Natives; (c) because of the "colonial-guilt lie." As regards point (a) that could at best only affect Cameroons and Tanganyika. In any case the question of "who began the War" in the colonial sphere is one on which there is much to be said on both sides.

As for point (b) the Allies, including President Wilson, no doubt, in this respect as in others, gave to the Fourteen Points an interpretation not entirely in accordance with that which Germany hoped they might give to them. They decided that on consideration of all claims Germany was not entitled to retain any of her colonies. The main reason—and I think I can speak with the authority of one who helped to prepare the British case—was strategical. Neither this country, nor the Dominions, nor our Allies, wished to be exposed again to the menace of a restlessly ambitious neighbour in what we wished to be essentially un militarised areas.

In their endorsement of this resolution the Allies were not uninfluenced by the fact that the German Colonies were in no sense, economic, social or historical, an integral or deeply-rooted part of Germany's national life.

As for Germany's moral unfitness to govern Natives (which did not, of course, figure in the actual treaty) that was of a piece with much else that was said, in speeches and even official correspondence, that belonged to the not wholly dispassionate atmosphere of the time. But it was essentially incidental, and added nothing to the real reasons for the Allied decision.

The arguments on our side for not surrendering those one-time German Colonies which are in the possession of the United Kingdom or of the Dominions are, to say the least of it, as strong as they were in 1919. The strategical reasons have certainly not lost weight in the interval. With Italy established as a formidable military and air power in Abyssinia the re-establishment of Germany—now allied with Japan—across our line of communications by land, air and sea in that part of the world would gravely imperil the position in South Africa, in East Africa and in the whole Indian Ocean. After all, General von Epp's own demand for a colonial empire sufficient to enable Germany to buy her raw materials with her own money would never be satisfied without an empire far larger than any she ever possessed or than we ourselves "possess" to-day.

Moreover, in the years that have passed, these territories have become fully absorbed into the administrative framework of the British Empire. The exact status of a mandated territory makes no difference to the fact that a whole generation of the native inhabitants has grown up under British rule, that in accordance with our principles and our pledges under the mandates, we have accustomed them to our ideas of justice, made them feel that they are being governed for their own sake and not merely in our interest, have trained them in the rudiments of self-government. We have no more right to hand them over the counter as small change in a political deal than we have to hand over any other population that is under British rule and content to remain there.

What applies to the Natives applies also to our own people, who on the strength of repeated official assurances as to the permanence of our occupation have settled in these territories or invested their money in them.

If territorial redistribution is ruled out, what is the solution?

Many speakers and writers have suggested that it lies in the direction of extending the area of universal free trade and getting rid of economic nationalism in all its forms. I believe that to be an idle hope. The forces in favour of economic organisation on national lines, of securing the maximum development of the resources of any particular state, of maintaining certain standards of living for its workers, is far too strong to be reversed to-day.

We cannot restore the nineteenth century in the middle of the twentieth century. No self-governing state is going to adopt the policy of free trade to-day, or even to favour a policy of equal treatment of all nations as against a policy of specific advantages secured from specific nations by definite trade agreements.

In any case, so far as the colonial sphere is concerned, there is very little room for expansion of the policy of equal trade which is already in force over most of tropical Africa and in the Dutch East Indies. If we take our own colonies, most of those outside Africa have some measure of self-government in fiscal matters, and wherever they have such freedom, as for instance in the case of the West Indies and Canada, they have negotiated preference on their own terms. Indeed, most of the preference which now exists in the British colonial empire, is preference gained by the colonies concerned as the result of negotiations, or arises from their free recognition of the advantage which it is to them to be under a preferential system. Indeed I doubt if, in the long run, you can justify the forcible imposition of free trade upon any subject territory.

Lastly, I would say that such a system of universal enforced equal treatment is not even in the interests of those who are most vocal about their present difficulties. It is not Germany or Italy who are going to gain in the long run from the open door in Africa, but Japan, China, and India. In the world to-day what is wanted by the nations is not promiscuous free trade but assured and stable trade based on mutual reciprocity and on economic co-operation between nations who are in a position to supplement each other's deficiencies. It is on these lines that we shall find the solution: it is on these lines, after all, that the nations of the British Empire have, since Ottawa, been developing co-operation among themselves.

I see no reason myself why the industrial nations of Western Europe should not follow our Ottawa example and establish a system of mutual preference between those that have colonies capable of producing far more than their mother countries can absorb, and those which have large markets and no colonies. Belgium and Holland could well come to an arrangement with their great hinterland in Germany and Central Europe. And such a scheme could also bring in those less developed countries of Eastern and South-Eastern Europe which in economic structure correspond to some of our dominions just as the countries in the West and North-West of Europe correspond to ourselves. We would thus get a system, corresponding to the system established in Ottawa, with opportunities for almost unlimited development.

Such a scheme would not, any more than the Ottawa scheme, be exclusive and preclude trade outside its confines. But it would secure a wide area of balanced trade—the best equivalent of that trade "with our own money" that General von Epp postulates—as the flywheel of Germany's economic life. That Germany's colony-owning partners in such a scheme should also give special facilities to German contracts and German colonists or planters would only be a natural corollary, once the fear of German territorial designs was removed.

There is, however, one obstacle in the way of such a solution as I have indicated. That is the Most Favoured Nation Clause in most of the commercial treaties of this and other countries, as well as the Free Trade restrictions under the Mandates or under the Treaty of St. Germain. If we were to waive our rights under those treaties in respect of any arrangements for mutual preference entered into by the nations of Continental Europe west of Russia, including their colonies, we should give a lead which it would be difficult for the United States or any other extra-European Power not to follow or, indeed, submit to. We shall be making some sacrifice of trade, no doubt; but the sacrifice would be compensated, to some extent at least, by a corresponding greater freedom to ourselves to make special arrangements with countries like Egypt and Iraq, possibly even the Argentine and the Scandinavian countries, free of most favoured nation obligations. In any case it would involve none of those political and moral difficulties which rule out the surrender of territories, and still more of peoples, now under the British flag.

To the Editor of the Times

Sir,— May I put before the readers of the Times certain impressions of the present international situation derived from discussions with people interested in international affairs during a visit to Canada and United States from which I have just returned?

Many of those most inclined to support the collective system in international affairs are alarmed at the present tendency to make the League an instrument for waging war—police war—by economic or military means, in order to maintain the status quo, a tendency emphasized by its apparent inability to make itself an instrument for peace by dealing vigorously and successfully with the causes of aggression.

In the view of many thoughtful people on the other side of the Atlantic the major cause of the present rise in armaments, the present wars in Abyssinia and the Far East, and the threatened conflict in Europe is not territorial frontiers, but the economic suffocation of certain nations possessed of inadequate natural resources and markets within the territories in which their currency runs, through international restrictions on the movement of trade, capital, and population.

The most significant phenomenon is that in all these countries the younger generation are being prepared to break their bonds, if necessary at the cost of war, if no other way of providing for their future can be found. Unless the collective system can grapple with this aspect of the prevention of war at least as vigorously as it is attempting to deal with aggression itself the League will eventually become no more than one-half of a new Balance of Power in which the other half will be the so-called suffocated Powers. It is the feeling that a second intervention in an European war, so long as Europe is divided into 26 watertight economic compartments, is no more likely to result in a lasting peace than was the intervention in 1917 that in part at any rate accounts for the recent drive towards neutrality in the United States.

If the present deadlock is to be resolved it can only be by exploring thoroughly the avenue opened in Sir Samuel Hoare's speech of September 10th last in which he proposed a joint investigation into the problem of giving access to the "suffocated" Powers to the raw materials and markets of the rest of the world. The only real way out is to prove to Mussolini and the Italian people as well as to Hitler and Dr. Schacht and the German people that there is a way in which Italy and Germany can make sure of a steadily rising standard of living for their own people which is more certain than the costly, calamitous, and probably ineffectual method of attempting territorial or colonial expansion by means of war. A solution which by removing the barriers which now prevent world development and world trade began to solve the problem of unemployment in these countries would ensue to the benefit of the rest of the world as well.

The root of the problem does not lie in territorial or colonial exchanges. The urgent need is to make it possible for the so-called suffocated countries to buy foodstuffs and raw materials with their own currencies or by exporting in exchange their own manufactured products in quantities sufficient to make an immediate impression on their domestic unemployment and under conditions which promise a steadily rising standard of living at home in the future. How that is to be done is a matter for scientific economists to advise and for statesmen to propose to their peoples. In this aspect of international peacemaking—the aspect which alone promises a general reduction in tension and armament expansion—we are far more likely to enlist the co-operation of the New World than in action which has in it the direct risk of war.

VI. An Enquiry by the Royal Institute of International Affairs: "Raw Materials and Colonies"

(Chatham House, St. James' Square, London, SW. 1)

The enquiry starts with the claims of Germany, Italy and Japan, and from this standpoint treats the unsatisfactory territorial distribution of colonies as a factor of the current unrest, and the economic need for raw materials as the principal cause of the German demand for colonies. At the outset of the enquiry we find a Table which shows the extent to which the individual countries are reduced to import commodities from overseas to satisfy their demand for raw materials. Four signs are used in the Table viz. a plus (+) sign for commodities of which the country in question has an export surplus, an asterisk (*) for commodities in respect of which the country is virtually dependent on others, a minus (—) sign for raw materials in the case of which there is a partial demand for import from other countries, and a double minus (—) sign for materials which have to be imported to a large extent or wholly from other countries.

A brief glance is sufficient to show where the dividing line runs as between the countries with abundance of raw materials and the "Have nots." The plus signs and the asterisks predominate in the case of the British Empire, the United States and Russia; and the French colonial empire is also adequately situated in the matter of raw materials supply. The only important raw material which England lacks is oil; and a prudent and far-sighted policy in the matter of oil supply has served to place the extensive oil-fields of Iran and Iraq under British control. The United States lack only rubber. The same is true of Russia. The French have neither coal, rubber, oil nor cotton. But these gaps in the supply of the countries mentioned are nothing to the gaps in the supply of the three countries Japan, Italy and Germany; and, of these three "Have nots," Germany is by far the worst off, in as much as the only raw materials of which she has an abundance are coal and potash, while all the other raw materials on the list are shown in her case with a minus sign. There are 6 commodities, in the case of which she is dependent in part, and 26 in the case of which she is wholly dependent, on imports from abroad.

Under these circumstances it is not calculated to have a conciliatory effect to point out that no country and no political unit is wholly autonomous.

Another table which gives a comparative survey of the colonial production of the world is made the basis for the conclusion that very little importance attaches to the mandated territories as sources of raw materials. It follows, so the argument goes, that the return of the former German territories cannot do anything for the restoration of German prosperity. The problem, it is said, cannot really be solved by transfers of territory, unless "it were decided to transfer whole continents." The only possibility of improvement lies in the direction of greater freedom of trade.

What the position in regard to the freedom of trade thus predicated really is as the result of restrictions, direct and indirect, and the establishment of 11,000 km. of new tariff and Customs boundaries since the War, will be shown in detail below.

The enquiry concludes as follows:

"For the economic side of the claim for colonies must be viewed in its proper relation to the psychological aspect. The fact must be faced that the claim exists, based on a lack of certainty of continued access to sources of supply, which, combined with motives of prestige and strategy, creates a desire for possession. If the colonial Powers decide to ignore this claim, they would appear to lay themselves open to trouble. Adjustment in the matter of access to colonial resources is a step towards easing their situation, but it is instilling a false hope to argue that the whole solution lies that way."

D. The official attitude of France and Belgium

The French attitude has already been outlined in various utterances of French politicians such as Archimbeau (Chairman of the Colonial Committee of the Chamber of Deputies) and former French Ministers like Sarraut and Perrier. To these may be added one or two further utterances, for instance:

"The return or sale of colonies would be a particularly painful experience for any European organiser. As I have said in my published writings, the handing over of a colony in return for political advantages, the handing over (that is to say) of a society of human beings, would be exactly similar to a deal in goods or negro slaves..... My desire is for the institution of European co-operation — in which Germany would assume the place belonging to her as a great nation — for the vast task of opening up the Black Continent. But such co-operation would have to be subject to conditions which left untouched the principle of present sovereignty. My view is that Africa, black Africa, should be a meeting-ground, a place of mutual understanding and combination of those interests which in Europe at the present time are arrayed against one another in the fatal clash of economic nationalisms, with every prospect of bringing Europe in the end to her ruin, if she is not careful. Europe calls for reconstruction, if she is to stand up to that Asiatic menace to the dangers of which I have long since drawn attention; and such reconstruction, as I see the position, can only take place in Africa."

The above is the attitude of the former Premier and Minister for the Colonies, Sarraut. Side by side with it, take the following declaration of the former Colonial Minister, Paul Reynaud. Writing in the Echo de Paris he said:

"It is necessary to destroy the illusions which are widely held as to the benefits an African colony can bring to a European country. Let us tell Germany we are ready to rebuild the continent of Europe now threatened with disaster at the hands of Asia as a result of the historic hatreds by which it is torn in two. But such reconstruction cannot issue from a struggle for hegemony in Europe; for in any such struggle it would be the most highly developed and most fragile nations that would receive the fatal wounds."

The present Minister for the Colonies, Moutet, wrote as follows in the Paris Soir of December 28th, 1936:

"My opinion is that the possibility of a return of the former German colonies simply does not arise. France exercises her mandate within the framework of the League of Nations, and will not surrender it. Our colonial policy, as I see it, is a long-sighted policy, which is what it was supposed under the terms of the mandate to be. Who anyway has any cause for complaint under the present circumstances? The mandate is a charge; and such advantages as we derive therefrom are not privileges. The economic system of the mandated territories is the system of the Open Door, and all nations, provided they are members of the League of Nations, are entitled — so far as economic benefits are concerned — to develop the country, to send in their goods and to acquire raw materials. The notable development which is the fruit of our colonial labours is seen at a glance on the spot or in the statistics of the territories concerned. It is sufficient to compare the present position with that which we found when we first assumed our mandate. It is a joke to talk of peoples who are constricted finding an outlet for their superfluous population in these regions. No Europeans can work in such climates except in a few directing posts. We cannot contemplate any change in our colonial policy for a variety of reasons, the chief of which is to be found in the wishes of the native populations..... I want cooperation with Germany in the economic field, if Germany is prepared to cooperate for peaceful ends. Germany will always find a willing ear if she is prepared openly and frankly to seek general agreement. But the initiative rests with her — not with us."

The above utterances were sufficiently remarkable. Still more so an interview which Moutet gave on February 10th, 1937, to the periodical Vu. He there argued that the German desire for colonial possessions with a view to settlement was invalidated by the fact that only 80,000 Frenchmen had settled in Tunis up to the present, and another 80,000 in Morocco. Considering the exiguous population of France, the argument can hardly be said to be convincing; but the further point which the Minister proceeded to make that even the United States with the largest production of automobiles in the world do not command a supply of the raw rubber which they require for their cars, and that France has no oil, is so poor an answer to the economic and monetary arguments on the colonial issue as to suggest inevitably ignorance, wilful or otherwise, of economic considerations.

The Premier, Blum, in his Lyons speech of January 24th made the well-known suggestion that the concession of economic or colonial advantages to Germany should take the form of a trade deal. He went on to say that the connection between the particular problem of colonies and the general problems of peace was pregnant and inevitable. "Under present conditions in Europe, where competition in armaments is proceeding at an even faster rate than it did before the war, how are economic agreements to be negotiated independently of political settlements? Where is the country which would be prepared to cooperate with another country by giving it credits, by improving its supply of raw materials, by facilitating its emigration or colonisation activities, or by any other measures, so long as the possibility persists of even so much as an apprehension on the part of the former country that the assistance which it lends to the other may one day be turned against itself, and that the credits, the raw materials, the oversea enterprises and the rest may be used to strengthen a striking power and a military potential of which its friends or itself may find themselves the victims? There is a necessary, an inevitable, connection between economic cooperation on the one hand and the organisation of peace and the arrest of armaments competition on the other."

The attitude of Belgium again has been similarly made clear by a number of official utterances to the effect that there is no colonial question, so far as Belgium is concerned. The Congo is regarded as an integral part of Belgium, and any menace to its independence (it is intimated) will be resisted by the latter with every means in her power, including military means. It is however noticeable these utterances only refer to the Congo: they never include the mandated territory of Ruanda-Urundi. The instructions issued by the Foreign Ministers Hymans, Vandervelde and van Zeeland to the Belgian Ministers in foreign capitals on May 19th, 1927, June 20th, 1928, and May 31st, 1935, are explicit in this sense. Answering Lloyd George's speech in the House of Commons on February 5th, 1936, the Belgian Premier van Zeeland spoke to the same effect in the Senate on February 25th; and the Foreign Minister Spaak said the same thing to the foreign Press correspondents on July 20th.

Vanderveldes remark's contained the following passage:

"The mandates question must be treated as a separate question, which can be settled only by the unanimous agreement of the interested Powers. Belgium is one of those Powers. But Belgium is not prepared for one moment to do what others are not prepared to do. If sacrifices are to be made in this connection, let them be in proportion to the shares of each of the parties concerned."

E. Reflections on the British Point of View

This British attitude, which we have intentionally given at considerable length, and in which we have reproduced in particular the views of those colonial exports who reject the German standpoint, such as Lord Lugard, the former Governor of Nigeria and for many years a member of the Permanent Mandates Commission at Geneva, and Mr. Amery, the former Colonial Secretary, compels us to devote particular attention to their arguments, in so far as they have not been already refuted in the introductory article and in the German statements.

Even on a superficial perusal, it is obvious that the views expressed, with few exceptions, even when their attitude to the German claims is sympathetic, agree on one point, i. e. the more or less open refusal to return the former German colonies. The reason given for this is no longer the lie regarding colonial guilt, but, apart from the right of war by which Germany lost her colonies, the mandatory obligations of Great Britain, her trusteeship and her anxiety for the welfare of the natives who cannot be treated as merchandise and subjected to a barter transaction. It is astonishing how certain people overlook the previous history of this distribution of colonies at Versailles where, according to a tardy statement by Mr. Baldwin, "no one was asked his opinion", in particular the natives who were simply the object of the worst kind of barter transaction. This sudden solicitude, especially in Conservative quarters, is all the more grotesque as they admit in the same breath that strategical reasons are now, as they were then, the decisive factor, for taking away the German colonies at that time and for refusing to return them at present. No mention is made as to how in reality this trusteeship was and is still to some extent exercised.

In view of the great emphasis placed on this lofty and very English conviction that the colonies and mandates are administered in trust, the sincerity of which is probably not doubted by the majority of the British nation, there is a constantly increasing danger that the entire question will become one of the prestige of the British Empire and will be removed from its natural connections into a pseudo-moral sphere.

This is the reason for the more or less disguised hints of the German peril, the enigma of the German character and the mysterious dynamics of the German nation. These are slogans which generally have an undertone of reprobation and cause those who adopt a positive attitude to think that a transfer of colonies or mandates must be subject to the condition that Germany should again return to the circle of League Powers, should accede to the system of collective security and, lastly, should agree to disarmament.

Quite apart from the fact that these quarters should be aware for what reasons Germany withdrew from the League of Nations, looks with suspicion on the system of collective security and was compelled to go over from complete disarmament to rearmament, the other arguments entirely overlook the compulsory nature of the German position and the decisive conclusion to which it leads, i. e. the same right as other colonial nations both to possess colonies and to have a share in the distribution of the raw materials of the world.

At the same time the Germans must counteract the idea that the fulfilment of the last mentioned claim, with its notion of "have-nots", might remove the legal claim to the former. Without wishing to doubt the right of other "have-nots" to similar claims, it must be pointed out that Germany, in claiming the return of her colonies, either in the form of mandates or possessions, is not appealing to the pity of the possessing Powers, but to the right which was betrayed in 1919 and was constantly delayed after Germany's admission to the League of Nations. Lastly it is necessary to meet arguments which, with a view to refusing the German claims, are based on former statements by the Leader and Chancellor and on quotations from his book "Mein Kampf", and some even on the colonial period of Bismarck, which also expressed a negative attitude. In this connection it is not pleasant to remember similar changes in British views as to the significance of colonial possessions and to recollect the time when the British were much less enthusiastic about colonies than at present. For instance, Disraeli, the great conservative statesman, who subsequently became the high priest of British imperialism, said in 1852 that "the wretched colonies are a millstone round our neck", while in 1865 a Committee of the House of Commons decided that all future extensions of territory should be rejected as inadvisable. Lord Lugard also openly admitted these facts. Such arguments are therefore very foolish.

Since the German view that colonies are a part of complete equality of rights was clearly expressed for the first time in the discussions which Sir John Simon and Mr. Eden had with the Leader and Chancellor in March 1935, it may fortunately be concluded from the discussion which has since continued that, in view of the fact that there is on the one side a mass of mostly undigested possessions in all parts of the world and on the other side a number of active nations lacking in raw materials, all clear-thinking people cannot close their eyes to the necessity of a solution and must consider that the present exclusion of a great and over-populated nation from the sources of raw materials is unjust and contrary to reason. The raising of the German claim to colonies has, however, made British public opinion think much more about this subject and—apart from the Tories of the extreme right—there are now few Englishmen who deny that a solution satisfactory to Germany must be sought in the colonial problem, and the principal difference is the method to be adopted.

We have shown in the economic part of our inquiry how far Germany can cover her overseas requirements of raw materials with the commodities that can be produced in her old colonies. It is therefore not a fact that from the economic point of view the colonial question is of so little importance that it is not worth while discussing. The astonishing argument that the possession of colonies represents a burden rather than a gain and that to some extent the nations are happier if they are discharged of this burden is strong evidence of the decided possessive instinct of the colonial countries; it is like the anger of the rich man when a poor man approaches his loaded table and asks for a little food. It makes a grotesque impression when Sir Robert Horne goes so far as to state that England belongs to the "unsatisfied" nations.

It is perhaps not right to dispute as to whether it is possible to own a third or "only" a quarter of the surface of the globe. But it is certainly wrong to prove that Germany's foreign trade with her colonies before the War scarcely amounted to 0.5% of her total trade. It is a matter of extreme surprise as to why those who now refer Germany to the "quantité négligeable" of that half per cent consider it essential and valuable enough to use this modest amount in order to round off their quarter of the surface of the globe.

We do not go to the other extreme and assert that a satisfactory settlement of the colonial question could entirely or at one stroke conjure away all Germany's troubles in respect of raw materials. The financial and transitional difficulties which would have to be overcome in order to develop the former German Protectorates so that we might be able to carry on a flourishing trade to the advantage of both parties (in a German sovereign territory and in German currency) are well known to us, especially as the territories have not the fertility of the British or Netherlands colonial possessions. But it is entirely overlooked by those who take the above view that it is now 1937 and not 1913. At that time the German Protectorates were in the initial stage of their development, and only four-tenths of the colonial exports went to the mother country which was well supplied from all sources; the remainder was exported to other countries. At the present time Germany would proceed to the economic development of her colonies with much greater enthusiasm than any other country and even than Germany before the War when she had no export and foreign exchange difficulties, no raw material problem, no currency dumping, no reparation devastations, no customs and quota barriers and similar dragon's teeth of the war and post-war period.

The raw material famine in Germany would provide a guarantee for the rapid development of the colonies returned to her. The possibility of obtaining tropical products in her own currency would be of enormous importance for a country like Germany and the question of intensive development and cultivation would assume a totally different aspect and importance than is at present the case. That the interests of the natives would not be affected, but would on the contrary be promoted, has been proved by the recognised administrative and educational methods of German colonial work in the last few years the outbreak of war.

Instead of a return of colonies or even a transfer of colonial mandates, there is now a fairly general tendency to transfer the entire problem to the sphere of commercial treaties or international agreements by the free distribution of raw materials and the abolition of existing restrictions and preferences, and to overlook the central problem, i.e. the importance of colonies as a basis of raw materials and an export market.

The meaning of the famous proposal made by Sir Samuel Hoare at the September session of the League Assembly in 1935 was "to ensure the participation of all nations in the products of the world". The object of the committee on raw materials at Geneva which arose out of that proposal is to take collective action to remove the fear entertained by countries without colonies in respect of raw material monopolies. In view of the self-satisfied examples of calculations and the theoretical inquiries with which this colonial substitute is discussed, it must be pointed out that they are not based on that thoroughness which is on the whole required by the wide recognition given to the scope of the German colonial and raw material problem. It is true that the multiplicity of these proposals shows that there is an attempt to substitute something better for the present position which is recognised as unsatisfactory, in need of change and therefore not without danger. There is agreement on this fact, though not on the ways and means to be adopted. Apart from the few proposals in favour of the cession of colonial territories on grounds of the observance of the idea of revision, or the proposals made by labour or liberal quarters in favour of a collective administration, a collective mandate or a kind of condominium for all colonies under the auspices of the League of Nations, there are two proposals which stand out from the mass and which are examined, discussed and criticised with all their variations and with all their pros and cons: the extension of the policy of the open door, and the extension of the mandatory system.

We would refer to the special chapter which we have devoted to the policy of the "open door" and its application.

The facts that are there noted and the criticisms to which they give rise suffice to show that it is wrong to try to solve the problem by the free distribution of raw materials and the removal of the existing restrictions. The "open door" alone is insufficient, in the future distribution of raw materials, to free Germany by means of various treaties from her present position as a step-child in the distribution of the raw materials of the world. For in future, as at present, a treaty guarantee of permanent access to raw materials and of colonial equality of rights will not for various reasons prevent the mother countries from creating for themselves a preferential position, in particular as sources of supply for the needs of the colonial territories.

The only one who is not impressed by the idea that, if Germany is not given her colonies she should at any rate be granted the principle of the "open door" is Mr. Amery. In his view this principle and the entire idea of most favoured nation treatment merely act as fetters. "In the interest of the obligations assumed by Great Britain", however, he is not in favour of returning the colonies, although he regards them as practically worthless from an economic point of view. But, he says, the European Powers west of Russia with their colonies could obtain a wonderful economic development from all the undeveloped land in the temperate and tropical zones if they could only decide to follow the example of Ottawa and adopt the method of mutual preferential duties and systematic cooperation. No country, he adds, would have more to offer and to gain than Germany. If any clauses in the mandates and other treaties hindered the extension of this system of preferential duties, they must be removed. And the "satisfied" countries, presumably France, Holland, Belgium and Portugal, would no doubt grant the Germans all advantages in their colonies, once they were freed from the fear of the German expansionist impulse. The Columbus egg. Mr. Amery's suggestions are too indefinite to give rise to the suspicion that they are merely a consolation, fine words instead of raw materials, or even merely a trick to extricate England from these wretched debates on colonies and raw materials. But if Mr. Amery has a really constructive proposal, we would request him to state more definitely and in greater detail his views as to this method of overcoming the German raw material distress and the difficulties in respect of exports and foreign exchange.

The position is similar with the other proposal made principally by Lord Noel Buxton, Charles Roden Buxton, Sir John Harris, Sir Arthur Salter, Prof. Bentwich, Mr. Barnes and people belonging to the Labour Party, who, with a view to creating a framework in which the Germans can develop their physical forces and mental capacity in Africa and obtain economic advantages, suggest an extension of the mandatory system. The criticism of the mandatory system has shown that all colonial nations take the view that a nation which requires colonies can only attend to them politically, economically and culturally in the widest sense, if it bears full responsibility for its own administration. As we have seen, this view has not lapsed on account of the fact that it was for the time being forgotten at Versailles when it was a case of taking away the German colonies.

* * *

Lastly, the repeated declarations of responsible representatives of the British Government form an interesting aspect of the British attitude. They show that the British Government is endeavouring not to take up an immutable attitude either for or against the German problem of colonies and raw materials. In this respect the statements of the former Prime Minister, Lord Baldwin, and his present successor Mr. Neville Chamberlain, are of importance since, in spite of certain attenuations, they give an objective judgment of the possibility not only of economic, but also of political changes in the present position.

And this is ultimately the important point.

The Problem, not of the Economic Aspect, but of Revision

The colonial problem is not only a question of raw materials or of attempts at economic solutions. The question of the settlement of colonists is also not decisive, although it cannot be simply disposed of by the well-known pre-war formulae which show no comprehension for the tremendous urge to work of a nation with special colonising gifts.

In the chapter on "the colonial-guilt lie and its refutation," we have already given the legal and moral reasons for the justice of the German colonial claim. In subsequent parts of our inquiry, we have explained the economic and political arguments in favour of German colonial possessions. But also Germany's position within the framework of European culture and among the nations of the world, her obligations in respect of the great tasks of humanity in connection with the development and utilisation of the tropics for the special benefit of the natives, for the selfare of Germany and therefore also for the world, call for overseas activity on her part. For a nation of the strength, structure, culture, and colonial past of the German nation, if it is to maintain itself, colonial activity is not a whim or a passtime, but a necessity. Germany has the same right to this activity in her own colonies as France with her small population or Great Britain with her wealth of territory. The significance of a colonial empire for them may be imperialistic in character; New Germany, with her policy based on National Socialist ideology, does not pursue either a policy of prestige or imperialistic aims.

We may add a few remarks on the racial problem, which is undoubtedly one of the most important in Africa. In the various discussions on the German colonial claim, this problem is often raised in order to prove that the subjection of natives to German rule is precluded on account of the attitude of National Socialism to foreign races. The German racial policy, it is said, is not suitable for taking over the care of natives and is contrary to the colonial idea, since it excludes all feelings of humanity towards the coloured races and would therefore lead to serious conflicts with the native populations. It is therefore claimed that National Socialist Germany offers no guarantee for a just guardianship over primitive peoples, such as is to be found in the feeling of responsibility of the democratic western colonial Powers.

It may be observed in passing, in the first place, that these Powers had enough time and opportunity for nearly fifteen years to allow democratic Germany to take part in this responsibility.

With regard to the question itself, however, the above insinuations show complete ignorance of the essence of National Socialism and its policy, the racial idea of which would do greater justice to the needs of the natives than the "democratic" administrative methods of some western colonial Powers. France, for instance, endeavours to solve the racial problem in her colonies by a policy of power on the principle of the military solidarity of all parts of her possessions, i. e. by the militarisation of the natives, and by administrative and cultural methods in the assimilation and association of the natives of her colonies with the French of the mother country by a mixture of blood, in short in forming a French nation and empire that is uniform politically, culturally, and racially with the object of promoting the imperialistic idea. It need not be specially pointed out that this is not compatible with the idea of the mandate.

Even before the War, the German colonial and native policy was based on the idea of promoting the development of the natives to a special independence, which was to be prevented from being drawn into European entanglements by means of the principle of military neutrality. It aimed at developing the natives according to their own inclinations and views, at maintaining their own culture to the exclusion as far as possible of the influences of modern civilisation which might be harmful to the natives.

A colonial administration and a native policy on the basis of the National Socialist racial idea would place still more stress on such aspirations.

The Leader and Chancellor, in his great Reichstag speech of January 30th, 1934, clearly expressed the idea of the National Socialist racial policy:

"The National Socialist racial idea and the racial knowledge on which it is based do not lead to a less regard or a depreciation of other nations, but rather to the realisation of the tasks to be faced in the proper maintenance and continuation of the life of our own people. It therefore necessarily leads to a natural respect for the life and substance of other nations. It thus releases actions of foreign policy from all attempts to subject foreigners in order to be able to rule them, or even to incorporate them as a pure mass in one's own people."

The consequence to be drawn is that every race existing in the world has its own characteristics which are destroyed by mixture with other races. The maintenance of the race and therefore also of its culture is the main task of the coloniser; it must prevent native culture which has arisen through particular circumstances from being depreciated or destroyed and leading to the destruction of the inner life of the natives. This task in no way excludes a higher education, or the teaching of modern science, which, however, if they are not ultimately to lead to a spiritual and cultural homelessness of the natives and are to fulfil their real purpose which is to maintain the natural life of the natives, their tribal peculiarities and train natives to lead their own people, must be cleansed of all appearances of a poor average.

The subjection of natives under a National Socialist administration would do more to realise the ideals put forward by well known African experts as the aim of colonising work than has hitherto been done by the colonial policy of the other Powers.

It is to misjudge the position entirely, at any rate as far as Germany is concerned, to endeavour to divert the German claims into a discussion of raw materials and economic questions and to dismiss them by talk of a better distribution of raw materials and commercial and political concessions to nations which do not possess colonies.

Apart from the fact that all these proposals, as we have seen, do not attain the desired object, but that the only solution is production and sale in sovereign territory with one's own currency, they make no contribution towards colonial revision.

What is meant by this is expressed by the Manchester Guardian of February 8th, 1937:

"But the so-called 'colonial question' is not one but two. There is the immediate question, which is largely one of political expediency, of what to do with Germany; and there is the long-term question, which is far more important, of what to do with colonial empires. By distributing Germany's colonies as League mandates at the end of the war the Allied and Associated Powers took one step forward and one step back. The mandatory system itself was a tremendous advance in colonial theory; it marked the beginning of a totally new conception of empire. But it also helped to conceal the fact that two or three Great Powers, all of them hardened imperialists, were grabbing the colonies of another Great Power as the reward of victory. As a result we are not quite certain to-day whether we have gone forward or back. If all that happened was that Britain and France added to their vast possessions at the expense of Germany, then Germany has a good case for demanding them back again; but if Britain and France really abandoned the old tradition of national possession, then it is high time we proved our sincerity by advancing still farther.

Unless, therefore, the French and British Governments begin at once to consider what they can do to extend the mandate principle to all their colonies, to revoke all economic restrictions, and, better still, to offer the mandated territories for international administration, it will be extremely difficult to resist Germany's demands. At present neither the French nor the British Government is in any position to use moral arguments. There is no such thing as a "right" to colonies, but, if we use that outworn language, Germany has as much right as Britain. Both are Great Powers, both are industrial nations, both have big guns and a feeling of superiority to the dark

s. If colonies are good for us they are good for Germany; they are bad for Germany they are bad for us. There is no room for moral arguments here. But the conclusion is not that we should return Germany's former colonies to her, for that would merely perpetuate an unjust system. On the contrary, the conclusion is that unless we are prepared to surrender our own colonial privileges to the general good we shall not have a single argument with which to resist Germany's demands."

is still more clearly expressed in a leading article in the Swiss "Appenzeller Zeitung" of December 23rd, 1936, which expresses the commonsense view in a refreshing, clear and unequivocal fashion:

is exactly a year since we wrote an article in these pages on the colonial problem. It was entitled: "The Great Powers can solve the Colonial Problem." They have not yet done it; but they have still time and opportunity to do so. As Italy is concerned, she has cleared up the question for herself. In this connection we will not enter into the question in which she has done so or the effects. If we leave aside the young (in fact too young) aspirations of Italy, there still remains the German Reich.

We do not need to defend ourselves against the suspicion of indiscriminately representing demands for fresh German colonies. We understand such demands as an emanation of the Italian temperament, as a reaction to a period of political confusion. We do not hesitate to oppose them in our own country, in which we regard them as dangerous for the realisation of a European agreement; but we also do not hesitate to support them where we find them justified and reasonable from a higher point of view. This is the case with the desire of the Reich to have colonies.

is a question for discussion whether the German method of proceeding is correct. It may even be doubted whether a demographic policy which is defensible which lives above its circumstances and which endeavours to solve the problem of a "nation without space" by increasing the numbers of the nation with every means before the required space is available and thus, without themselves admit, accumulating explosive material. In our opinion, it cannot be denied that a Power of the size and quality of Germany and a nation of the size and quality of the German nation are entitled to demand a part of what other nations have profited by for many years, or that Germany is capable of fulfilling the duties connected with the possession of colonies.

There are two aspects to the question, a political and a moral aspect. But from whatever angle the question is regarded, the conclusion is the same. Germany lost the war. It has never before in the history of the world that a State overtaken by such a fate was rewarded. If Germany had won, she would have been given nothing away to her enemies. The loser has always to make sacrifices for his loss. Complaints about such a fate are comprehensible, but it is fate. It has always taken time to compensate for the loss, and it must take time in this case. It is in the natural course of events that the loser must pay the piper, just as it is in the natural course of events that a debt can only be remitted by the creditors. Consequently in view of German desires, it is not important what is demanded. But it is important what reason demands. And a reasonable demand must not be refused on the grounds that it is contrary to the desire of the person making the demand. Germans need colonies. They need them just as much as nations who already possess colonies. Thanks to their sense of civilisation and their standard of civilisation, they are entitled to administer colonies. From a purely moral point of view that is a legitimate reason for demanding colonies. Not that the colonial possessions were lost in the War, but that they appear to be necessary and justified in peacetime. The conclusion is the same when the question is regarded from the political aspect. The Germans are mad after colonies. It is fatal to await the moment when, in full consciousness of their power, they will choose their own means of attaining their object. It is been recognised in wide circles, not only in neutral countries, that Germany also requires a raw material basis of her own. Is it proposed to wait until Germany's desire develops into an ultimatum to the Powers? Is it proposed to let matters go so far that reason can no longer be the guiding principle and prestige must become the driving force of the political decision in the colonial question? As we have said, the solution must be dictated by reason and must therefore be voluntary. If it is compulsory it will no longer be reasonable, and like all compulsion, will leave its sting in the policy of the future. But what is more obvious for the policy of democratic States—such as the present colonial Powers are—than to act in what they regard as a reasonable manner voluntarily and in accordance with what they consider right? They should not wait until the explosion, of which Herr Schacht recently gave a warning, has occurred; they should not wait until the other party has his heel upon their neck; but they should do what they consider right in good time and of their own free will. Free will and independent action do not denote weakness but strength; they do not arise out of pressure or fear; they are to the honour of the person acting on them and they give him moral credit, both for the present and even more for the future. No one knows whether he will not require credit in the future. And after all, is not the moral soundness of some importance? The deficit of States, and in particular of Great Powers can hardly be wiped out morally. The thing of ultimate importance is to do what is right. This importance is nowhere so great as in politics. It is right that a nation of nearly 70 millions requires a possibility of obtaining its own supplies. It is right that such possibilities exist to a wide extent in the world. It is right that other Powers make the greatest use of these possibilities. Lastly, it is right that Germany's participation in these possibilities does not need in any way to restrict that of the other Powers. The conclusion is evident. Let it be drawn while there is still time and while it can be drawn voluntarily. The example of Italy should have been a sufficient warning. Colonies should be ceded to Germany, so that she may not take the same path as Italy. If the readiness to do so exists, suitable objects of concession will be easily found."

If it is stated that Germany has her eye on the colonial possessions of any particular country and attempts are thus made to bring the small colonial countries into a dispute in respect of a colonial revision which does not concern them, the object of such statements can only be to cause trouble.

In answer to this, we must repeat the unequivocal statement by Adolf Hitler on January 30th that Germany has no colonial claims against countries which have not taken any of her colonies.

Lastly, it is a double-edged argument when the press of the other colonial Powers, in defending the refusal to give up even a foot of their colonial possessions, speak of the "indisputable rights" of the colonial repartition of Versailles. Germany also possesses such rights which, if the entire question were to be opened up, would presumably prove to be much more indisputable. It would soon be seen that, as Colonel House expressed it on December 6th, 1935, in the Daily Mail, the colonial Powers would have to give up the idea that "he that hath, to him shall be given, and he that hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath."

That the German nation will not waive these rights was made clear on September 10th, 1936, and January 30th, 1937, by the Leader and Chancellor, when he said:

The right of the German nation to live is just as great as the rights of other nations.

The demand for colonies in our thickly populated country is a matter of course and will constantly be raised.

THE PEACE DEMONSTRATION IN BERLIN

Mussolini's Visit to Germany

"The Berlin meeting has resulted in an understanding between the two countries on definite problems some of which are particularly important at the present time. But this understanding, which was fixed in special instruments and duly signed, this vertical line between Berlin and Rome, is not a dividing line but rather an axis around which all European States who are inspired by a desire for co-operation and peace may work together."

With these words, uttered by Mussolini on November 1st, 1936 on the Cathedral Square at Milan, the Head of the Italian Government coined the famous expression, the "Berlin-Rome axis", which has since then not disappeared from the European discussion.

Before this speech by Mussolini there had been the meeting between himself and Adolf Hitler in June 1934. Between June 1934 and October 1936 there had been mutual visits of leading statesmen of the two countries and, lastly, at the end of October 1936 the visit of the Italian Foreign Minister Count Ciano to Berlin and Berchtesgaden.

Revolutionary events which made a deep impression on European and world policy had in the mean time taken place, as a result of the foreign policy carried on by Germany and Italy which endeavoured to guarantee peace in new ways after the ruts of Geneva and Versailles had proved to be no longer feasible. Versailles divided the world into victors and vanquished, haves and have-nots, and Geneva endeavoured as far as possible to perpetuate this division. Italy, which belonged to the "victor States" and had received far-reaching promises from the other Allies did not find the fulfilment of her desires and claims in the dictated Peace of Versailles and saw the future of her constantly increasing population blocked. She therefore looked after herself. After years of internal reconstruction and armament of the entire nation, Mussolini recreated the Roman Empire and incorporated Abyssinia against the will of the whole world. In this connection Germany gave him from the outset the support of her strictest neutrality and was the first Power to recognise the Empire of Ethiopia, thus making a breach in the ban which weighed so heavily on the relations of Italy with the sanctionist States and opening up the path for a settlement of the Abyssinian crisis. Germany was obliged in her struggle against Versailles and Geneva to secure her equality of rights. She restored her military sovereignty together with her sovereignty over the demilitarised Rhineland, and the other articles of the Versailles Treaty entailing discrimination against Germany were also removed. Thus the two States, though for different reasons, had to a considerable extent a common foreign policy after the War, especially as Mussolini was the only one of the statesmen of the former Allies to see through the disastrous policy of Versailles and constantly raised a warning voice against the madness of that policy.

This common line was, it is true, sometimes broken by differences of opinion regarding central European questions, but it always proved possible to come back to the great common points of view and lastly even to find complete agreement on the Austrian problem.

It is particularly in the Austrian question that entire success was reached by Adolf Hitler's new method of tackling and dealing with problems direct. All the prophecies of foreign countries that the German-Italian discussions might lead to any result except agreement in the Austrian question proved to be erroneous. Count Ciano's visit to Adolf Hitler in October 1936 here again proved the harmony and parallelism of the German-Italian press. While Germany acts on the basis of the agreement of June 11th, 1936, Italy bases herself on the Rome protocols, without the two lines bisecting or becoming entangled. This does not exclude cooperation. "The Austrian question", wrote the "Giornale d'Italia" on October 26th, 1936, "in which foreign countries look forward to a division between Italy and Germany, has been definitely cleared up."

The result of the discussions in the last few days of October 1936 was not laid down in secret treaties or other mysterious agreements, but was entered in a protocol, on the contents of which Count Ciano gave detailed information to the Munich press. His statements clearly showed the extent of the German-Italian agreement and its general constructive character. All important present-day questions were included in the sphere of examination, and that not only in the sense of mutual interests, but with a view to preparing the way for practical, just and pacific cooperation of all European nations. In the thicket of confusion in which the European situation was placed, a clearing was made from which it was possible to make a further advance and also to place the relations with other Powers on a sounder basis. "In the tempestuous sea to which the European continent may be compared, an island was created, a strong indestructible bulwark of solidarity against world Bolchevism" (Messaggero) and its object was "to defend the great civilisatory institutions of Europe" (Count Ciano).

No pact or agreement was concluded, no new exclusive block of Powers was created, that any State or group of States could regard as directed against themselves. Not even the Soviet Union could take this view, for the political, economic and social attempts at disintegration of the Bolchevist Third International are to be guarded against while obviously maintaining the principle of non-intervention in the affairs of the Soviet Union, and the campaign is to be conducted on an ideological basis against an ideology which threatens western civilisation.

There was no question of creating a new system of alliances, but of well prepared contact by diplomatic means between two European Great Powers which, in view of a network of many-sided pacts and dangerous military alliances, desired to lay down the principles of future cooperation. The two countries are united by common fundamental views on the principles and conditions of a sound and secure European communal life in which no wrong turnings are taken and the germs of disease and danger are not disseminated.

In view of the fact that the life of the nations is governed not by abstract and arbitrarily interpreted formulae but by realities and concrete developments, the Berlin-Rome axis represents a new core, a new point of crystallisation for intelligent and calm cooperation in Europe.

The "Frankfurter Zeitung" wrote at the time:

"It will however depend entirely on the extent of honest European opinion, that is to say the honest opinion of the other States in respect of equality of rights, as to whether the European character and the European aim which determine our attitude remain pure and altruistic and are put into practice as we should wish. It will mean that France and England do not (as in the past) understand "Europe" quite differently from ourselves. The prison of Versailles is indeed broken open, but the paragraphs of Versailles concealed a policy and a sentiment of which too much still remains. It is important that the idea of "Europe" which is still very vague should be given firm points of crystallisation by means of friendships based on solid interests, but it is equally important that the sources of all centripetal forces should be stopped."

These sources have unfortunately not been stopped, and of the various points of the review carried out at that time between the Italian Foreign Minister Count Ciano, the German Foreign Minister Baron von Neurath and the Führer and Chancellor, no progress has been made in the replacement of the Locarno agreement by a new western pact, in the position in the Danube basin where there are still remains of the plans of Tardieu—and Hodza—, in the League of Nations problem, or in the Spanish question. The main reason for this is that, while appealing to false collectivity which camouflages egoistic plans and intentions under high sounding words, the creation of stable conditions is said to require the cooperation of the Soviet Union which proves by word and deed that it is on the contrary interested in disturbing international peace and in deliberately causing unrest and contention among the civilised nations.

On the contrary, in spite of the calm and objective and even favourable reports of Count Ciano's journey and its results, constant flank attacks were very soon made from the east and from the west against the axis; these were met by Mussolini in an interview granted to the "Völkische Beobachter" on January 17th, 1937, in which he said: "The establishment of the Berlin-Rome axis represents the beginning of a process of European consolidation. Attempts have been made to throw doubts upon the new Italo-German block. I have put an end to these attempts." In his Palermo speech on August 20th he again said: "One does not come to Rome by ignoring or going against Berlin, and one does not come to Berlin by ignoring or going against Rome. Between the two States there is effective solidarity. In order to make the political scope of this important statement quite clear, the "Giornale d'Italia" mentioned as one of the three conditions for any cooperation with Italy "the acceptance of the Rome-Berlin axis as a fundamental element for the agreement and cooperation of the nations of Europe."

* * *

As a result of these preliminary events in Italo-German relations, it was natural that the announcement of Mussolini's visit should be received with tense expectation throughout the world. Moreover—apart from a short visit to Switzerland in connection with the signature of the Locarno agreement—this is the first foreign journey undertaken by the Head of the Italian Government since the historical march on Rome. This fact alone was sufficient to stress the cordial political relations existing between Germany and Italy, which were now to become personally and ideologically deeper by the closer connection of the Duce with the German people. While the political side of the relations between the two States were settled in the protocols of October 1936, on this occasion in Munich and Berlin the main stress was laid on the human, popular and ideological side of the mutual relations. These were in a certain measure subjected to a plebiscite of the 115 million members of the two nations. In addition to the millions who cheered the Duce on his journey from Rome to Munich and from Munich to Berlin; in addition to the millions who acclaimed him enthusiastically in the streets and squares of Munich and Berlin; in addition to the millions who took part in the vast historical demonstration on the May Field in Berlin, there were millions in Germany and Italy who listened in to this meeting of the nations at which—just as nearly two thousand five hundred years ago the last delegates of Sparta on the market place of Athens directly addressed the members of a foreign State—for the first time the head of a foreign State stood at the side of the German Führer and spoke face to face with the German people.

It was a symbolic act when the Olympic bell, which a year ago opened the peaceful rivalry between the flower of the nations, rang in the historical moment on the May Field with the Olympic greeting: I call the youth of the world. This was also the undertone of the two speeches which Hitler and Mussolini sent out beyond the 115 millions of their own people to the outer world, in the conviction that the young people in particular will be the first to understand the aims and ideas which are in the minds of the two leaders of their nations and to which they gave rousing expression. We call the peace of the world! This was the note which rose to heaven and re-echoed through the world at the night demonstration lit up by the Olympic flame.

On the May Field met two movements, two Empires, two nations and two "dictators", whose one and only aim extends far beyond their sphere of power: joint work for peace, for the building up of a young, new Europe, to which the Berlin-Rome axis as the bearing element must provide a real equilibrium.

The Berlin-Rome axis is not a dividing wall! This was the title of an article written by Count Ciano in a special number of the "Illustrazione Italiana" which appeared in the middle of September in connection with the Duce's journey to Germany. He wrote as follows:

"No one can see in our policy any intention of creating dangerous and menacing divisions. On more than one occasion it has been proved that the policy of Fascist Italy and that of National Socialist Germany follow two parallel lines. This was particularly clear in the case of the western pact, in the question of the security of Belgium, in the Austrian policy and more generally in the Danube basin, in the anti-Bolshevist attitude, in the matter of Spain and more particularly in the question of non-intervention, the territorial integrity of Spain and the recognition of the national Government of General Franco; these are all questions that have affected international activity in Europe in recent months. We have not formed a block. The Rome-Berlin axis is inspired by a true and profound feeling of cooperation between all nations, and there is nothing secret or mysterious about it. On the contrary, the practice of recent months has shown that the parallel policy of the two great authoritarian States of Europe is an extraordinarily useful factor of security and peace, a sign post to guide all the forces which desire to protect civilisation from the Bolshevist danger and to carry on fruitful and durable work of reconstruction."

"In short", wrote Dr. Goebbels in the same number, "the German and Italian nations are bound together by their common attitude towards the same European peace tasks, the same belief in hardy living, the same determination not to evade the solution of present international questions but to master them in the interest of a new European order."

On September 25th the semi-official "Giornale d'Italia" enumerated the four essential elements on which the two leaders wished their solidarity to be founded in the service of European peace:

1. that Fascism and National Socialism should find complete understanding and due respect as ideologies and State systems among other nations, upon whom, however, they in no way desire to impose their movement;

2. that Germany and Italy should on every occasion and in all problems be granted a political, technical and, above all, moral equality of rights as against the other Great Powers in Europe;

3. that there should be greater comprehension and more respect for the vital rights and development of all nations, in other words that international justice should be exercised not only in words but also in deeds;

4. that, as a result of a growing feeling of European solidarity, all nations should regain that minimum of self-respect which qualifies them for joint defence against the forces of subversion and for an understanding of common dangers.

The director of the "Giornale d'Italia" pointed out in conclusion that these four points give "a realistic picture of the Rome-Berlin axis".

It would lessen their effect if we tried to deal specially with the significance of the toasts of the 27th and the speeches of the 28th September. They were spoken by the leaders to their peoples; they were clear and unequivocal and therefore much more comprehensible than the statements usually made at diplomatic and political meetings which are open to various interpretations.

Dr. Virginio Gayda, the director of the "Giornale d'Italia", gave the following summary of the results of the visit on September 30th in the "B.Z. am Mittag":

"The demonstration of the peoples on the May Field was the greatest plebiscite of New Europe. This plebiscite speaks to the peoples of this continent and, we hope, also to their Governments. For this grandiose demonstration of national forces concerned a mass of 115 million people dwelling in the centre of Europe from the Baltic to the Mediterranean."

"These 115 million people" Gayda continues, "have in particular three important characteristics in common: the revolutionary spirit, the will to solidarity and armed power. In addition, the two nations have the powerful figures of their two great leaders, who embody in their persons the unity of their peoples."

"The plebiscite brought confirmation of the complete agreement between the policy of Adolf Hitler and that of Benito Mussolini. This agreement exists especially in respect of the following important points:

1. The National Socialist and the Fascist regimes are of one mind not only in respect of their ideology, but also of their practical policy;

2. Germany and Italy are animated by the determination to maintain this solidarity with every means in respect of every international problem. For this purpose they will reject all political and diplomatic attempts to engage in the childish game of playing off Germany against Italy or Italy against Germany;

3. The plebiscite has given proud confirmation of the international right and also of the international responsibility of the two Governments and of the two nations;

4. The plebiscite was a demonstration of the realistic wish for peace of Germany and Italy. This wish for peace can only be realised by a far-reaching understanding of definite international problems. But understanding means international justice. Such justice cannot, however, be realised by doctrinary systems and treaties which generalise international questions ;

5. The plebiscite was a demonstration of the open, uncompromising fight against Bolshevism, the declared enemy of world peace."

Mussolini himself drew up the historical balance sheet of the meeting in the few sentences of his telegram of thanks sent to the Führer on September 30th on leaving German soil and in the speech which he made after his solemn entry into Rome to the hundreds of thousands gathered on the Piazza Venezia :

"These days have sealed the spiritual solidarity which binds National Socialist Germany and Fascist Italy, the firmness and concord of their principles and the indissolubility of their friendship . . .

The Italo-German friendship, confirmed in the policy of the Rome-Berlin axis, has today entered the hearts of the two nations and will remain there. The aims of this friendship are the close solidarity of the two revolutions, the re-birth of Europe and a peace between the nations that are worthy of the name."

* * *

The Berlin days are past. It may be noted with satisfaction that opinion in foreign countries, apart from Communist, Socialist and Left Radical circles, has been objective and in part favourable. The former either endeavour to construe the absence of official communiqués as implying some mysterious intentions on the part of the two "dictators" or to maintain that Mussolini returned "with empty hands". The Duce's visit to the Krupp works is adduced as a proof of the intentions in question. "This is ridiculous", writes the "Flämische Standard", "If War Ministers and high officers from countries friendly with France visit the Maginot Line and the Schneider-Creuzot works in France, if high officers and even Ministers in France inspect the Soviet Russian military arrangements and arms factories and the military experts of these two Powers then meet at the airports and arms factories of Czechoslovakia, this is naturally done solely in the interest of peace."

The second argument shows the astonishing shortsightedness of the judgment of politicians and journalists who cannot imagine meetings of statesmen without business transactions. They regard success or failure as on a par with profit or loss in selling merchandise. They cannot imagine that, without written understandings or agreements, events such as those which occurred in Berlin in their frankness, good will and freedom from artificial legal formulæ possess an exemplary general value and exercise a beneficial and calming influence which makes its effect felt both spiritually and materially.

What Mussolini and Adolf Hitler attained in Berlin is a close and firm friendship between the two countries and a comradeship between their peoples, animated by honesty and sincerity in the pursuit of a great aim, namely, in the interest of the peace of Europe to erect a bulwark against the forms of degeneracy and the destructive tendencies of a Bolshevist rule of violence.

In these aims the two "dictators" stand far above the democratic dictatorship of Versailles which poisoned the post-war period and the injustice of which still forms the greatest obstacle for genuine and sincere collective cooperation.

The "Temps", the "Times", "Daily Telegraph", "Daily Mail", "Morning Post" and other papers did not say anything new when they pointed out that the Berlin-Rome axis was firmly and strongly built and was a reality, that its importance should not be under-estimated and that it had to be taken into account, and when they went on to say that these two Powers had not concluded an alliance the rigidity of which prevented cooperation with other Powers but that there were great possibilities for such cooperation because the desire for peace announced in Berlin was seriously meant. It is only to be hoped that these admissions will lead the way from the sterile policy of recent years and enable constructive power to commence a new era in European policy and a new formation of European history which may lead to a better future for the Continent ; in this respect September 28th, 1937 represents an important milestone and a fresh stage.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S SPEECH

On October 6th, 1937 President Roosevelt made a speech on the occasion of the inauguration of a bridge in Chicago, in which he dealt with the constant anxiety which the general political position caused among all peace-loving peoples and nations. In view of the present world position he considers that the foundations of civilisation are gravely threatened and also believes the United States of America to be in danger since armaments offer no security and authority no help. He spoke particularly against aerial warfare, the bombing of open towns and submarine piracy in the Mediterranean and then called upon the peace-loving nations to make a common effort to revive the laws and principles of peace.

In a second part of the speech, he spoke against the political and economic unrest in the world and gave a picture of the political situation as he saw it. He concluded with the statement that positive efforts must be made to maintain peace. America therefore took an active part in the search for peace.

We are accustomed to American censure and it is not the first time that President Roosevelt has held up a mirror to the old world in which its faults are shown up all the darker in proportion as a brighter light is thrown upon American merits. The celebrations of the armistice day generally provide a good background for this. In the past twelve months the Pan-American Conference of Buenos Aires and the 150th jubilee of the American Constitution have provided suitable opportunities. On these occasions the refrain is always the same. Roosevelt says of European States that they proclaimed war as a means of attaining their national aims, that for this purpose they piled up armaments, that out of these dark intentions arose the system of autarchy, and that, since their economic activity was built up exclusively on the boom in armaments, there was nothing for them to do but to go to war if their economy was not to collapse like a house of cards.

When a statesman of the importance of Roosevelt makes speeches pointing out that the world position has become considerably worse, and when the effect of these speeches with their accusations against other nations obviously extends beyond the limits of his own country, he must be aware of the necessity of not only looking at outer signs but of getting to the bottom of matters and finding out the causes of the defects.

What European statesman would not be glad to speak in the name of the only Great Power within a radius of several thousand miles, possessing uncontested predominance on a continent the coasts of which are guarded by two oceans from a great part of the cares and dangers which have become the daily portion of European nations? The political and economic conditions existing in America are infinitely simpler than in other continents. The United States have not inherited historical experiences with the consequent tension of various kinds, and the clash of languages and nationalities such as exist in Europe; they have never played a decisive part; lastly, in view of the vast and almost inexhaustible territories and the sources of raw materials which cover all their requirements, the problem of over-population and self-supply has never attained any importance since the time when America became a politically independent factor.

This is no doubt also the reason why America often misunderstands and misinterprets events which occur in other parts of the world. In particular they apparently do not understand the extent of the injustice and its effect on the people suffering from it in Europe. In his opening speech in Buenos Aires, President Roosevelt rightly pointed out that a great deal of the distraction of Europe is due to the consequences of Versailles which were not desired—but were also not prevented—by his predecessor President Wilson. He said he was glad that he had not to stand before a Conference such as that in Paris which began by dividing up the spoils and finished by moving national groups like pawns from one State to another.

After President Roosevelt's own Under Secretary of State, Mr. Welles, had spoken strongly against Versailles only a few months ago, the South African Prime Minister, General Hertzog, on September 28th, 1937 at the Pretoria City Hall denounced the Treaty of Versailles as the cause of the present international distrust and the race in armaments. The war psychology of 1919, he asserted, persisted so strongly that in nearly every event of international importance in which victor confronted vanquished there was proof of its presence. The victors of 1919 could not rid themselves of the delusion that the victory of 1919 gave them a kind of sacred right in 1937—and in the future—to demand obedient submission from the vanquished to the terms of the treaty. The natural result was that the vanquished persisted in the same inexorable resistance and stubborn opposition with which they were inspired in 1919. It was quite clear that unless there was a fundamental change in this mentality of European leaders the next European war would be the child of the Treaty of Versailles.

It cannot therefore be taken amiss in the New World if everyone, especially in Germany, still remembers the initiative taken at the end of the War by the then President of the United States in the sense of a reform and new order in international relations in accordance with the principles of right and morality. The weight of power thrown by the United States into the scale did, it is true, succeed in bringing the World War as such to an end. But the authority of the President was insufficient to secure acceptance to any extent of the principles of peace which he had proclaimed. For it can be confidently stated that post-War conditions—especially in respect of freedom, self-determination and satisfaction—have become much worse than ever before.

When at the present time a President of the United States again raises his voice in order to some extent to influence the conditions of the world and therefore also of Europe, there is some justice for the expectation that he will take up the threads where they were dropped by President Wilson. It is accordingly not enough to note that conditions are unsound and dangerous. But it is also necessary to make a sincere diagnosis of the causes of the present unrest and dissatisfaction. It is only then that useful proposals can be logically made to remedy and improve the conditions.

In his last speech Roosevelt avoided going into details—at any rate as far as Europe was concerned. He spoke in general terms of the "sanctity of treaties" without for his part making a distinction between treaties which are in accordance with international morality and those that are not. But there are some nations in Europe which have a rich but bitter experience in this direction.

We will again quote from General Hertzog, the Prime Minister of South Africa, in the reply which he gave to the appeal of the American Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, of July 16th, 1937. In this appeal Mr. Hull laid down the foundations of American foreign policy—renunciation of the application of force and intervention, sanctity of treaties, the necessity for a peaceful revision of obsolete treaties, the removal of obstacles to trade, the limitation of armaments, the renunciation of alliances—and transmitted it to the American representatives abroad with a request that the various foreign governments should give their views.

General Hertzog said in his reply that he could not help thinking that, if the Union was in the position of a State fighting against an injustice imposed upon it and perpetuated by an agreement concluded at the point of the bayonet, such an agreement would have little claim to any measure of sanctity. It would certainly have no claim to sanctity at all if it were concluded in a manner violating the ordinary customs of war or the laws of international conscience. Before it could be said that such an agreement was in accordance with the principle of the sanctity of treaties, equitable measures should in his opinion first be taken to clear it of all exaggerations. In other words, before the principle of the sanctity of treaties was applied to an agreement, a State which had suffered injustice should first have the right to examine the treaty conditions.

"We have" wrote the "Times" on August 4th, "heard and seen much in recent years of one-sided repudiation of treaty clauses; but may not unilateral denunciation have been a consequence of unilateral imposition ? . . . There has been failure to realise that, if the Kellogg Pact " (the failure of which Roosevelt especially regrets in his speech) " insists on eliminating war as the instrument of change which it has always been, then some other method must be found. Just as nature abhors a vacuum, so political nature abhors the status quo . "

President Roosevelt went on to speak of rearmament and the growing expenditure on armaments, of countries that are aggressive and others who only use their armaments for defence, again without giving any satisfactory characteristics distinguishing them. He forgot to mention that the competition in armaments, with its extremely serious consequences, is due to the fact that certain States felt they could not give up the overwhelming military supremacy which they gained after the collapse of Germany.

If Germany was finally compelled to rearm, the reason was the same as that given by England, France and even America in justification of their armaments programmes ; it was reduced by Mussolini and also by the French Minister for War, M. Daladier—the former on June 11th at Cattaneo in Sicily and the latter on the conclusion of the great manoeuvres at Alençon on September 17th—to the simple formula : A nation that will not bear its own arms will end up by bearing those of others One does not seek the friendship of the weak but of the strong . President Roosevelt's statement that the reinforcement of armaments is intended to abolish those injustices with the sword is undoubtedly incorrect. The Leader of the country which suffered the greatest injustice from the Versailles Treaty has stated often enough and without reservation that he knows of no problem which could not be settled by peaceful means.

When Roosevelt went on to speak in particular against aerial warfare, the bombardment of open towns and submarine warfare, it may be pointed out that it was Germany during the Disarmament Conference and her Leader and Chancellor after its break-down who constantly demanded the prohibition or abolition of these methods of warfare and arms, and that no account was taken of these demands by the other Great Powers.

President Roosevelt avoided going into the menace to all States and nations constituted by Bolshevism and also into the constantly repeated attempts of the Soviet Union in the Spanish conflict at the decisive moment to torpedo any possibility of a détente. The Soviet Union's great purchases of armaments for the equipment of the Red Navy, as shown by the licence reports of the State Department, however, constitute an obstacle to this attitude.

Roosevelt again expressed the view that the peace, freedom and security of 90 % of the population of the world are threatened by the remaining 10 % who disregard the principles of international law. These 90 % should find ways and means of asserting their will. The moral conscience of the world, he said, must recognise to the full the importance of removing injustices and pay attention to justified claims.

These remarks cause the Polish newspaper " Express Poranny " to point out that not only 90 % of the population of the world is peaceful and 10 % aggressive, but that also about 90 % of all raw materials are in the hands of the satisfied nations and the remaining 10 % in the hands of the hungry nations, which however form a much greater number than the satisfied. Two-thirds of the surface of the globe is in the hands of nine colonial States, while five States alone—Great Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, France and Holland—produce 80 % of all the iron and cotton, 75 % of the coal and oil, 95 % of the rubber, 50 % of the copper and nearly 90 % of the gold. It is not enough, says the paper, to complain of the aggressiveness of certain nations and to regard certain State constitutions as a danger. These are to a great extent also the result of the disproportion in the distribution of resources. Democracy, political and economic liberalism, it continues, form the constitution of the rich nations, but cannot be afforded by the poor. The origin of the wars in Africa and the Far East was overpopulation or the lack of raw materials of one or the other country.

When, lastly, President Roosevelt holds up the constitution and State form of the United States, i.e. democracy as a whole, as a shining example for other countries, it may be pointed out in reply that the peoples and nations create out of their own means the State form best suited to their character and tasks, and none of them can claim that their own is the original and ideal standard for all. We have indeed learned to know that democracy which, under the threat of violence and hunger, at Versailles imposed upon us a dictated Peace, in which the last word was not spoken by reason and justice, but we have seen nothing of its blessings. It was with democracies that the German people concluded the preliminary peace of November 5th, 1918, and those democracies had the opportunity in Paris of reconstructing with a greater measure of justice the world which collapsed in the War. They failed so completely that America withdrew in spite of the fact that the first signature under the preliminary peace and under the Treaty of Versailles was that of an American President. And Roosevelt himself has on various occasions refused the admission of the United States into the crown of democratic world order, the League of Nations.

When the President of the United States thus considers that salvation lies in the union of the peaceful nations and the intimidation of the evil nations, such a proposal has only a practical meaning if it is first made clear what is meant by good and evil. The criteria which he has hitherto put forward are however insufficient for such a distinction.

APHORISMS ON «DISARMAMENT»

Through British Rearmament to Disarmament and to Peace

British Declarations

In our special number of February 2nd 1937 "Europe in Arms", we described in detail the course of British rearmament policy. Since that time there has been no change in the tendency of that policy, but on the contrary its fundamental tone has been strengthened by the support of the Labour Party which was granted by an overwhelming majority. "There is more joy over one sinner repented than over ninety-nine just men", cried Chamberlain with deliberate irony. In a world that is arming, Great Britain cannot remain unarmed, especially as this rearmament serves not only and primarily British security, but in addition the strengthening of the League of Nations, the development of collective security, and the disarmament which is still hoped for; it is therefore in the interest of peace. Lord Snell characterised this tendency in the debate in the House of Lords on March 3rd with the words: "We regard other people's armaments as dangerous, and our own as harmless, necessary furnishings in the temple of peace".

There can be no halt, said Mr. Chamberlain on October 8th at Scarborough, until Europe has returned to sanity. When does Mr. Chamberlain consider this position has been reached. Can Europe return to sanity at all in this armour plate (for Mr. Chamberlain surely does not regard it as remedy) and in that case what will happen to these armaments of a strength and extent never before attained or attempted in British history?

THE BRITISH REARMAMENT PLAN OF FEBRUARY 17TH, 1937 (WHITE PAPER CMD 5374) BEFORE THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, justified new rearmament plan, on February 17th, 1937:

"It is absolutely essential for us to equip ourselves at home and along the lines of communication with the newest methods of repelling attack. We must provide forces which are capable of being dispatched wherever they may be wanted. We cannot afford to allow our fighting forces to go into field to meet others better armed than themselves.

The White Paper shows where and how the cost is going to be incurred and while it does not provide details of cost, though this, of course will in due time be provided in the Estimates laid before the House, it does for the first time make an effort in public to estimate the order of the total expenditure on defence which we have to contemplate during the next five years. Even this figure of £1,500,000,000 cannot be regarded as final for certain. If circumstances should change and allow us to slow down or reduce our programme, all the better; we shall be thankful enough to do it. On the other hand, as conditions have changed to our disadvantage since we first contemplate this programme they may change again, and it may be that in the end we shall find that even £1,500,000,000 has not represented the total amount that this country has been compelled to spend in this respect.

Our programme is not directed against any particular Power or group of Powers, but it is the duty of the Government to put before the House a programme which they consider necessary for our safety and the fulfilment of our obligations.

Everybody knows that the British Empire stands for peace, and that it never will use its forces for aggressive purposes. On the contrary it will exert all its influence to preserve peace not only for itself but for others as well. We know from our own experience that our influence waxes and wanes in proportion to our strength. The strength that we are now rapidly gaining from day to day and from week to week is in itself a steady factor in international affairs, and probably the greatest bulwark for peace that exists in the world to-day. Holding these views, convinced as we are that this great programme is essential for our own safety and the major factor in the safety of other nations it would be impossible for us to shrink from meeting it.

No one, least of all the Chancellor of the Exchequer, can see this growing accumulation of burdens without a feeling of disgust and shame that civilization is trying to break its own back instead of trying to settle its differences by give and take, and turning its energy to the pursuits which might bring prosperity and contentment to all. For the time being at least we can do nothing but set our teeth and go forward with measures which we cannot afford to lay aside. Peace, political appeasement, disarmament are not attainable by any one Power alone, but whenever and wherever we can find others who share our views, we shall rejoice in their company to seek to find a more fruitful, a saner, and a worthier solution."

Sir Samuel Hoare, First Lord of the Admiralty, justified the Naval Estimates (£105,000,000) on March 11th, 1937:

"The House is being asked to vote £105,000,000 for a new construction programme of 80 new ships. Following immediately on last year's programme, the demand means that at the end of this year we shall have under construction no less than 148 new ships of war. From one point of view that is a very big programme: from another point of view, however, it is a reasonable programme. Its very size is evidence not of any now policy, but of the fact that for one reason or another over a long period of years we have failed to make the normal replacements. The result is that we have to telescope a programme into two or three years that in the ordinary course would have taken a decade or more."

Sir P. Sass of Under-Secretary of State for Air justified the Air Estimates (£82,500,000) on March 15th, 1937:

"It is my duty this afternoon to introduce the largest Air Estimates which have ever been presented to this House. The net Estimate of £82,500,000, compares with an average figure of some £18,000,000 asked for by the Ministry in pre-expansion years. It shows an increase of nearly £32,000,000 on the total of the Estimates of 1936.

The magnitude of this figure gives rise to mingled feelings of disappointment and relief. All must regret the necessity to expend so vast a sum on military preparation. Yet all must feel relief that proper steps are being taken to safeguard our own country against attack and to fulfil our international obligations. In previous years I have been careful to point out that our expansion in no way meant that we had abandoned our hope of securing an air pact and a general stabilization of air armaments. Neither have we abandoned that hope to-day. On the contrary, we regard its realization as a matter of paramount importance. We shall seize instantly every opportunity to achieve it. Until such opportunity offers, however, we have no choice but to proceed with our plans.

A British Air Force strong, ready, and well equipped, is one of the greatest contributions which this country can make to the peace of the world."

Mr. Duff Cooper, Secretary of State for War, justified the Army Estimates (£90,000,000) on March 16th, 1937:

He said that when he introduced the Army Estimates last year he had pointed out that it was extremely fortunate that at the time of the Italo-Abyssinian dispute no similar emergency had occurred in any part of the Empire or the world.

He said that if such an emergency had occurred it would have taxed our military resources to the breaking point.

It was as fortuitous as it was fortunate that the emergency in Palestine arose a few months after the Italo-Abyssinian dispute had been liquidated so far as this country was concerned.

He mentioned these facts to emphasize the pressing need of retaining in England a force of a certain size which might be required, when and where they could not say and against whom they could not say, a force sufficiently strong and well equipped to be dispatched at a moment's notice to meet any adversary in any part of the world. It might be questioned whether, seeing how different were the obligations that our Army might be called upon to fulfil, it was wise to maintain only one Army for so many and diverse purposes; and whether the same force could possibly be equally well adapted to fight against tribesmen on the mountains of Asia and against a modern mechanized force on the plains of Europe. That was a very pertinent and far-reaching inquiry, and it was impossible to reply in the affirmative that one force was equally well adapted to meet these two contingencies.

But this country was limited by material considerations. We were limited in the amount of military equipment which we could possibly maintain. Whether it would be possible to divide that equipment into two parts, maintaining one for Imperial service and another for short service at home, with the possibility of taking part in a European war should such a war occur and should it be decided that we should take any part on land at all—that was an inquiry which he assured the House was being closely considered by the War Office.

After 15 years of continuous reduction in every branch of the Army they were attempting in three years to bring the Army up to the point which it would have reached if those 15 years had been devoted to continuous expenditure and development.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer at Edinburgh, March 5th, 1937:

"In 1933 the Defence Estimates were £109,000,000. Last year they were £158,000,000 and Supplementary Estimates brought the figure up to £188,000,000. This year there is an addition of £278,000,000. He proceeded:

Paradoxical as it may seem, certain that the process of rearmament is a necessary preliminary to the possibility of a general disarmament."

Sir John Simon, Home Secretary, speaking at a National Government demonstration of Plymouth, March 20th, 1937 said:

Britain remained firmly devoted to the cause of peace and to the promotion of those better international relations which was the purpose for which the League of Nations was founded. But at the present moment, out of the seven most powerful States in the world, three—namely, the U.S.A., Japan and Germany were outside the League altogether, while Italy, a fourth among the seven great Powers was acutely critical of the League. These things must have a profound effect upon the League ideal of collective security, viewed not as an ideal but as a going concern. There were some people who were tempted to refuse to face these facts, and they repeated this phrase "collective security" almost as though it was a charm or an incantation with the mysterious property of guaranteeing this country from all possible danger. But the safety of this country could not depend on a phrase, and in the world as they found it, their defence policy was the necessary means by which Britain could discharge her responsibilities and fulfil her international obligations. A stronger Britain was not a threat of war but a contribution to world peace.

The British Rearmament in the Empire
Conference at London (May 15th-June 15th, 1937)
(Extract from the "Times" of June 16th, 1937)

The discussions about the Empire Defence began with a review of the events which led up to the adoption by his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom of their rearmament programme, and of defence problems generally. The members of the Conference noted with deep concern that since the session of 1930 international tension had increased in a marked degree, and that there had been a large and rapid increase in the armaments of all the principal Powers. They were impressed by the world-wide effect of these increased armaments on the international situation and on the financial and economic position of the nations concerned, and while their respective Parliaments had already recognized the necessity for taking measures to put their defences in order, they thought it of the highest importance that negotiations for the limitation of armaments should be reopened whenever there was a reasonable prospect of success. They recognized with regret that, notwithstanding the measure of success in the limitation of armaments attained by the countries concerned in the London Treaty for the Limitation of Naval Armaments of March 25th, 1936, and in the Anglo-German Agreement of June 18th, 1935, international conditions were not at the moment favourable to further progress in the direction of disarmament. At the same time, however, they acclaimed the efforts now being made to extend naval limitation to other countries.

The statements made to the Conference by the Delegation of the United Kingdom concerning the rearmament programme of the United Kingdom reported the further developments in the organization of the Committee of Imperial Defence, notably in improving the arrangements for joint planning between the three Defence Services and for the mobilization of industry.

Attention was also drawn to the important progress made in recent years in the standardization by the Governments concerned of the training and equipment of the Defence Forces in different parts of the Empire, as well as in uniformity of administrative practice in defence matters. Reference was made to the increasing importance of the industrial side of defence owing to the progress of technical development in armaments, and emphasis was placed on the advantages attending cooperation in the production and supply of munitions and raw materials as well as of food and feeding stuffs to meet the several requirements of the United Kingdom, the Dominions and India, and the Colonial Empire.

The discussion was continued by the Delegations representing the Dominions and India. The Conference was informed of the developments in the Canadian Defence Forces from 1926 to the present time. After considerable reductions in 1931 increased appropriations had recently been made for the Defence Services of the Dominion. The strength of the Canadian Naval and Air Forces had been increased, the Militia had been completely reorganized, and a policy of modernization and mechanization of equipment had been adopted. The industrial aspect of defence preparations had received close attention and a Committee of the Cabinet had been appointed to maintain active supervision of defence problems.

The defence organization of the Commonwealth of Australia next received consideration. The great importance from the Australian point of view on the Singapore base was noticed. The Conference was informed of the large increases in the defence votes in Australia under a Three Years' Programme commenced in 1934, and that a new Four Years' Programme overlapping the last year of the other Programme had been put in hand.

As affecting the whole field of defence, great importance was attached by the Australian Delegation to the development of cooperation in defence matters between the several parts of the British Commonwealth.

The Conference was informed that his Majesty's Government in New Zealand also attached the greatest importance to close co-operation in defence matters. The Government were anxious to make sure that expenditure on the three Services was properly balanced and laid out so as best to enable the New Zealand forces to act in the most efficient way possible not only in the local defence of their country but also in Commonwealth defence in cooperation with the forces of other countries of the Commonwealth. In this connexion great importance was attached to the Singapore base.

With regard to the Union of South Africa, it was recalled that matters of principle had been discussed and agreed between the Union Minister for Defence, Mr. Pirow, and United Kingdom Ministers during the visit of Mr. Pirow to London in 1936. South African expenditure on defence had recently been greatly increased, being in the last year nearly three times as much as in 1932-33.

The Conference was informed that the Defence Forces of India are designed primarily to meet a possible attack on the North West Frontier and to cope with the ever-present problem of dealing with the tribesmen in that region, in addition to maintaining internal law and order. It was recognized that the Army in India is fully equipped for these purposes and constitutes a force which is as well prepared as any other to take the field if the occasion arises.

The Conference took note of the measures, recently adopted by the various countries represented at the Conference, often at a heavy cost, and recognized that the increased programmes of armaments were no more than sufficient for the defence of their territories and trade and the fulfilment of such obligations as each might have assumed.

The Conference recognized the vital importance of measures to safeguard maritime communications, including routes and waterways essential to defence and trade, and to provide naval bases and facilities for repairs and fuelling of ships. The Conference accordingly was glad to be informed that steps have been taken with these ends in view and in particular that substantial progress has been made towards the completion of the naval base at Singapore and its defences, with the aid of the generous financial assistance received from various parts of the Empire.

The Conference heard with satisfaction of the important steps taken by his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom for the maintenance of a Home Defence Air Force of sufficient strength to afford adequate protection against attack by the strongest air force which may be at any time within striking distance of the shores of the United Kingdom. In this connexion the Conference took note of the extensive preparations that are being made by his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom in the spheres of both active and passive defence against air invasion.

The Conference also recorded the progress made by the several Governments in creating and maintaining an adequate chain of air bases and refuelling stations along the lines of communications between the different parts of the Empire.

The Conference noted with satisfaction that in accordance with recommendations of previous Conferences a common system of organization and training and the use of uniform manuals, patterns of arms, equipment, and stores had been adopted, as far as practicable, for the naval, military, and air forces of their several countries. Each of them would thus be enabled to ensure more effectively its own security and, if it so desired, to cooperate with other countries of the Commonwealth with the least possible delay. The interchange of individual officers of the naval, military, and air forces of the countries was recognized as conducing to the dissemination of the experience acquired by the officers concerned under the widely different conditions existing in various parts of the Empire. Defence Councils or Committees have been established in the Dominions.

The Conference gave careful attention to the question of munitions and supplies. At the same time the Conference recognized that it is the sole responsibility of the several Parliaments of the British Commonwealth to decide the nature and scope of their own defence policy.

Bishop's Plea for Arms

The Bishop of Winchester, Dr. Cyril Garbett pleaded for rearmament in the interests of liberty and peace in a presidential address to the Winchester Diocesan Conference on September 28th.

He said that it was now clear that the League of Nations could neither prevent nor stop a war if a great Power had decided to wage it. He saw no advantage in trying to revise its constitution, and the League must be content with a much more modest rôle than that for which it was intended.

Dr. Garbett added: "In view, therefore, of the danger of the international situation and the proved inability of the League to prevent war, rearmament becomes inevitable. History gives many instances of nations losing their liberty though they have fought bravely for it, but as far as I know there is no record of a nation preserving its liberty though it refused to defend it."

"I wish that our pacifist critics would recognise that those of us who support rearmament hate war and long for peace as genuinely and zealously as they do. We differ from them because we hold that a defenceless peace-loving nation with vast possessions is a direct incentive to war. Unilateral disarmament is dangerous in the world which is armed to the teeth."

"But rearmament will not only safeguard our own freedom, it will help us to make what may well prove a vital contribution to the peace of the world."

From the speech by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Prime Minister at the Conservative Party Congress at Scarborough. (October 7th-8th, 1937):

"Till the world recovers some of its sanity, there can be no halt in the process of rearming this country. On that point there is practically only one opinion now, since the chairman of the Labour Party Conference, in the sole passage of his rumbustious speech which has attracted any attention outside, declared that this country must be powerfully armed. (Mr. Chamberlain here alluded to the Labour Party Congress held at the same time at Bournemouth, whose rearmament resolution was accepted with 2,169,000 votes against 262,000, after the Trade Union Congress held at Norwich in its vote on September 10th pronounced for rearmament with 3,544,000 against 262,000 voices.) I must say, frankly, that progress is not yet as fast as I should like, or as it soon will be. I am glad to say that this preparatory stage is now practically completed and that production has begun in earnest. All three services are sharing in the general activity. No military problem, great or small, will be overlooked, and that though our army will not compare in size with the huge conscript armies of the Continent, it will, when fully equipped, be thoroughly adapted to the task it has to fulfil.

As for the Navy, the aggregate tonnage now being built or already sanctioned by Parliament for the British Navy exceeds half a million tons, while the naval personnel is being extended at rate never attempted before in time of peace.

It is perhaps the condition of the Air Force which has been the subject of the greatest amount of attention, and some anxiety has been expressed about the pace at which it is expanding. Powerful machines unsurpassed in design and equipment are now steadily coming forward from the manufacturers. The volume of supply will very soon be greatly augmented. You have heard of the shadow factories. Where 12 months ago was nothing but bare ground, aeroplane shops have sprung up. The result of all this, and of the ready response to the call for men, which shows no sign of diminishing, can be seen in the fact that in the space of the last two years the strength of our home-based force has been nearly trebled, an expansion at a rate and on a scale never attempted before.

I. MUSSOLINI'S VISIT TO GERMANY AND THE BERLIN-ROME AXIS

THE DEMONSTRATION ON THE MAY FIELD IN BERLIN ON SEPTEMBER 28TH, 1937

Adolf Hitler's speech

Men and women! We are witnesses of an historical event such as has never before taken place in this form and to this extent.

Over a million people have gathered here for a demonstration in which 115 million members of two nations are taking part with warm sympathy, and which is followed with more or less interest by hundreds of millions of people in the rest of the world.

Our first emotion at this moment is the great joy at seeing in our midst one of those lonely men of the times who are not tried by history, but who themselves make history.

In the second place we feel that this demonstration is not one of the meetings which constantly take place elsewhere but that it represents a confession of common ideals and common interests. A confession expressed by two men and heard by a million, but awaited and approved with warm hearts by 115 millions. Thus, this evening is not a meeting of peoples, but a demonstration of peoples.

The deepest significance of this demonstration of peoples is the sincere desire to guarantee to our countries that peace which is not the reward of a cowardly abdication, but the result of a responsible securing of our national, intellectual and physical welfare, and of our cultural substance and values. Thereby we believe we can best serve those interests which are not only the interests of our two nations but should be those of the whole of Europe.

If we are able to hold this demonstration today, we thereby take stock of the changes in the period that lies behind us. No nation can desire peace more than Germany, but no nation has learned to know better than ourselves the terrible results of weak confidence. For behind us — before the entry into power of National Socialism — lies a period of fifteen years which were a series of oppressions, blackmail, the refusal of equal rights and therefore of unspeakable moral and material distress.

The ideals of liberalism and democracy in our country did not save the German nation from the most dreadful violations imaginable in history. National Socialism had therefore to erect a new and more effective ideal, in order to restore to our people those general rights of humanity which had been refused them for fifteen years. During this period of bitter trial, I must today state before the German people and the whole world, Italy and, in particular, Fascist Italy took no part in the humiliation of our people. During those years she showed understanding for the claims of a great nation to equal rights, for her bare living and, not least, for her national honour.

It filled us, therefore, with sincere satisfaction that an hour came in which we could remember that and, I believe, have remembered.

Out of the similar nature of the Fascist and National-Socialist revolutions there is arising to-day not only a community of views but of action. But this is fortunate at a time and in a world in which the tendencies of destruction and deformation are everywhere evident.

Fascist Italy through the genius and work of one creative man has become a new Empire.

You, Benito Mussolini, will in the last few days have seen with your own eyes the facts of the National Socialist State.

Germany, in her national attitude and her military strength, has again become a Great Power. The power of these two States today forms the strongest guarantee of the safeguarding of Europe which still possesses a sense of its cultural mission and is not prepared to fall a prey to destructive elements.

For all you who are gathered here or are listening in the world must recognise that two independent national regimes have found the way to each other and have met at the same time as the ideas of the democratic Marxist international can show everywhere nothing but demonstrations of hatred and therefore of discord.

Every attempt to divide such a unity of peoples by playing off one against the other, by casting suspicions or alleging untrue aims, will fail before the wish of the 115,000,000 taking part in this demonstration, as also, in particular, before the wills of the two men who stand before you and speak to you here.

Benito Mussolini's speech

Comrades! The visit that I am paying to Germany and her Leader, and the speech that I am holding before you, represent an important point in the life of our two nations and also in my own. The demonstrations with which I have been received have deeply moved me.

My visit should not be measured by the same standard as the usual diplomatic-political visits. The fact that I have come to Germany to-day does not mean that I shall be travelling somewhere else to-morrow.

I have come not merely as head of the Italian Government but above all in my capacity as the head of a national revolution, which thereby wishes to give a proof of its close connexion with your revolution. The course of both revolutions may have been different; but the goal they have wished to reach and have reached is the same: the unity and greatness of the nation.

Fascism and National Socialism are both expressions of that similarity in historical events in the life of our nations who have reached unity in the same century and by the same event.

There are no secret intentions hidden behind my visit to Germany. Nothing will be planned here to divide a Europe which is already divided enough. The solemn confirmation of the fact and stability of the Rome-Berlin axis is not directed against other States. We National-Socialists and Fascists want peace, and we shall be always ready to work for peace, a real, fruitful peace which does not silently ignore, but solves the questions arising from the life of the peoples.

To the whole world, which is asking tensely what the result of this meeting will be, war or peace, the Führer and I can answer with a loud voice: Peace.

Just as Fascism has for fifteen years given Italy outwardly and spiritually a new countenance, your revolution has given Germany a new countenance: new, even if it is formed, as in Italy, according to the loftiest and most imperishable traditions which are compatible with the necessities of modern life. I desired to see for myself this countenance of New Germany. And, on seeing it, I am now more than ever convinced that this New Germany—in her strength, her justified pride and her desire for peace—is a basic element of European life.

I believe that the reason for much misunderstanding and distrust between the nations is that those responsible are not aware of the new reality which is arising. The life of the nations, like that of individuals, is not something that is fixed once for all, but is subject to a constant process of change. It is a mistake which may prove fatal to judge a nation on the basis of figures and descriptions or of writings of twenty or fifty years ago. This mistake is often committed against Italy. If the national revolutions of Germany and Italy were better known, many prejudices would disappear and many points of conflict would lose their justification.

We have many elements of our ideology in common. Not only have National Socialism and Fascism everywhere the same enemies who serve the same master—the third International—but they have many conceptions of life and history in common. Both believe in will as the determining power in the life of the nations and as the driving force of their history, and therefore reject the teachings of so-called historical materialism and its political and philosophical by-products.

Both glorify work, in its innumerable forms, as the sign of human nobility. Both are based on the young people, whom we train to discipline, courage, resistance, love of the fatherland and contempt for easy living.

The resurrected Roman Empire is the work of this new spirit with which Italy is inspired. The German rebirth is also the work of a spiritual force, of faith in an idea, in which at first only one man believed—then a crowd of heroes and martyrs, then a minority, and lastly an entire nation.

Germany and Italy follow the same goal in the sphere of economic autarchy. Without economic independence the political independence of a nation is doubtful, and a nation of great military power may become the victim of an economic blockade.

We experienced this danger in all its directness when 52 nations assembled at Geneva decided upon criminal economic sanctions against Italy. Those sanctions were carried out with extreme rigour, but did not attain their object and even gave Fascist Italy an opportunity of proving her powers of resistance to the world.

In spite of all inducements Germany did not take part in the sanctions. We shall never forget that.

That is the point at which, for the first time, the existence of a necessary cooperation between National-Socialist Germany and Fascist Italy appeared. What the world now knows as the Rome-Berlin axis arose in the autumn of 1935, and has worked in the last two years for the ever stronger rapprochement of our two peoples to each other, as for the growing political strengthening of the peace of Europe.

Fascism has its ethics, to which it intends to remain true, and these ethics are identical with my own morals: to speak clearly and openly and when one has a friend to march with him to the end.

All arguments which our oponents bring to bear are invalid; neither in Germany nor in Italy is there a dictatorship, but there are forces and organisations which serve the people. No Government, in no part of the world, has the approval of the people to the same extent as the Governments of Germany and Italy. The greatest and richest democracies in the world today are the German and Italian.

In other countries, under cover of the "inviolable rights of mankind", policy is governed by the forces of money, of capital, of secret societies and of political groups in strife with one another. In Germany and Italy there can be no question whatever of private forces influencing the policy of the State.

This community of ideas in Germany and Italy has found expression in the struggle against Bolshevism, the modern form of the darkest Byzantine arbitrary force, that unbelievable exploitation of the credulity of the lower classes, that government of famine, bloodshed and slavery. Since the War, Fascism has fought with the utmost energy against this form of human degeneration which lives on lies; it has fought with words and with arms. For when words are insufficient and when threatening circumstances demand, arms must be taken up.

We have acted in this way in Spain, where thousands of Italian Fascist volunteers have fallen to save European culture, that culture which may still experience a rebirth if it turns its back upon the false, lying gods of Geneva and Moscow and turns towards the luminous truths of our revolution.

Comrades, I have nearly finished. We and you make no propaganda in the ordinary sense of the word outside our own frontiers in order to obtain adherents. We believe that truth itself possesses enough power to penetrate everywhere and that it will ultimately be victorious. The Europe of tomorrow will be Fascist by the logical force of circumstances and not by our propaganda. It is twenty years since your great Führer shouted to the masses the rousing cry which was to become the war cry of the entire German people:

Germany, awake!

Germany has awakened. The Third Reich is there.

I know not whether and when Europe will awake, as was said at the Party Rally at Nuremberg, for secret, but to us well enough known, forces are at work to turn a civil war into a world conflagration. What is important is that our two great nations—who in human beings make the immense mass of 115,000,000—stand together in a single, unshatterable determination. The proof of that is to-day's gigantic demonstration.

THE TOASTS AT THE RECEPTION IN THE REICHSKANZLEI ON SEPTEMBER 27TH, 1937

Adolf Hitler.

Your Excellency!

As Leader and Chancellor of the German nation I have the great honour and joy to be able to welcome Your Excellency most cordially to the capital of the Reich.

The German nation with me in this festive hour greets in you the genius that created Fascist Italy, the founder of a new Empire.

On your journey through Germany your Excellency will have appreciated from the great enthusiasm with which you were received by all classes of the German nation that your visit meant more to us than a merely diplomatic event and a purely conventional meeting.

At a time in which the world is full of tensions and alarming confusions, in which the most dangerous elements attempt to attack and destroy the civilization of Europe, Germany and Italy have found themselves in sincere friendship and common political cooperation.

This cooperation rests not only on the same indestructible will to live and assert themselves, but, in addition, on related political ideals which we are convinced are a basis of the internal strength and firmness of our States. These common fundamental political principles constitute a tie binding our peoples, and there operates in the same direction the fact that in the real vital interests of Italy and Germany there are no factors separating them, but only factors of a complementary or unifying nature. The conversations which have taken place between your Excellency and myself in the last few days have confirmed this anew.

We believe that the safeguarding of peace and of the most precious flowers of European civilization are not to be attained by the creation of a bloc directed against other European States. We are, on the contrary, convinced that through our common work we serve best not only the interests of our two countries but in addition the objective of a general international understanding, which lies close to our hearts.

It this spirit Germany and Italy will examine and deal side by side with the political tasks, so as to oppose every attempt to separate the two nations or even to play one off against the other.

I raise my glass and drink to the health of the King of Italy, Emperor of Ethiopia, your exalted Sovereign, as well as to the personal well-being of your Excellency and to the greatness and prosperity of the Fascist Italian nation.

Benito Mussolini.

Your Excellency!

The cordial words of greeting which Your Excellency was so kind as to address to me have deeply touched me.

Since I have been on German soil I have felt everywhere around me the spiritual atmosphere of a great, friendly people, of brown-shirted Germany, the Germany of Adolf Hitler.

I greet in the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich the warrior who has restored to the German nation the consciousness of its greatness. I greet in him the re-creator of the nation with which Fascist Italy is allied by so many ties of spirit and of work.

The Fascist revolution and the National-Socialist revolution were and are creative revolutions. Germany and Italy have created on their soil great works of culture and progress. New and not less great works will rise in the future.

During my stay in Germany I have seen and admired such works of culture and progress. I saw and admired the will to live and create which inspires the German people; their manliness, their will, their faith. The German-Italian solidarity is a living and active solidarity. It is not a result of political calculations or diplomatic subtleties but the expression and result of national homogeneity and common interests.

It is not and does not aspire to be an exclusive bloc distrustfully and fearfully shutting out the rest of the world. Italy and Germany are ready to collaborate with all other nations of good will. What they demand is respect and understanding for their needs, their necessities, and their legitimate claims. As the sole condition for their friendship they demand only that no attempt is made to disturb the bases of our glorious European culture.

The conversations which I have had with your Excellency in the last few days have strengthened our friendship and made it impervious to every attempt to disturb and divide from whatever side it may come.

When I return to Italy I shall take with me the memory of your powerful troops, of your popular demonstrations, of the spiritual and technical reconstruction which the German people has accomplished under your leadership; the recollection of your power of achievement, and of the reception you have prepared for me, for which I am most deeply grateful to you. But, above all, I take with me the certain consciousness of our fast friendship.

I raise my glass to the health of the Führer and Chancellor, Adolf Hitler, to the prosperity and greatness of National-Socialist Germany.

Mussolini's thanks to the Führer.

On leaving German soil, the Duce addressed the following telegram to the Führer from Kufstein:

"In memory of the unforgettable days which I have spent with you and in the midst of your splendid people, in gratitude for the reception which I was given by you and the German nation, with a heart full of the drama of vigour, work, and faith which your land proudly shows in its powerful re-birth, my thoughts go out to your Excellency once more as I cross the German frontier.

These days have sealed the spiritual solidarity which binds National-Socialist Germany and Fascist Italy, the firmness and harmony of their purposes, and the indissolubility of their friendship. They have deepened and revived my admiration for your work and my friendship for your person.

Accept with the renewed expression of my gratitude my most sincere and heartiest wishes for you and your great country. In expectation of greeting you in Italy.

Mussolini."

THE ERECTION OF THE "BERLIN-ROME AXIS"

The Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, paid his first foreign visit from October 21st to 25th, 1936 to the friendly German Reich. From October 21st to 23rd he was the guest of the German Foreign Minister, Baron von Neurath in Berlin. On the 24th he was received by the Führer at Berchtesgaden. On the 25th Count Ciano returned to Rome. The result of his conversations led through the following announcements to the recognition of the Italian Empire of Ethiopia and to the erection of the so-called "Berlin-Rome axis".

German Official Announcement of October 24th, 1936

The Royal Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Count Ciano, was today received by the Führer and Chancellor. In the conversation the Führer and Chancellor informed the representative of the Fascist Government that the Government of the Reich had decided upon the formal recognition of the Italian Empire of Ethiopia. The Italian Foreign Minister stated that the Fascist Government noted this communication with satisfaction and fully appreciated its significance.

German Official Final Communiqué of October 25th, 1936 regarding the Political Discussion with the Italian Foreign Minister

In the course of the visit of the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, in Germany, in his conversation with the Führer and Chancellor and in various conversations with leading German men, the outstanding political, economic and social questions of importance were discussed, in particular those of immediate concern to the two countries.

The conversations took place in an atmosphere of friendly cordiality. To the satisfaction of both parties it was observed that their views were in agreement and that the two Governments intended to direct their common activity towards the promotion of general peace and reconstruction. The two Governments have decided to keep in touch with each other in order to carry out these aims.

Statements by Count Ciano regarding his Negotiations in Berlin and Berchtesgaden

On October 25th the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, received the press representatives in Munich and made the following statements:

"In the last few days I have had a thorough exchange of views in Berchtesgaden with the Führer and in Berlin with Baron von Neurath regarding the general political situation. This exchange of views has shown still more clearly the firm intention of our two Governments to direct our common effort towards the general work of peace and reconstruction. These common endeavours have their firm foundations not only in the interests of both countries, but also in the lofty task which Germany and Italy fulfil in the defence of the great civilisatory institutions of Europe.

This framework includes the examination which we have concluded of the negotiations now pending for the replacement of the Locarno agreement. As you are aware, both the German and the Italian Governments have already replied to the British memorandum, and both Governments stressed their clear determination to cooperate in reinforcing the foundations of security such as may arise out of a guarantee pact for western Europe.

We also examined with Baron von Neurath various aspects of the League of Nations problem. Our two Governments will remain, as in the past, in close and friendly touch with each other.

As far as the Danube basin is concerned, I can state that our examination of the position, which we have carried out in the light of the Rome protocol and the German-Austrian agreement of July 11th, enables us to our mutual satisfaction to note the practical and positive advantages for Austria which the policy of the two countries has already demonstrated. The two Governments will deal with the problems concerning the Danube basin in a spirit of friendly cooperation.

We also discussed the position of Spain and it was agreed that the national Government of General Franco is supported by the firm determination of the Spanish nation in the greatest part of the territory where it has succeeded in restoring order and civil discipline as opposed to the anarchic conditions which had reigned there. At the same time we reaffirmed the principle of non-intervention in Spanish affairs and again confirmed the maintenance of the international obligations entered into in this respect. It is unnecessary to add that we were of one opinion that Germany and Italy have no other desire than that Spain—in her absolute national and colonial integrity—should soon again resume the position in the life of the nations which is her due.

In the face of the serious dangers which menace the social structure of Europe, the Führer, Baron von Neurath and myself have renewed the firm determination of the Italian and German nations to defend with all their power the sacred inheritance of European civilisation in the great institutions based on the family and the nation which forms its foundation.

In this spirit Baron von Neurath and I decided to intensify the cultural relations between Germany and Italy, and immediately after my return to Rome we shall begin discussions for the conclusion of an agreement for cultural exchanges between the two countries.

As announced yesterday, the Führer has decided to recognise the Italian Empire of Ethiopia. I do not need to tell you with what satisfaction I received this decision. In this connection we regulated the Italo-German economic relations in regard to Ethiopia, and the various outstanding questions will be settled to the mutual satisfaction of the two countries.

All these points were laid down in the protocol drawn up on the conclusion of our discussions.

I am returning to Italy with a feeling of sincere admiration for everything that I have been able to see in Germany. These feelings refer primarily to the Führer to whom I have transmitted the greetings of the Duce and of Fascist Italy. I did not yet know Germany, although, as you can well imagine, I have followed almost daily during these years the National Socialist movement and your brilliant national revival under the intelligent and creative guidance of the Führer. What I have seen has made a keen and direct impression upon me, and the contact with your statesmen, the institutions that I visited, the demonstrations that I attended serve to complete in my mind the great picture of National Socialist Germany to which I express my deepest and sincerest good wishes.

The cordial contact between our two Governments will be continued, and our cooperation in the general work of peace and reconstruction of Europe will be carried on in Rome as in Berlin in the same spirit and with the same determination as it has been begun in these days."

The Statements on Foreign Policy

in Mussolini's Speech at Palermo on August 20th, 1937

After the conclusion of the manœuvres in Sicily, the Head of the Italian Government made a speech at Palermo on August 20th, 1937; its importance in respect of foreign politics lay on the one hand in the readiness which he expressed to reach an agreement with England and on the other hand in the reaffirmation of German-Italian solidarity.

"You have seen with your own eyes the organisation of Italian land, sea and air forces. It would be only in a fit of insanity that anyone could conceive the idea of penetrating into your country. Here no one will ever land—not a single soldier. Now listen to the following announcement: the present day begins for our soil one of the happiest epochs of the four thousand years' existence of Sicily. This epoch is connected with a historical fact, the foundation of the second Roman Empire. The energies of the State will in future be concentrated upon you even more than in the past, as Sicily is the geographical centre of the Empire. When I decided to hold the great manœuvres in Sicily, fears and exaggerated and inappropriate objections arose. All this is now past. The entire world must in future be convinced that Fascist Italy is determined to carry on a positive policy of peace.

In accordance with these principles, we are endeavouring to improve relations especially with the States which have common frontiers with our country. Our relations with Yugoslavia have undoubtedly improved since March until the present time. Our relations with Austria and Hungary are based on the Rome protocols which have proved their effectiveness in the height of the economic depression. I do not need to point out that our relations with Switzerland are more than friendly.

Among the countries with which we have common frontiers, there is lastly France. If we take a long view of these relations as a whole we arrive at the conclusion that there is no ground for any drama. Relations would certainly be better if in France authoritative circles were not idolators before the idols of Geneva, and if there were not also other currents which for the last 15 years have awaited with a tenacity worthy of a better cause the collapse of the Fascist régime.

If from land frontiers we now pass to maritime and colonial frontiers, we meet Great Britain. I have said we meet—and I beg those who are preparing to translate and to traduce this speech not to confound a meeting with a collision. When I turn to reflect upon our relations with London during the last two years I am led to conclude that at bottom there has been a great misunderstanding. Opinion has lagged behind. There exists a superficial and picturesque knowledge of Italy, of that picturesqueness which I detest. This young, resolute, mighty Italy is not yet known.

Thanks to the January agreement, there was a clearing of the atmosphere. Then came unfortunate events to which it is unnecessary to refer at this moment. Now again there is a fresh clearing of the horizon. In the foreground is the question of the common colonial frontiers. I think it is possible to arrive at a lasting and firm resolution between the "route" and the "life" of two nations. Thus Italy is prepared to give her collaboration on all those problems which interest the political life of Europe. But she will now bring certain realities into the reckoning. The first of these realities is the Empire. It has been said that we desire recognition by the League of Nations. Nothing of the sort. We do not ask the officials at Geneva to register a birth. We do think, however, that the time has come to register a death. For the last 18 months there has been a dead man in history. Bury him in the name of public health. We cannot be suspected of excessive tenderness towards the League, but we cannot make any further distinction between those who have recognized the Empire and those who have not recognized it.

Another reality of which account must be taken is that which is now commonly known as the Rome-Berlin axis. One does not reach Rome by ignoring or going against Berlin and one does not reach Berlin by ignoring or going against Rome. You understand me when I say there is an active solidarity between the two régimes. Let it be said in the most categorical manner that we will not tolerate in the Mediterranean Bolshevism or anything of a similar nature. Whenever these disturbances created by a people absolutely foreign to the Mediterranean have been warded off, I shall be pleased to issue an appeal for peace to all those countries which are bathed by that sea where three continents have brought together three civilisations. Should this appeal not be heard, we are perfectly calm, because Fascist Italy contains such forces, spiritual and material, that she can face and mould to herself any destiny."

II. THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR AND THE MEDITERRANEAN PROBLEM

In view of the attempt by an unknown submarine to torpedo the British cruiser "Havoc" exercising control in the Mediterranean under the agreement for non-intervention in the Spanish civil war—though the bloodshed on the torpedoed German cruiser "Deutschland" exercising the same duty and the attack immediately afterwards on the cruiser "Leipzig" had not sufficed to bring about measures against piracy in the Mediterranean—the British and French Governments decided to convene a Conference in order to find ways and means of safeguarding shipping in the Mediterranean. In spite of the unfortunate experience of the greatly prized collective cooperation gained through the treatment of attacks on Italian and German ships, the Anglo-French proposal was favourably received in Germany and Italy. Berlin and Rome again gave proof of their desire to do useful work for European peace which was endangered by the Spanish civil war. At the time of the invitation, however, came the two notes of the Soviet Government worded in a manner that was deliberately provocative for the Italian Government and accusing Italian submarines—without a shadow of proof—of attacks on two Russian steamers in the Mediterranean and demanding compensation from the Italian Government and the punishment of the guilty parties. Furthermore the Soviet Union wished to make this accusation against Italy a subject of discussion at the proposed conference and thus to remove it from the purely technical aspect of its work into the political sphere. Soviet diplomacy thus continued the sabotage in favour of Valencia which it had carried on from the outset of the London non-intervention committee and which it always applied when any possibility of an agreement of the other Great Powers appeared on the clouded political horizon of Spanish events and useful work was to be carried out for preventing the spread of the conflict and the maintenance of European peace.

When, therefore, on September 6th an invitation was sent to the States bordering on the Mediterranean and Black Sea and to Germany to take part in the Conference at Nyon, Berlin and Rome rejected it and proposed that the entire question should be settled by the Non-Intervention Committee in London which had, indeed, been set up for this purpose. The Conference then met without the two Powers on September 10th at Nyon. Italy, in a note of September 14th, protested against the result which was contrary to her interests in the Mediterranean; the United Kingdom and France took account of this protest by proposing a new Conference of naval experts in order to bring Italy into the Nyon Arrangement. This Arrangement, which gave Italy a right of control only in the Tyrrhenian Sea, had left open the question of the subsequent inclusion of Italy in the control of the Mediterranean. This Conference took place from September 27th to 30th in Paris and led to an agreement between the three Powers, the effect of which, however, still depends on the agreement of the other signatory Powers of Nyon. In the meantime, however, France, in the conversation on September 22nd at Geneva between the French Foreign Minister Delbos and the Italian delegate to the League, Bova-Scoppa, of which much was made in the French press, endeavoured to bring up the entire Spanish problem at a new Conference of Three, with a view to reaching a settlement of the questions of volunteers and of the "status quo" in the Mediterranean. After some hesitation, the United Kingdom supported France to the extent that the two Powers took a common step in this direction through their representatives in Rome during the absence of Mussolini and Count Ciano. The objects aimed at by the conversation at Geneva and the step in Rome were then laid down in the Anglo-French note of October 2nd, the proposals of which were however answered in the negative by the Rome note of October 9th.

THE NYON ARRANGEMENT OF SEPTEMBER 14th, 1937. Communication from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of France, President of the Mediterranean Conference of Nyon.

Geneva, September 21st, 1937.

To the Secretary-General.

As President of the Mediterranean Conference of Nyon, I have the honour to forward to you herewith the text of the Arrangements signed, on the invitation of the French and United Kingdom Governments, on September 14th and 17th, by the representatives of Bulgaria, the United Kingdom, Egypt, France, Greece, Roumania, Turkey, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia.

I should be obliged if you would be good enough to communicate the text of these documents to the Members of the Council.

I have the honour, etc.,

(Signed) Yvon Delbos.

The Text of the Arrangement.

Whereas arising out of the Spanish conflict attacks have been repeatedly committed in the Mediterranean by submarines against merchant ships not belonging to either of the conflicting Spanish parties; and

Whereas these attacks are violations of the rules of international law referred to in Part IV of the Treaty of London of April 22nd, 1930 with regard to the sinking of merchant ships and constitute acts contrary to the most elementary dictates of humanity, which should be justly treated as acts of piracy; and

Whereas without in any way admitting the right of either party to the conflict in Spain to exercise belligerent rights or to interfere with merchant ships on the high seas even if the laws of warfare at sea are observed and without prejudice to the right of any participating Power to take such action as may be proper to protect its merchant shipping from any kind of interference on the high seas or to the possibility of further collective measures being agreed upon subsequently, it is necessary in the first place to agree upon certain special collective measures against piratical acts by submarines:

In view thereof the undersigned, being authorised to this effect by their respective Governments, have met in conference at Nyon between the 9th and the 14th September 1937, and have agreed upon the following provisions which shall enter immediately into force:

I. The Participating Powers will instruct their naval forces to take the action indicated in paragraphs II and III below with a view to the protection of all merchant ships not belonging to either of the conflicting Spanish parties.

II. Any submarine which attacks such a ship in a manner contrary to the rules of international law referred to in the International Treaty for the Limitation and Reduction of Naval Armaments signed in London on April 22nd, 1930, and confirmed in the Protocol signed in London on November 6th, 1936, shall be counter-attacked and, if possible, destroyed.

III. The instruction mentioned in the preceding paragraph shall extend to any submarine encountered in the vicinity of a position where a ship not belonging to either of the conflicting Spanish parties has recently been attacked in violation of the rules referred to in the preceding paragraph in circumstances which give valid grounds for the belief that the submarine was guilty of the attack.

IV. In order to facilitate the putting into force of the above arrangements in a practical manner, the participating Powers have agreed upon the following arrangements:

1. In the western Mediterranean and in the Malta Channel, with the exception of the Tyrrhenian Sea, which may form the subject of special arrangements, the British and French fleets will operate both on the high seas and in the territorial waters of the Participating Powers, in accordance with the division of the area agreed upon between the two Governments.

2. In the eastern Mediterranean,

(a) Each of the Participating Powers will operate in its own territorial waters ;

(b) On the high seas, with the exception of the Adriatic Sea, the British and French fleets will operate up to the entrance to the Dardanelles, in those areas where there is reason to apprehend danger to shipping in accordance with the division of the area agreed upon between the two Governments. The other Participating Governments possessing a sea border on the Mediterranean, undertake, within the limit of their resources, to furnish these fleets any assistance that may be asked for ; in particular, they will permit them to take action in their territorial waters and to use such of their ports as they shall indicate.

3. It is further understood that the limits of the zones referred to in sub-paragraphs 1 and 2 above, and their allocation shall be subject at any time to revision by the Participating Powers in order to take account of any change in the situation.

V. The Participating Powers agree that, in order to simplify the operation of the above-mentioned measures, they will for their part restrict the use of their submarines in the Mediterranean in the following manner :

(a) Except as stated in (b) and (c) below, no submarine will be sent to sea within the Mediterranean.

(b) Submarines may proceed on passage after notification of the other Participating Powers, provided that they proceed on the surface and are accompanied by a surface ship.

(c) Each Participating Power reserves for purposes of exercises certain areas defined in Annex I hereto in which its submarines are exempt from the restrictions mentioned in (a) or (b).

The Participating Powers further undertake not to allow the presence in their respective territorial waters of any foreign submarines except in case of urgent distress, or where the conditions prescribed in sub-paragraph (b) above are fulfilled.

VI. The Participating Powers also agree that, in order to simplify the problem involved in carrying out the measures above described, they may severally advise their merchant shipping to follow certain main routes in the Mediterranean agreed upon between them and defined in Annex II hereto.

VII. Nothing in the present agreement restricts the right of any Participating Power to send its surface vessels to any part of the Mediterranean.

VIII. Nothing in the present agreement in any way prejudices existing international engagements which have been registered with the Secretariat of the League of Nations.

IX. If any of the Participating Powers notifies its intention of withdrawing from the present arrangement, the notification will take effect after the expiry of thirty days and any of the other Participating Powers may withdraw on the same date if it communicates its intention to this effect before that date.

Done at Nyon this fourteenth day of September nineteen hundred and thirty seven, in a single copy, in the English and French languages, both texts being equally authentic, and which will be deposited in the archives of the Secretariat of the League of Nations.

Agreement supplementary to the Nyon Arrangement. of September 17th, 1937.

Whereas under the Arrangement signed at Nyon on the 14th September, 1937, whereby certain collective measures were agreed upon relating to piratical acts by submarines in the Mediterranean, the Participating Powers reserved the possibility of taking further collective measures ; and

Whereas it is now considered expedient that such measures should be taken against similar acts by surface vessels and aircraft ;

In view thereof, the undersigned, being authorised to this effect by their respective Governments, have met in conference at Geneva on the seventeenth day of September and have agreed upon the following provisions which shall enter immediately into force :

I. The present Agreement is supplementary to the Nyon Arrangement and shall be regarded as an integral part thereof.

II. The present Agreement applies to any attack by a surface vessel or an aircraft upon any merchant vessel in the Mediterranean not belonging to either of the conflicting Spanish parties, when such attack is accompanied by a violation of the humanitarian principles embodied in the rules of international law with regard to warfare at sea, which are referred to in Part IV of the Treaty of London of April 22nd, 1930, and confirmed in the Protocol signed in London on November 6th, 1936.

III. Any surface war vessel, engaged in the protection of merchant shipping in conformity with the Nyon Arrangement, which witnesses an attack of the kind referred to in the preceding paragraph shall :

(a) If the attack is committed by an aircraft, open fire on the aircraft ;

(b) If the attack is committed by a surface vessel, intervene to resist it within the limits of its powers, summoning assistance if such is available and necessary.

In territorial waters each of the Participating Powers concerned will give instructions as to the action to be taken by its own war vessels in the spirit of the present Agreement.

Text of the Anglo-French Note to Italy of October 2nd, 1937.

The Governments of France and the United Kingdom have noted with pleasure that, as a result of the conversations which have taken place in Paris between their naval experts and those of the Italian Government, it is now possible to contemplate the modification of the arrangement signed at Nyon on September 14th in such a manner as to secure the participation of Italy in the measures agreed upon for rendering the arrangement effective.

Favourable conditions are thus created to enable the three Governments to examine, in a spirit of perfect frankness, the situation arising from the prolongation of the Spanish conflict.

The two Governments have, moreover, noted with satisfaction the assurances given by his Excellency Count Ciano to the British Chargé d'Affaires in Rome that there was no present intention of permitting the despatch of further volunteers to Spain.

They have also taken note of the declaration made to Monsieur Delbos by the Italian Delegate at Geneva, that Italy had no intention of making the smallest change in the territorial status of Spain ; that she had no designs upon the Balearic Islands, and that the integrity of the continental and insular territory of Spain would be strictly respected.

For their part the two Governments willingly renew the same assurances to the Italian Government. They further desire to declare that in accordance with what is the very essence of the non-intervention agreements, they consider themselves bound to respect the political independence of Spain.

The Governments of France and the United Kingdom earnestly desire that the civil strife in Spain shall cease to be a cause of international unrest and suspicion and that, in that part of Europe, conditions shall develop which shall permit of progress being made elsewhere towards general appeasement.

But they are convinced that no considerable improvement in the situation is possible until further measures have been carried out to make the policy of non-intervention effective by the withdrawal of the non-Spanish nationals who are now taking part in the struggle.

So long as large numbers of foreigners continue to assist both sides, the risk of grave international disturbances will be present, and will inevitably tend to increase until at least a substantial number are withdrawn.

The London Committee has, of course, been already apprised of this programme, but the difficulties it has come up against have practically paralysed its action, and it appears that a previous agreement between the three Powers is necessary to overcome these obstacles.

The view of the two Governments is that the elaboration of such an agreement should form one of the essential elements of the frank and cordial conversations to which they invite the Italian Government.

Moreover, greatly as the French and United Kingdom Governments desire to maintain the obligations which they have undertaken resulting from the international agreements respecting the supply of arms and men to Spain, they cannot conceal from themselves the difficulty of preserving these conditions unless some such steps are taken to make the policy of non-intervention really effective.

With this end in view, the French and United Kingdom Governments have the honour to invite the Italian Government to join with them in conversations with the object, if possible, of reaching an agreement on measures to carry this policy into effect.

In their view, such an agreement would not only make an important contribution to the improvement of the political situation, but once such a withdrawal has been effected the question of the recognition on certain conditions of belligerent rights to the two parties should be capable of solution.

It is the earnest desire of the two Governments that these conversations, to which they attach the utmost importance, should be held at the earliest possible moment.

The Italian Reply of October 9th, 1937

The Royal Ministry of Foreign Affairs have the honour to refer to the communication of his Britannic Majesty's Embassy dated the 2nd instant.

The Fascist Government willingly take note of the assurances furnished by the British Government regarding the political independence of Spain. For themselves they do not need to recall the assurances furnished on repeated occasions, in the most solemn fashion regarding the political independence and consequently the territorial integrity of Spain, its mainland, its islands and its colonies.

The Fascist Government fully share the hope expressed by the British Government that the internal struggles of Spain may cease to be a cause of suspicion and friction between the other nations and that the situation may evolve in such a manner that, in other fields also, progress may be realised towards a general détente.

They are ready, with every possible good-will, to examine, as they have always done in the past, all means which may be thought suitable to render effective the policy of non-intervention.

Among the elements constituting this policy the British Government lay particular emphasis upon the question of the volunteers and their withdrawal.

Nevertheless, in order to indicate clearly the individual political positions and the responsibilities deriving from them, and not for any untimely emphasis of polemic, it is opportune to recall how it was actually Italy, together with Germany, who was the first to draw attention to the question of volunteers, and to insist that their despatch should be forbidden, and subsequently that provisions should be taken for their withdrawal.

The Italian Government claim for themselves and for the German Government the merit of the initiative directed towards the consideration of this question as one of the indispensable elements of any policy of non-intervention.

In so far as they themselves are concerned, they recall the explicit declaration made to the French Ambassador by the Italian Foreign Minister so long ago as August 1936, the declarations obtained in the "note verbale" of January 7th last addressed to the Embassies of Great Britain and France, that of January 25th last, addressed only to the Embassy of Great Britain, and finally the repeated declaration made by the Italian Representative on the Committee of Non-Intervention in London on the occasion of the last discussion of this question.

The Fascist Government have the honour to confirm that so far as concerns the whole question of non-intervention, in its various aspects and elements, they maintain the same order of ideas as that which emerges from all the above mentioned declarations.

In their communication of the 2nd instant, the British Government suggest that conversations should be initiated between the three Governments of France, England and Italy for the purpose of reaching, if possible, agreement on measures designed to ensure the application of the policy of non-intervention.

The British Government suggest such a procedure with the intention of obviating the difficulties which have occurred at the London Committee.

The Fascist Government appreciate, in all its value, the British suggestion, but doubt whether the difficulties in question can be overcome by way of ingenuities or device of procedure and, above all, by that proposed.

They draw the attention of the British Government to the fact that the matter under discussion does not regard some states alone; but on the contrary directly interests other states besides France, Great Britain and Italy.

Further, the fact should not be overlooked that without the adherence of Burgos and Valencia any decision on the question would fail to lead to practical results. All the more so when one remembers the attitude of the representative of Valencia who, by his specious pretext, excluded in his speech in Geneva any possibility of the evacuation of the volunteers enrolled in the armed forces of his Government.

The proposed discussion, in the absence of the other states, would lack the elements indispensable for reaching an agreement. It is the conviction of the Fascist Government that the adoption of procedures—even if only preliminary—outside the London Committee and its organs would, in the present situation, result, not only in not diminishing, but in increasing, the possibility of misunderstandings and complications, and in retarding instead of hastening the attainment of the general agreement, an agreement which the Fascist Government regard as supremely necessary.

The Fascist Government are therefore of the opinion that the question of non-intervention should continue to be dealt with at the London Committee.

The Fascist Government have finally the honour to state that they will not participate in conversations meetings or conferences to which the German Government have not been formally invited and in which they do not participate.

BELGIUM'S FIGHT FOR HER INDEPENDENCE

The German-Belgian Exchange of Notes of October 13th, 1937.

A New German Contribution to European Peace.

It is exactly a year since King Leopold of Belgium, in his sensational speech of October 14th, 1936 in the Belgian Council of Ministers, announced the introduction of a new Belgian policy which aimed at releasing Belgium from the undertakings and obligations arising out of and assumed after the war and at returning—if not to pre-war neutrality—at any rate to a kind of "voluntary neutrality". The German-Belgian exchange of notes of October 13th, 1937 represents a great step towards the realisation of this aim.

From the German point of view this exchange of notes is a further stage on the path of development which was taken by the step of March 7th, 1936 with the denunciation of the Locarno Agreement and the restoration of territorial sovereignty over the demilitarised Rhine zone. At the time, we reported on the negotiations which followed this step in Nos. 161/165 of this Journal. They ended for the time being by the declaration of the remaining Locarno Powers, United Kingdom, Italy, France and Belgium, in Paragraph III of the Memorandum of March 20th, 1936 :

"that nothing that has happened before or since the said breach of the Treaty of Locarno can be considered as having freed the Signatories of that Treaty from any of their obligations or guarantees and that the latter subsist in their entirety.

They undertake forthwith to instruct their General Staffs to enter into contact with a view to arranging the technical conditions in which the obligations which are binding upon them should be carried out in case of unprovoked aggression."

On April 1st the British Government—Italy having in the meantime again withdrawn—addressed a note to the French and Belgian Governments in which that declaration was reaffirmed and a guarantee agreement was thus concluded between these three Powers, which was to be a sort of intermediate stage until the conclusion of a substitute for Locarno by a new Western Pact proposed in the German memorandum of March 7th or, if this failed, it was to be a definite settlement between the three Powers. It subsequently appeared that there were very considerable difficulties in the way of the desired rapid conclusion of a new western Pact mainly on account of the French demand that it should be linked up with the Paris-Moscow Eastern Pact plans.

Baldwin's famous phrase about the "British Rhine frontier" also acquired a new and deep significance not only for Germany but also for Belgium when, in the General Staff conversations which took place in April 1936 on the basis of the British guarantee, the British General Staff demanded as a recompense that they should have in certain cases the right to use the Belgian airforce arrangements and the air intelligence service established on the Belgian-German frontier. A completely new factor was England's intention, in case of a warlike conflict with one of the signatories of the Western Pact, to obtain the active military assistance of the other parties to the treaty, and to become not only a guarantor with obligations as in the Locarno Agreement, but also a guaranteed Power with counter-claims; this was, however, entirely opposed to the intention of Belgium to take part in a new western Pact as a guaranteed, but not as a guaranteeing Power.

Finally the exchange of notes led to no result on account of the Italo-Abyssinian conflict and the Spanish crisis. This position caused the Belgian question to come up in the autumn of 1936.

* * *

The foreign and military policy of Belgium in the past 17 years has been conditioned mainly by the following considerations.

When the neutrality of Belgium was brought to an end under Article 31 of the Versailles Treaty, and replaced by the new situation which that Article established, in 1919, Belgium became a member of the League, but without making any of the reservations made by Switzerland. In the following year Belgium concluded a Military Convention with France on September 7th, 1920, which in itself constituted a violation of Articles 20 and 21 of the Covenant of the League. In further violation of Article 18 of the Covenant the Convention was never registered with the Secretariat of the League. Its contents accordingly remained secret; but its existence was made public by the registration and publication of the accompanying Notes of September 10th and 15th, 1920. In 1921 Belgium further concluded a defensive alliance with England, and was a party in 1925 to the Locarno Treaties, under which she became, not merely a guaranteed Power, but a Power guaranteeing the "status quo" in Western Europe. As a consequence she was forced into a one-sided adherence to France and the French rearmament policy, which was shortly patent to the world in the shape of a joint programme of development of the Armies and fortress systems of the two countries. On the Northern and Eastern frontiers of Belgium there has recently been erected a dense series of fortifications which are meaningless unless regarded as a continuation of the Maginot line. On the Western frontier, i. e. on the side exposed to France, Belgium remained without defences; and the whole of her defence forces were at the same time organised on lines which ran parallel to those of French military policy. It was this development that gave rise to an internal opposition which gathered strength at every moment. The Flemish section of the population, was increasingly opposed to the effortless subordination to France. The first recognition of the existence of this feeling was the declaration by the Minister M. Hymans on March 4th, 1931. It did not amount to much. It was not till three years later that a statement was made by the Count de Brocqueville on March 6th, 1934, which made a lasting impression on us on account of its sharp condemnation of the Versailles system. In the meantime speeches and articles in the Flemish Press multiplied their attacks on the one-sided connection of Belgium with France and their demand for the denunciation of the Secret Agreement of September 7th, 1920.

In connection with the proposal submitted to the Belgian Chamber at the beginning of February 1936 to extend the period of military service a Flemish resolution was introduced on February 20th for the denunciation of the Franco-Belgian Secret Agreement. In the discussion of the Flemish motion in the plenary meeting of the Chamber on March 11th the Flemish deputies argued that Belgium, like certain of the Balkan States, was reduced to nothing more than a section of the French military block. The Belgian defences were directed simply and solely against a single neighbour. The Premier van Zeeland thereupon announced that the Military Convention with France had been terminated only a few days before—on March 6th—and replaced by a new Agreement which only provided for permanent contact between the General Staffs. The Premier's statement was not calculated to allay the anxiety in the country. The Flemish Nationalists and the Fleming members of the Catholic Party contended that the new Agreement with France was no improvement in so far as the independence of Belgium was concerned. In Parliament and in the country they argued for the return to an independent policy of voluntary neutrality. After the new Elections of May 1936, which strengthened the ranks of the Flemings and brought the Rexists for the first time into Parliament, the new Foreign Minister of the van Zeeland Cabinet, M. Spaak, at a reception of the Press on July 20th declared in favour of a policy of neutrality. A storm of indignation in the Francophil Press was the sequel: but a semi-official announcement was made shortly, afterwards notwithstanding to the effect that in any new Locarno Treaty Belgium would decline to accept the position of guarantor of any foreign country's frontiers, and that her efforts would be directed solely towards the negotiation of a guarantee of her own frontiers.

In his Speech to the Council of Ministers on October 14th, 1936 the King of the Belgians himself referred to the need for a reshaping of Belgian foreign and military policy in the light of internal and external political developments.⁽¹⁾

What weighty grounds were there in the field of foreign politics to induce the King of the Belgians to make these startling public statements with regard to Belgium's desire for a foreign policy of her own—statements, be it noted, which gave the death-blow to the spirit, if not to the actual letter, of the Agreements with France? The answer is to be found in the Note sent from Brussels on October 23rd, 1936 to the Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay in reply to enquiries from London as to the Belgian attitude in regard to the proposed Five Power Conference for the conclusion of a Western Pact. The following are the comments of the Brussels Correspondent of The Times on the contents of the Note (The "Times", October 23rd, 1936):

"The Note makes it clear that the Belgian Government, like the British Government, view with dismay the recent tendency towards the formation of rigid and antagonistic blocs in Europe and that they are determined to hold themselves aloof from it. In the circumstances of 1936 the obligations assumed under the original Locarno Pact are too heavy to be borne by a State of Belgium's size and military strength. Article 1 of the Locarno Pact, by implication, placed Belgium on terms of equality with the Great Powers, and under it Belgium has the same responsibility as the other Powers for the maintenance of German and French territorial integrity. Though the assumption of this obligation was much criticised by the Flemings at the time, it was generally felt that it could be safely shouldered. Germany was largely disarmed, the Rhineland was demilitarised, and the League looked like becoming a nucleus of a dependable system of collective security. Moreover it was felt that the new treaty had made a vital contribution to the maintenance of Belgian security.

"In 1936, the Note explains, everything is different. German rearmament, precipitated by the Barthou Note of April 17th, 1934, has culminated in a remilitarisation of the Rhineland and has completely altered Belgium's position in relation to Germany. The collapse of collective security in the face of Italy's war against Abyssinia has so weakened the League that it is now felt to be almost useless as an instrument for the maintenance of peace. Finally, the development of the French system of alliances, with the aim of counterbalancing Germany's growing military strength, tends to divide Europe into precisely two such antagonistic pro-French and pro-German groups as it was the aim of Locarno to dissolve.

"Against this background the Belgian Note goes on to argue that in the light of recent events Belgium can best contribute towards Western security, if the national defences are so strengthened as to offer the maximum deterrent to any aggressor, and if at the same time Belgium holds aloof from all systems and thereby does not provide a potential aggressor with the excuse that she forms part of a hostile ring."

The Note reveals in the first place the one-sided interpretation hitherto given by France and Belgium to the Locarno Pact, inasmuch as they persisted, in spite of the English and Italian guarantees, in their policy of a military alliance and General Staff conversations. It is easy to read between the lines—as some of the comments in the English, French and Belgian Press did not fail to do—that the new French policy of alliance with the U.S.S.R. was the primary reason for Belgium's reconsideration of her position. The Belgian public and the Belgian Government rightly felt that the Franco-Russian Pact had introduced an incalculable element of danger into the political system of Europe. When, after the initial rift in the shape of the revision of the Franco-Belgian Military Alliance on March 6th, Belgium decided definitively to abandon the system of assimilated Franco-Belgian policy which she had practised for the last fifteen years, and to free herself completely from the commitments it entailed, her decision was due in the last analysis to nothing else than the feverish French mania for the conclusion of Pacts with dangerous, automatically operating obligations.

The speech of the King of the Belgians was the prelude to a lively exchange of views between London and Paris as to the significance of the new policy of neutrality which it proclaimed. The anxieties to which it gave rise in the minds of the French and English Cabinets, were (as the Press comments showed) in connection with the idea of collective security, the one-sided Belgian obligations to the Western Powers on the land and in the air, the arrangements between the different General Staffs, the problem of policy in relation to the League of Nations, the right to march through Belgium, and so on and so on.

The Belgian Foreign Minister further made it clear that Belgium would adhere to the Locarno Treaty and the Agreements of April 1st, 1936 pending the conclusion of a new Western Pact between the former Locarno Powers. The Foreign Minister's announcement was indicative of the Belgian inclination—to which subsequent interpretations of the King's speech and the General Staff arrangements which followed also gave expression—not to strain Belgian relations with France and England too far. The Belgian declaration of neutrality applied therefore only to future negotiations: the former agreements should remain in force for the present.

In his speech on foreign policy in the Chamber on October 28th, 1936 the Foreign Minister (M. Spaak) stated that Belgium would still be ready in the future to take part in any reasonable form of collective action within the limits of conditions clearly defined. Belgium was anxious to fulfil her obligations; but the obligations must be laid down in plain and exact terms, explicitly circumscribed in such a manner as to admit of no misunderstanding. Belgium intended to pursue a purely Belgian foreign policy, having regard to her geographical position, her traditions and her capacities. There was no question of a reversion to the pre-war neutrality, since Belgium meant to remain a member of the League. The Foreign Minister then referred to the system of collective security. It was perhaps the ideal system of ensuring the maintenance of Peace, but only if organised on comprehensive and effective lines; and it could not be said to be so organised at the present time. Belgian foreign policy would therefore be based on the maintenance of complete independence. Its object would be to make it perfectly plain to each of her neighbours that Belgium did not propose to allow her territory to be used either for the transit of troops or as a strategic base. Such a policy postulated a strong Belgium. The military and the political issues were consequently inseparable.

After these statements by the King of the Belgians and his Foreign Minister, which presumably also found expression in the two Belgian Western Pact notes of October 25th, 1936 and February 12th, 1937 (the latter being immediately after the offer of guarantee to Belgium made by Adolf Hitler in his Reichstag speech of January 30th), a violent press campaign started in France by which the British attitude was also influenced and King Albert was caused personally to seek in London comprehension for the views and desires expressed in his speech, while immediately before his journey on March 20th a memorandum by the French Government endeavoured to create a feeling against those views.

The negotiations lasted four entire weeks before an agreement was finally reached on April 24th, 1937. The text shows in the first place quite clearly that Belgium is relieved of her previous obligations of guarantee under the Locarno Agreement and under the agreement between the remaining Locarno Powers of March 19th, 1936, while the guarantees assumed by France and the United Kingdom towards Belgium are maintained. This admission was certainly not easy for the two Western Powers who were accustomed to regard the country of the Scheldt and Meuse as a fixed factor in all common military considerations. They not only took time to reach their decision, but presumably weighed every possibility of keeping Belgium in this system. All the more praise is due to the determination of Belgium to carry out her policy of complete independence. The pressure exercised on her is no doubt the reason why she accepted the two conditions (a) that she must have strong armaments in order to support and defend her frontiers, (b) that she must remain in the League of Nations. But Belgium was no more thinking of scrapping her armaments than she was of leaving the League of Nations. From the point of view of Paris and London, therefore, there are doubtless other reasons behind these two conditions. This was soon shown quite openly by French and British comments. The question relates to Article 16 of the League Covenant, with which it is proposed to argue at the proper moment, since its provisions "do not preclude the use of Belgian territory for the passage of troops for purposes of defence or as a basis of operation for the air arm in a League war". In this connection it was also hoped that a "contact" of the General Staffs might be maintained, especially as there is not a word in the declaration on the subject of the agreement of March 6th, 1937 concluded in lieu of the alliance of September 7th, 1920. It is then anticipated that Belgian public opinion will be subsequently more mindful of the "true interests" of the country. It is true that these obligations, the participation in sanctions and the grant of the right of transit, are open to various interpretations and have in practice already been variously interpreted. It is also known that, as far as Switzerland is concerned, participation in military sanctions and the grant of the right of transit have from the outset been waived. It is also known that, on the conclusion of the Locarno agreement, Germany rejected undertakings arising out of the sanctions article and the right of transit on account of her special geographical position and her military and political situation at that time. Holland has also stated on several occasions that she reserves for herself entire freedom of action in this respect. In view of the trend of Belgian policy it cannot be assumed that there is any intention of using League obligations as a path towards new General Staff discussions and of thus returning in any form to those one-sided undertakings which Brussels has for months so strenuously tried to escape.

In his speech in the Chamber on April 29th, 1937, the Foreign Minister, M. Spaak, gave an interpretation of the Franco-British declaration of guarantee of April 24th, outlined the standpoint of the Belgian Government and referred to some points in special detail. The aim of Belgium was especially to be able to carry out a policy of independence which would enable her to take up arms only in her self-defence. In pursuit of this policy, the period of military agreements with other countries was closed. Belgium would therefore not take part in further General Staff discussions. She would carry out her obligations as a Member of the League of Nations, but retained the right—here he referred to the Netherlands and to the various possibilities of interpreting Article 16—to make the right of transit dependent on her own consent and not to let it be imposed upon her. M. Spaak thus rejected a decision of the League as implying an absolute obligation to allow the passage of troops and reserved the right of decision. He laid stress on the "recommendation" in Article 16. The right of passage is, of course, much less risky for States situated on the outskirts, and on the other hand weighs with all its dangers on those situated in the centre. Belgium will therefore find it very hard to give her consent, especially as it is in most cases very hard to distinguish between an offensive and a defensive war. For she desires—neither in the west nor still less in the east—no longer to be even a subject, not to speak of an unconsulted object, and rejects the exaggeration of the collective security policy, of the "unclear ideology" of which M. Spaak's statements sound like an obituary notice.

As late as the middle of August the "Temps" took the view that a neutralisation of Belgium would form a barrier preventing France from assisting her eastern allies in case of unprovoked aggression and that the return of Belgium to such a policy destroys the entire defensive system of France and her allies which is approved by England—in other and clearer words that France will still try, whatever formulae may be used, to regard Belgium as a territory of deployment and military operations; this fact may have strengthened the desire in Brussels ultimately to clear up the situation on the basis of the offer made by Adolf Hitler on January 30th. The diplomatic negotiations on this subject then led on October 13th, 1937 to the German-Belgian exchange of notes—in the same form as the Franco-British declaration—the origin and purpose of which were commented on the same day by two official communications published at Berlin and Brussels.

It is an important contribution to the maintenance of peace, said the Foreign Minister, M. Spaak, in speaking to press representatives of the new German declaration of guarantee. At a time when diplomacy is moving in a circle, the German step merits all the more international consideration and appreciation.

While it awakened great satisfaction in Brussels—apart from a few Marxist and Chauvinistic papers under French influence—and was warmly approved in Rome—from which a similar offer was made to Belgium on March 18th, 1937—the well known chorus of cynics in Paris immediately pointed out a whole series of “unclear points” and, as usual under such circumstances, disseminated misinterpretations and incriminations against Germany. It would indeed have been remarkable if the German-Belgian agreement had been everywhere accepted in the spirit in which it was concluded and without the usual intrigues. The “Temps”, however, in a lengthy and somewhat involved article full of small pinpricks, of October 14th, was nevertheless compelled to admit that the German declaration constituted an important political action for the reinforcement of peace in Western Europe and represented a valuable step forward. In London, certain newspapers prefer to be silent when they have reason to recognise German achievements. The Times alone was an exception and wrote on the “German Pledge” as follows on October 14th:

“Belgium has now been given almost all that King Leopold asked for her exactly a year ago. In April of this year the British and French Governments duly released Belgium from the guarantees which she had freely given, and declared that they would respect Belgian integrity themselves and would still defend it against all aggression. At the same time, in April, the hope was widely expressed that Germany would give a similar guarantee. That guarantee has now been made in the most explicit manner possible... There can be no doubt that the German declaration is a step in the right direction. Every move which brings appeasement in even a small area is to be welcomed; and already the German move has lessened the tension almost continuous during the past few years between Belgium and Germany. Taken at its best, the declaration brings a new element of security into north-western Europe, and it will be approved by all who believe that peace must be sought by instalments. The relief of tension anywhere must be a contribution to that process. An assurance has been given which is of importance not only to Belgium but to Britain and France. Belgium has certainly every reason to be well satisfied with the whole declaration; she feels her position to be strengthened. And the people of this country, pledged to defend Belgium, have also reason to welcome a declaration which balances the British at almost every point.”

It appears to us that Baldwin's remark about the “British Rhine frontier” has lost its meaning: England can now calmly relegate the Belgian “section of the Front” to a back seat. Not only because Belgium no longer wishes to be a ground of deployment or transit for England, but because the security of England has also been considerably increased by the Belgian guarantee, and her “fear” that a Great Power might control the opposite coast of the Channel has been removed by the declaration of October 13th.

* * *

On October 20th and 21st the German-Belgian exchange of notes was the subject of two interpellations in the Belgian Senate and Chamber of Deputies. The debate again showed that the German declaration was almost unanimously welcomed and approved. M. Spaak, whose statements were greeted with loud applause, again stressed the importance of the declaration, and in reply to a question regarding Belgian counter-obligations said that Belgium had assumed none. Belgium had had nothing to refuse to Germany, as Germany had demanded nothing. The German reservations were, moreover, quite justified.

Interesting statements were made by Count Carton de Wiart, a Catholic deputy, who said:

“We have noted with satisfaction the declaration made on October 13th and can congratulate ourselves upon it. It forms the third wind of a triptych, to which one or more wings may still be added... Moreover, until the League of Nations has placed on Article 16 of the Covenant the interpretation demanded by the Scandinavian countries in their note of August 20th, 1936, we know by the statements made here that Belgium will never tolerate a passage of troops through her territory which is not the result of her own independent and sovereign decision.

As regards indivisible peace, we regard this expression as a catchword open to many misunderstandings. If the meaning of international solidarity is not to be misconstrued, it is dangerous and false to assert that every war must draw us into its machinery. On the contrary, we will oppose every ideological undertaking that might bring us into conflicts if our interests are not directly concerned.

It is not that we are indifferent to universal peace. On the contrary we regard the declaration of October 13th as a really important element of appeasement.”

Lastly, the former War Minister, Dèveze, published an article in “Le Soir” in reply to certain criticisms of the German declaration. He said:

“It is said to be a further scrap of paper in the over-full archives of our diplomacy. This remark would be justified if there was any question of our disarmament, or of the suspension or even slowing down of the complete execution of our national defence as decided upon.”

Dèveze went on to prove that the German text contained no ambiguities and required no interpretation. As regards those who suspect Germany because she made no reference to the League of Nations—of which she is not a Member—and who take the German reservation regarding the application of Article 16 by Belgium as a pretext for asking the Government whether they intended to break with the League or with collective security, Dèveze answered:

“Let us simply establish the fact that the declaration does not and cannot make any change in the legal question of Belgium. If Belgium is ever asked to apply Article 16, she will act according to her own counsel. She now knows without any doubt what would be the unavoidable result of her decision. Is there anything new in this? Certainly not. For it is foolish to imagine for a moment that a State will allow the passage of belligerents without the full intention of taking part in the war.”

* * *

No entangling alliances! That is the formula which expresses Belgian foreign policy since King Leopold's speech. On October 13th it was supported by an unshakable corner-stone which at the same time served to support European peace. From this a bridge could easily be built to the Western Pact. In his speech in the Reichstag on January 30th the Führer and Chancellor made the further statement that there could be no further “imaginable point of dispute”, between France and Germany.

The 13th of October, moreover, again confirmed the correctness of the principles of German foreign policy which he laid down in his Reichstag speech of May 17th, 1933 and which he has frequently stressed since that time, i.e. understanding on the basis of unconditional equality of rights, mutual respect for the vital conditions of the nations, settlement of outstanding questions not by the fallacy of collective security but within the limits of what is possible by the direct method between one State and another. For this is the only way to remove hindrances and to build up not only for the benefit of those directly concerned but also for the community.

The Work of the League of Nations

THE AUTUMN SESSION OF 1937

From September 13th to October 6th, 1937, the League of Nations held its Eighteenth Ordinary Assembly, which was opened by M. Negrin, the representative of Red Spain, as President of the simultaneous session of the Council and then presided over by the elected President, the Aga Khan, delegate of India. In accordance with the existing rules, three days before the Assembly met, i.e. on September 10th, the Council began its 98th session, which, after three non-permanent Members — Belgium, Iran and Peru — had been elected on September 29th, according to the rules of rotation, continued to sit in its 99th session at the same time as the Assembly.

This year's Assembly was not terminated during this session, but was adjourned at the request of the Eastern Asia Committee, and the President was empowered to convene the Assembly at any time, should this be demanded by the position in the Far East.

The main items on the agenda of these discussions were the conflict in the Far East, which in view of the unclear conditions of right and power is not regarded in any quarter as a state of war existing after a declaration of war, and the civil war in Spain.

The first question was dealt with by the Council and the Assembly, and by the Eastern Asia Committee (Committee of Twenty-Three) set up as far back as 1933. This Committee prepared two reports on the present position, which are mentioned in the text of the resolution subsequently drawn up by a smaller Sub-Committee of Thirteen and adopted by the Assembly. The Sino-Japanese conflict, as dealt with by the League of Nations, was divided up into three different groups of questions. The first to come up for discussion was the bombing of open towns, and a resolution was adopted containing a moral condemnation of such bombing on humanitarian grounds. In the second place, the Council, after discussion in the Financial Committee, granted a credit of two millions for the existing regular budget grants for material assistance to China with a view to organising the campaign against epidemics. Lastly, the conflict as a whole was discussed in respect of the military operations and treaty conditions, on the basis of China's appeal to Articles 10, 11 and 17 and in connection with the discussion in the Assembly and subsequently in the Political Committee (the so-called Sixth Committee) on the Secretary General's report. The really decisive discussions, however, for the drafting of the text of the resolution took place in a number of meetings of the Committee of Twenty-Three, which were for the most part secret.

By the unanimous adoption of a resolution on October 6th with two abstentions, Siam and Poland (the text of which is reproduced in this number under "Documents"), the treatment of the Far Eastern conflict by the League was for the time being concluded. By the reference in the resolution to the preparation of a meeting of the parties to the Nine-Power Treaty of Washington, it was to be assumed that the real political decisions in this matter would be taken outside the League.

With regard to the discussion on the Spanish civil war, the League was faced in particular by the five demands put forward in the Assembly by M. Negrin, President of the Valencia Government; special mention may be made of the demand for the establishment of aggression on Spain by Germany and Italy, and the demand for the withdrawal of foreign volunteers from National Spanish territory. The Spanish question also fell into three sections, although one of them did not directly concern the League. The first was the discussion in the Assembly and Sixth Committee, the only possible result and meaning of which was that, under the leadership of Soviet Russia, the real representative of Red Spain at Geneva, the Valencia representatives and certain Popular Front Governments created a well used platform in order to level offences and suspicions against "Fascism" and "Dictatorships", i.e. against Germany and Italy, so that these "negotiations" brought the League down to the level of the demagogic atmosphere of political meetings. In the second place, there were the Nyon negotiations on defence against submarine attacks on non-Spanish vessels in the Mediterranean, on which occasion Soviet Russia again did her best to sabotage the proceedings. Lastly in the Committee of Twenty-Three, the question of volunteers and the continuance of the London Non-Intervention Committee were discussed in detail with a view to preparing a resolution.

On October 2nd the Assembly rejected the draft resolution on Spain by two votes (Albania and Portugal) with 14 abstentions.

The League of Nations cannot register any rise in prestige as a result of these two debates. It was compelled to leave the settlement of these, the most important items on its agenda, to other international bodies, namely, the Spanish question to the London Non-Intervention Committee which has in the meantime again resumed its discussions, and the Far Eastern conflict to a conference of the parties to the Washington Nine-Power Treaty of 1922 which is to meet on November 4th at Brussels. These results might at first sight be interpreted as a proof of wise restraint, especially as in both cases the proposals to establish aggression failed. That this is not the case is eloquently shown by the circumstances which accompanied these "negotiations".

The text of the resolution on the Spanish question which was put to the vote in the Assembly was the result of a one-sided judgment of the events in Spain and contained expressions which obviously took account of the instincts of hatred on the part of the Soviet front in the League and gave satisfaction to these quarters. That the resolution was not accepted was not of decisive importance, for before this a vote was taken on the supplementary proposals of Hungary and Austria. The acceptance of these proposals would have implied in particular that the League of Nations shared the view that contingents of foreign volunteers in armed group formations were also fighting on the Red Spanish front; by rejecting them the League States, including France and the United Kingdom who state that they are endeavouring outside the League to assuage the international crisis created by the Spanish civil war, adopted the view of Red Spain and thus gave moral support to the violent speeches made on every possible occasion at the Assembly against Germany and Italy by the representatives of Valencia, Negrin and del Vayo, and their superior officer Litvinov. The dangerous flank attacks made by the Soviet representatives at various secret night meetings and the extent to which they succeeded in taking England and France by surprise are openly shown in the passage where the draft resolution goes over to threats and states that the end of the non-intervention policy must be considered "à bref délai" unless the non-Spanish fighters are to be immediately withdrawn.

The failure to establish the aggressor in the resolution on the Sino-Japanese conflict also does not give the conviction that it is a case of that restraint which is usually the sign of the master. Whatever interpretation may be placed on this failure, one consideration is of greater importance than any other: even League States are no longer convinced of the effectiveness of applying Article 16 and putting the sanctions machine into operation. Interest in sanctions can at the present time only be felt by States which regard a new World War as a way out of their own "impasse". In the case of China, however, there are Members of the League whose interests in the Far East are so important that they cannot afford a definite breach with Japan. A sanctions war against Japan would have merely brought such countries a fresh source of trouble, i.e. a free hand for Soviet Russia in Asia. In this discussion too Soviet Russia played the part of "protector of the principles of the Covenant" while torpedoing those principles in a neighbouring Committee room. In these negotiations, the League States also adopted reports and a resolution in which the influence of Litvinov can be traced.

These discussions on questions of high politics, in view of their results, do not show that the League of Nations has any practical political value for the settlement of important conflicts; on the other hand the purely theoretical discussions at this Assembly have not restored the lost confidence in the League. For instance, the discussions on the problem of raw materials, on disarmament and on the question of universality strengthen the view that the League of Nations in its present form is an institution which was originally started by the creation of a new international law based on the law of the victors and that it proceeded from this to weave a further network of treaties the main aim of which was to strengthen those articles which safeguarded the advantages and possessions acquired, and that the present tactical position to a great extent consists in regarding as a disturber of the peace anyone who tries to remedy obvious mistakes and dangers in the system erected in 1919 and to find new ways for definitely liquidating the Great War.

The problem of raw materials at this year's Assembly apparently called for the special attention of the League. An outer sign of this was that one day the delegates and journalists were to be seen moving busily about the corridors of the Secretariat with two fine purple booklets which were said to contain the last word on the problem of raw materials. They were the final report of the Raw Materials Committee of the League and its supplement, the memorandum by Professor Ivar Högbom on the development of world production of raw materials. It is sufficient in the present short summary to note that the Committee's report refers to the financial difficulties of certain industrial countries which are obliged to develop their production under pressure of a growing population, though they lack certain essential raw materials. In this connection the question is raised as to how far the difficulties of such countries are a result of their financial, economic and armaments policy. The report points out that these difficulties would be less, if the countries used their resources for productive purposes and that, on the other hand, the movement of capital to these countries would be more favourable if serious obstacles were not constituted by the fear that the loaned capital might be used for anything but pacific purposes. Another conclusion—which the press regarded as a surprising result—is the one relating to the comparatively small importance of colonial raw materials in the total raw materials of the world. "A calculation, which necessarily can only be a rough one, seems to indicate that, including production both for domestic consumption and for export, the total present production of all commercially important raw materials in all colonial territories is no more than about 3 % of world production". The report also examines the complaints and difficulties experienced with regard to the supply of raw materials and their acquisition and payment. It considers that the only general and permanent solution of the problem of commercial access to raw materials is to be found in a restoration of international exchanges on the widest basis. According to the report, the difficulties of supplying certain raw materials, though increased by the heavy expenditure on armaments, also applies to countries possessing sufficient supplies of foreign exchange. But it continues, if countries which do not dispose of a large amount of foreign exchange use it for raw materials primarily for purposes of armaments, they may well have difficulty in obtaining the raw materials required for normal purposes. The Committee points out that these difficulties would immediately be alleviated if a political settlement were forthcoming which would permit countries to reduce their present armament expenditure.

During the discussion in the Second Committee, these conclusions met with the approval of most delegates. In the Assembly itself the problem of raw materials was also repeatedly interpreted in this sense. In particular the British Foreign Secretary based himself on this report. In view of the statement that the production of raw materials in the colonies only amounted to 3 % of world production, Mr. Eden drew the conclusion that the problem of raw materials was not primarily or even essentially a colonial problem.

This League discussion showed that raw materials are at the present time in the real sense of the word latent war material. This conclusion can without exaggeration be carried still further, for the comments of the international press on this subject has sufficiently exploited the view that the demand for raw materials involves a danger of war and that those who are so violently demanding raw materials are disturbing the peace.

Since the War, what reasons have not already been put forward as a danger to world peace? At one time it was the demand that the highly armed victor States should disarm, at another time it was the demand for the revision of the Treaty of Versailles, later it was the desire for the revision of the League Covenant, and at present it is the demand for raw materials by the countries which lack them.

The question arises as to what is the use to the countries lacking in raw materials of the activity of the League as a statistical seminary, if the facts are overlooked and no concrete proposals can be made. When the final report of the Raw Materials Committee speaks of the fear which can only be removed by political appeasement—an argument that is not new although Mr. Eden again took it up—the fear of war, the roots of which are found to be the international economic crisis, should justly include the question of countries which experience a fear of poverty and therefore also of social political distress. It sounds very significant when representatives of colonial Empires state that the problem of raw materials is not a colonial problem. In reply to this it must be said that countries lacking in raw materials would in any case draw very much more from colonies than countries which are rich in colonies, and even for the latter the lack of three percent of the total world production of raw materials would presumably cause considerable embarrassment. On the other hand, the final report of the Raw Materials Committee pointed out the dilemma which exists between lack of raw materials and poverty in foreign exchange. The only solution for this is regarded primarily as political appeasement. Is this not a path that the League has often taken before, and does it not merely imply putting the cart before the horse? The entanglement of the disarmament problem by the same method has shown clearly enough where it leads. First security, then disarmament! That was the catchword at the time. With regard to the problem of raw materials, the catchword is now: first disarmament, then economic prosperity. Here again, the question must be put: is not the economic distress of the nations the cause of their fear, as a result of which misunderstandings lead to political tension and armaments develop in a vicious circle? The discussion on the problem of raw materials showed, among other things, that some representatives take this view. But agreement in theoretical views is far removed at Geneva from the bridging of great existing interests, and the fact that the problem of raw materials is at present being dealt with by the League of Nations provides no certainty that it is not so much a question of finding a way out as possibly of taking the wind out of the sails of the demand for colonies.

This Assembly of the League even had a discussion on disarmament. We will revert in greater detail to the "development" of this work.

The Third Committee, which was revived by last year's Assembly, seemed at first as if it would have to be content with somewhat cavalier treatment, as it was not originally intended to convene it. Finally two meetings were accorded for this subject, as there are still League delegates who regard the execution of Article 8 as one of the most important tasks of the League.

It was like a fairy tale of olden times when, on a sunny afternoon the delegates entering the committee room included so many of the old warriors of the fight for disarmament and rearmament in the deceased General Commission—Aghnides, Boncour, Bourquin, Komarnicki, Lange, Politis, Rütgers, Sandler—names representing programmes and names with which draft disarmament plans are connected.

In the view of the Chairman of the Bureau, M. Politis, the Disarmament Conference is not dead, as superficial persons declare. Whether the Disarmament Conference is dead or not is at bottom a political question. The possible future candidate for the presidential chair of this Conference (should it ever be reopened), M. Politis, pointed this out in the same speech with refreshing sincerity for the benefit of those who have lost all faith in a just settlement of this question within the framework of the League of Nations. In view of the sense of dizziness which M. Politis felt at the present expenditure on armaments, he said: "Certain States imagine that they can withdraw from international legality in order to carry out their intentions". Everyone is aware that M. Politis was not thinking of the Barthou note of April 17th, 1934, nor of the £180,000,000 which the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden mentioned in the Assembly a few days earlier for his country, nor even of the £1,500,000,000 which, according to a previous statement by Mr. Eden, the British taxpayer must now pay because M. Barthou did not accept the British, Italian and German offers. We know what M. Politis, Greek Minister in Paris and Professor at the Sorbonne, was thinking of in referring to "certain States".

Just as in the problem of raw materials and the question of disarmament no advance was made beyond purely theoretical discussions, just as in these two problems there were no signs of courageous decisions in the sphere of practical politics and attempt were made in some quarters to turn them into political questions, there was no advance in the treatment of a group of questions for which the League had set up a special committee in view of the complete failure of sanctions. We refer to the question of the reform of the League, or—as the word "reform" approaches too closely to the word "revision" to which such objection is taken at Geneva—the question of the application of the principles of the Covenant; the committee in question was the Committee of Twenty-Eight which the optimists had originally and wrongly described as the "Committee for the Reform of the League of Nations".

The Committee was faced by a mass of reports: a report on regional pacts of mutual assistance—Rapporteur, Paul-Boncour (France); a report on Article 10 of the Covenant—Rapporteur, Nasrollah Entezam (Iran); a report on Article 11 of the Covenant—Rapporteur, Undén (Sweden); a report on Article 16 of the Covenant—Rapporteur, Rutgers (Netherlands); a report on regional or continental organisation of the League of Nations—Rapporteur, Boris Stein (Soviet Union); a report on the coordination of the League Covenant with the Pact of Paris and the Argentine Pact—Rapporteur, Pardo (Argentina), and two reports on the participation of all States in the League of Nations and on the cooperation of the League with Non-Member States—Rapporteur, Lord Cranborne (United Kingdom).

None of these reports were really discussed at the session of the Committee of Twenty-Eight during the Assembly. On the other hand, during this period the Committee engaged in what may be termed a remarkable discussion. It will be remembered that last year Chile proposed that the League of Nations should examine the question of its cooperation with Non-Members. The Assembly stated at the time that it was still too early to consider this proposal. Chile brought the same proposal before this year's Assembly, together with a second proposal on the universality of the League. On the other hand, this year the Argentine proposed that the League should decide that, in case of war or the danger of war, it would immediately take steps to get into touch with States non-Members of the League. The remarkable feature of the discussion was not so much the acceptance by the Assembly as the determination with which Chile and the Argentine, supported by the vast majority of the South American Members of the League, expressed themselves on these fundamental questions in the Assembly and the Committee of Twenty-Eight. On the other hand, it was equally remarkable to observe the determined opposition of certain Members, under the leadership of Soviet Russia, to these proposals. We have already referred briefly to similar tendencies in other questions, but more violent expression was given in this case to the interest taken by certain Members of the League in preventing the cooperation of the League with non-Member States. Apart from the lip service which even these States render to universality or to the widest possible cooperation, it was possible to draw the conclusion from more than one speech in this discussion that they were really only anxious to impose their own dictatorship on the League. It was only necessary to follow the echo of this discussion in the international left-wing press which indulged in recriminations against the Chilean delegate—who, it was stated, was thinking of Germany—in order to realise the demagogical methods with which for instance, Soviet Russia succeeded in turning upside down the principles of the League Covenant. The proceedings in the Committee also showed that, to some extent in a concealed manner but also in some ways quite openly, the discussion on the universality of the League, under the leadership of the Soviets, was converted into a discussion for combating and excluding Germany and Italy. Litvinov's tactics of obstruction in this case failed of their object. But that is not a matter of essential importance. Here also, in connection with a question in which the dissension between the States Members is constantly growing, the Soviet Union carried on its destructive work with the object of creating a front within the League. The "Neue Zürcher Zeitung" of September 27th, wrote: "The opponents of the Chilean plan, who would have been glad to make the League a happy hunting-ground of the adherents of the ideology of the Popular Front, did everything they could under the leadership of the inevitable M. Litvinov to prevent an objective discussion of M. Edward's proposals. When the noiseless method of 'procedure', the difficulties of which are used to stifle inconvenient suggestions, proved in this case not to be sufficiently effective, recourse was even had to personal incriminations against the Chilean delegate."

The only "abstention" in the vote on the Chilean resolution was Soviet Russia. There is no lack of irony in these proceedings, when one remembers the remark made by Litvinov in the speech preceding the vote. He recalled the abstentions and negative votes on the Spanish resolution two days earlier. Those who abstain or give negative votes are in the Soviet view enemies of the League if they do not support M. Litvinov's proposals. In the case of the Spanish resolution this charge referred for instance to the following countries: the Union of South Africa, the Argentine, Austria, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Chile, Cuba, Hungary, Irish Free State, Panama, Peru, Switzerland, Uruguay and Venezuela. These countries include some who have undoubtedly done the League greater service than the new Member, Soviet Russia, who only discovered her League soul, or rather the possibilities of propaganda offered by the Geneva platform, in 1934. These countries include some whose love and pity for unhappy Spain is certainly more sincere than the objects pursued by Moscow with its policy of intervention in the Spanish civil war.

The opposition of the medium and smaller States showed on this occasion that the Soviet Union—which undoubtedly stood behind the attacks of the Valencia representatives, Negrin and Del Vayo—cannot always misuse the platform of the League for its propaganda. Many of them have for a long time been tired of merely endorsing the compromises strung together by the Great Powers and their satellites behind closed doors. The rejection of the re-election of Red Spain in the Council, which was decided on September 20th by 29 out of 52 States, may in any case be regarded as a defeat for the influence of Moscow.

What general comments may be made on this League Assembly of 1937? In drawing up a sort of balance-sheet, certain tendencies and facts arise which may be rightly called a crisis of the League. Among these may be mentioned in particular the stubborn attempt of certain Members to lead the League into steps the political effect of which would cause still further political tension in the international relations of the peoples. Then again, the urgent demand of a number of Members of the League, in particular the Latin American States, for the cooperation of the League with non-Member States might be regarded as a movement within the League which is no longer purely theoretical in character but has reached a phase in which these Members are determined to reconsider their further cooperation with the League, if cooperation with non-Member States remains merely on paper. On the other hand, in the discussions a tendency opposed to "universality" was expressed more or less sharply and with more or less propaganda to the effect that all international negotiations and treaties outside the League might in the view of certain Members of the League lead to a new World War. The obstructionist tactics of the Soviet representatives and their satellites must be regarded not so much as a tendency as a fact, and their object is no other than to hinder that cooperation. Lastly it must be regarded as a crisis of the League of Nations that at present as in the past the solution of important political conflicts by the League must be subordinated to the solutions arrived at by the other international organs outside the League.

As regards the League crisis, the French Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, does not believe in it. In his view it is a peace crisis. But in saying this, does he not confirm the League crisis? Is it not being recognised that the will for peace of states which for various reasons decline cooperation with the League is as sincere and decisive as that of the Members of the League? The League of Nations is not required to provide ideal solutions. For this, in all the political conflicts with which it has had to deal, the vital interests of the Members are too much at stake. But it is this consideration of political realities by the Members of the League that should prevent them from calumniating or causing others to calumniate other nations and other governments which do not possess membership of the League. It proves nothing when certain States, solely on the basis of their membership, have for years begun their speeches with the words: "Chacun de vous connaît bien l'attachement de mon gouvernement à la cause de la paix." and have then gone on to speak of the "pays belliqueux" or to reduce the League to a party and to endeavour to play off the idea of democracy against the idea of dictatorship. Germany can make the same claim to her attachment to the cause of peace, with this difference that she not only affirms it in speeches but has also proved by deeds so that tranquillity and a reduction of tension have been introduced in the endangered parts of Europe. In five short years the policy of the Führer has created conditions serving the cause of general peace with Poland, Austria, Belgium and in the sphere of naval armaments, such as have not been achieved by the League in fifteen years and have not, it is true, been attempted by the requisite means and methods.

When in the present year, at the instance of a part of the international press, the word is sent out like a blast of trumpets with innumerable echoes through the marble halls of the new League building: outside the Covenant there is only war!—it is overlooked that the League itself is a child of war and that its parents, as victors, once created conditions which did not show the same conscientiousness in dealing with the right of self-determination of the nations as is shown today in appealing to the sanctity of treaties and to the maintenance of certain principles of the Covenant such as Articles 10 and 11 one of which guarantees the inviolability of the territorial "status quo" laid down in the Paris Treaties while the other, in anticipation of the future, makes a revision of these treaties almost impossible. These articles 10 and 11 were also the subject of special reports. But any expectation of special progress in this direction was doomed to disappointment. A glance at these reports is sufficient to demonstrate clearly the vast difference in conception between the words "reform of the League" and "application of the principles of the Covenant". When one also remembers the interpretation placed by another report on Article 16, and by a further report on regional pacts of mutual assistance, it will be realised that international cooperation has entirely lost its meaning for some States if it is assumed in theory that the slag of the Versailles Treaty will some day be removed from the League Covenant. Some Members, in particular New Zealand and Chile, at this year's Assembly moreover strongly urged the necessity of a separation of the Covenant from the Versailles Treaty. A special Legal Committee was even appointed immediately after the beginning of the discussion in connection with this object. The Legal Committee issued a report on this question during the Assembly. We will revert later to this report which in view of its conclusions may be termed a masterpiece of subterfuge and of evasion of the main question by means of all the arts of legal sophistry. But we may already express our concurrence with the view of the Roumanian delegate M. Pella who, though certainly no adherent of such separation, observed in the discussion on this report that it was very unfortunate to speak of the work of the Legal Committee as if it referred to a separation of the League Covenant from the Peace Treaties—and Professor Pella, as an expert on international law, should know what he is talking about.

The aggregate result of the XVIIIth Assembly of the League of Nations is resolutions which left everybody dissatisfied, draft resolutions which would have been dangerous, a bunch of reports some of which express hopes and expectations which would make one wish to cry: it is too good to be true; further reports which do not give the conviction that the League of Nations desires to give up its old ways. The cooperation of the nations is still to be kept in the fetters of 1919, when it was desired by means of insane frontier demarcations and provisions to stipulate exactly which way each nation must go. This way should necessarily lead to a new and freer movement of the nations who were suppressed and crippled at that time. At present we are living in the midst of those struggles for freedom which, in contradistinction to the principles and ideas preached at that time, are now described by the former peace-makers as attempts to disturb the peace. The League of Nations has also placed its forum at the disposal of this dangerous tendency. This is in contradiction with its achievements which in this year again have scarcely amounted to more than the ignoring of actual causes and connections and a further evasion of concrete conclusions which can no longer be shelved.

The League of Nations stands like a mirage in the sight of mankind. At certain times it rises in a current of hopes which are generally found to be bitter disappointments after the meetings have been held. Reports are shot up like fireworks in dazzling colours as if to penetrate the night that surrounds the relations of the peoples, in order again to disappear in the night as rapidly as they arose. For these reports contain none of the sacrifices which must be made by the States organised at Geneva on the altar of peace, if the League is to fulfil its meaning and object of promoting the cooperation of the nations and of safeguarding international peace in order that justice may rule.

PALAIS DES NATIONS

The Headquarters of the League

Its almost startling whiteness rises amid the dark tree-tops of the famous Ariana Park, a gift of Gustave Revilliod to his native city, the greater part of which the latter proceeded on September 25th, 1928 to turn over to the League. A year later, on September 7th, 1929, a stormy, showery autumn day, the foundation stone was laid, the ceremony lasting only a few brief minutes. On September 6th, 1933 the company assembled to celebrate its inauguration. A long train of high officials of the League, representatives of the States Members of the League and of the world Press, and notables of the city of Geneva proceeded slowly like a funeral cortège through the still unfinished building. Even in the inauguration speeches echoes of doubt and anxiety made themselves heard. For down below in the old "Crystal Palace" the struggle of the Disarmament Conference was raging, and in the world outside the competition between the already armed Powers was busy digging the grave of one of the noblest ideals of the League of Nations and the international Peace movement. The young dreams which it was still possible to dream, when Briand and Stresemann wielded the silver hammer at the laying of the foundation stone in 1929, had now dissolved into thin air. Still the work went on; and in February 1936 the Secretariat began to move into its new premises. In September the Council was able for the first time to meet in the new "Palace"; and in September of the present year, the vast Assembly Hall, though not quite completed, was ready for the session of the Assembly.

On September 25th, the Aga Khan, the President of this year's Assembly, gave a reception for the opening of the Assembly Building—a magnificent celebration from the Arabian Nights. There was a concert and dance, and lavish buffets laden with pyramids of the choicest food, with batteries of two thousand bottles of the best champagne. "Le congrès s'amuse". The Spaniards and Chinese excused themselves. The thunder of the guns on the Manzanares and the Yantsekiang, the rattle of machine-guns and the din of bursting shells, it is true, were hardly in harmony with this representative demonstration, which it might have been better to avoid—at any rate in these surroundings and to this extent.

The old temporary premises on the banks of the Lake are a thing of the past. The new mammoth erection on the Ariana heights looks down contemptuously on its petty predecessor. The latter, in view of the glut of hotel accommodation already prevailing in Geneva, is not to revert, as had originally been intended, to its former functions of a hotel, but is to provide quarters for the offices and conferences of international associations.

* * *

So there it stands, the Palais des Nations, the Palace of the Peoples, approached from the town by the new and splendidly laid out Avenue de la Paix. An artificial mountain of ferro-concrete, 400,000 cubic metres of it, covering an area of 18,000 square metres of ground. Circumference 2 kilometres : frontages of 400 metres each. Facing of stone, with rows of windows, the effect of which in successive layers of stories is designed for the view from a distance. The impression from a distance was presumably felt by the architect to be more important than the impression at close quarters, which is that rather of the big cold offices of some huge commercial concern. It is not till we come to the central building with its vast dimensions (76 by 55 metres and a height of 35 metres), the tastefully laid-out gardens of which form a harmonious whole with the rare old trees of the Ariana Park, that the sober design springs into life. It stands back in crescent shape, carried on ten broad, tall columns. Here is the "Cour d'honneur". A powerful open staircase leads up to the "Salle principale", from which there is a superb view to right and left across the Lake of Geneva in the foreground to the Alps of Savoy in the background with Mont Blanc towering in impressive splendour in the far distance. The view extends as one mounts the many steps or numerous lifts to the restaurant on the breezy heights of the roof.

Designs were submitted by 370 architects, from whom five were ultimately selected to carry out the work. For "five" read "one". The magic formula, well tried in political connections in Geneva, found an application this time in the sphere of art. A compromise was concluded, and the plans of the French architect Nenot, which had been awarded the first prize, were adopted with the inclusion of other ideas from the designs of the other prize-winners.

Perhaps the biggest architectural effort of the present age, the realisation in symbolic form of the world peace conception of Immanuel Kant and the dreams and desires of Humanity, it might have been an achievement to kindle the imagination. But that was not to be. The combined efforts of so much talent could produce results which technically were of the first order; but the architectural achievement was purely academic. Once again it was made plain that it is the Spirit which creates its own Form, and not the Form the Spirit. This League of Nations of bargains and ingenious "formulae", when expressed—at a cost of over 30 millions of gold Swiss francs—in steel and concrete, could not be other than it is, a monster model of correctness, a marvel of technique but not of art. Its dimensions, as those who built and those who inhabit it are in the habit of announcing—not without a certain satisfaction, are almost exactly those of the Chateau de Versailles. The magnificence of the latter (between which and the "ad hoc" premises which house the present League of Nations there is really no comparison) is the expression of the unbridled imaginings and lust of aggrandisement of the Roi Soleil. Is the precedent ominous? The future alone can show. Are the Powers who have rough-hewn the League to suit their own desires and interests, and in the process have erected this colosseum on a foundation of crumbling soil, still capable of learning from past mistakes? If they are, the new Palace of the Peoples may yet develop that magic power which is needed, if a new spirit is to be called into being in the relations of the peoples. If they are not, the Palace can have no other destiny than to become a museum of lost hopes, a standing memorial of frustrated aspirations.

A museum? Every day this summer hundreds of passing travellers and holiday-makers have made their way to the white palace, paid their half-franc, and been conducted by huissiers in blue uniform, highly conscious of their own importance, through this labyrinth of the peoples. Confusing as the ways of the League are the ways that lead through its palace. Hundreds and hundreds without end of uniform doors on five stories hide the 450 offices of the Secretariat. Here is the "Salle des pas perdus". Here the various Committee Rooms. And, finally, the Holy of Holies of the League, the Assembly Hall with its special building forming the centre of the entire construction. It rises on an almost square plan (42 by 44 metres) to a height of 20 metres and has 1541 seats without including those on the platform and the accommodation for the verbatim reporters. The ground floor has 240 seats for delegates. On three sides there are galleries for the secretaries and experts of the delegates with 276 seats, above these the "diplomatic box" with 179 seats, the press gallery with 438 seats, and finally above these the public gallery with 408 seats. The hall makes a serious and solid impression which it is to be hoped will not be spoiled by the four vast pictures with various symbolic representations of peace which are still to be presented by the French Government. The Council Chamber is furnished and decorated on wall and ceiling (like the neighbouring Committee and other rooms) by the different States Members, and affords an interesting insight into their decorative art. The walls and ceiling of the Council Chamber are covered with colossal allegorical pictures by the Spanish painter Sert. The motives are taken from the history of Mankind. Three of them represent Progress and the blessings of technical Science, the liberation of Man from feudal service and slavery, and the successful combating of plagues and diseases. Two other pictures show conquerors and conquered. The conquerors are portrayed bowed by the sacrifices of lives which the victory has cost them. The conquered are shown collapsing under the burdens which defeat has brought, and thinking of retaliation. The motive of the last of the five pictures is "Pourquoi pas?" It represents two huge guns on which a woman holds up a child in her arms, while on each side the combatants and their wives and mothers run to meet one another with joy and relief in their faces. The beginnings of a new age are indicated in the colossal fresco, which shows five giant male figures representing the five continents who hold out their hands to one another in collaboration.

"Pourquoi pas?" Why not? Why not the liberation of mankind from that greatest of all scourges, War? A mute question—not least for those who gather every year time after time beneath these pictures, for those in whose power it lay to make this act of liberation, had they honestly and sincerely desired so to do.

Filled with the earnest thoughts which a visit to the Council Chamber cannot fail to awaken, the visitor is conducted to the Film Room. He is shown a landscape of innumerable war graves, such as are scattered over the whole world as memorials of the last war. This is the introduction to the League film. An invisible voice at the same time recites the preamble to the Covenant of the League. He is then shown the Secretary General, M. Avenol, and other high officials of the League, with pictures to illustrate the daily work of the Secretariat and the different Sections.

The idea is not merely to show the visitor the technical resources of the League, but also the achievements of the Sections which deal with problems of international law, minorities, mandates, disarmament, finance, economics, intellectual co-operation, communications and transit, health, the trade in dangerous drugs, traffic in women and children and the like.

All these Sections of the Secretariat, with the corresponding standing Committees of the League, have come into being in connection with the functions imposed on the League by Articles 23, 24 and 25. But the exercise of these functions does not place the League in a position of itself to solve any of the economic, social, humanitarian or cultural problems concerned. The importance of these Sections and Committees should not under these circumstances be overrated. The work they do is mainly preparatory in character, involving no obligations for anyone. They advise the Council and Assembly of the League, and place the requisite documentary material at their disposal. This applies to all except the Bureau of the Disarmament Conference, the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Minorities Section whose function it is to supervise and enforce the execution of obligations incurred by States Members of the League under the Covenant—in which task unfortunately, as experience shows, they have not had much success. It is just these three organisations which have least to show in the way of satisfactory results. All prospects of disarmament have definitively collapsed: the Mandates Commission has long since failed in its task; and, in spite of the Minorities Section, there are more human beings groaning under the yoke of foreign rule in this age of the League than has been the case for centuries. As for the other functions of the Sections and Committees, a great many of them were already being exercised by international bodies, i.e. by offices set up by international conventions, before the League was established; and many of these international bodies were able to show quicker results, wherever there was a common desire for such on the part of the individual Governments concerned.

The scepticism with which the visitor views the pictures thrown on the screen reaches the point of repugnance, when the Head of the Political Section is shown unfolding with particular deliberation a bundle of documents labelled "Disarmament", "Japan and China", "Italy and Abyssinia", "Bolivia and Paraguay" with other political issues on which the League was found wanting.

The last picture shown on the screen is that of the sympathetic Belgian Premier, van Zeeland, who pleads for the League and the cause of international co-operation.

One last look at the mighty Library building, to the erection of which Rockefeller contributed 2,000,000 dollars. That ends the personally conducted tour.

Dazzled with the glare of the sunshine reflected from the white walls, the visitors leave the Palace. Some seem thoughtful: others laugh and make a noise as they go. They do not worry. They are delighted to be able to get their impressions fixed in the form of snapshots or picture postcards of the League.

It will not be long before they have forgotten the "Pourquoi pas?" of the painter Sert; and the impressions of the film will be over even sooner. In the pleasant surroundings of Geneva the picture of the graves will also soon vanish like a vision in the distance, and with it the memory of that voice which reminded them of the ideals of the League still awaiting fulfilment.

* * *

"Pourquoi pas?" Why are these ideals further from fulfilment today than they were at the time when the cry for them rose to heaven from tortured human hearts, from blood-stained battlefields, in the passionate prayers of millions of the living and as a last legacy of innumerable dead?

To that question neither the stone walls of the Palace nor the film of the League have any answer to give. The answer is to be found in the files and documents which slumber in the archives of the League—dumb witnesses, but all the more incorruptible for that, of the League's tragedy as also of the reply to the further question as to how it came about.

I. BELGIUM'S FIGHT FOR HER INDEPENDENCE

The Exchange of Notes of March 6th, 1936 regarding the Amendment of the Belgo-French Military Convention of September 7th, 1930.

Identical Notes of March 6th, 1936 exchanged between the Belgian Prime Minister, M. van Zeeland, and the French Ambassador in Brussels, M. Laroche.

Brussels, March 6th, 1936.

Monsieur le Ministre (Monsieur l'Ambassadeur),

By the Notes exchanged on September 10th and 15th, 1920 between the Premier and Foreign Minister of France on the one hand and the Premier of Belgium on the other hand, the Government of the French Republic and the Government of His Majesty the King of the Belgians gave their consent to the Military Convention signed on September 7th, 1920. The 1920 Agreement had the object, according to the notes exchanged between the two Governments and registered at Geneva, of reinforcing the guarantees of peace and security arising out of the League Covenant. It ensured the technical conditions for military cooperation between France and Belgium in case of unprovoked aggression on the part of Germany.

In 1925 an agreement was concluded at Locarno which provides the guarantees agreed upon in 1920 in a more complete and unequivocal manner. This agreement was concluded by the President of the Republic (His Majesty the King of the Belgians) and adopted by the Chambers.

This agreement represents one of the essential elements of the international status of Belgium, and the obligations which it lays down, together with those of the League Covenant are the only obligations of guarantee and assistance binding France and Belgium.

It need not be stated that both Governments are more than ever determined to remain faithful to these undertakings.

In military matters the 1920 Agreement, in addition to general provisions regarding contact between the two General Staffs, contained special provisions regarding the left bank of the Rhine.

Recognising that certain parts of this agreement are obsolete, the two Governments have realised the necessity of retaining only the part which is still of value, namely their mutual agreement. At the present time they attach importance to maintaining the contact between the General Staffs in order to carry out the undertakings contained in the Rhineland Pact of Locarno, and also in order to study the technical conditions for carrying out these undertakings.

It is understood that such contact cannot lead to any undertaking of a political nature nor any obligation with regard to the organisation of national defence for either of the interested parties.

I have the honour to confirm to Your Excellency the agreement of the French (Belgian) Government with the above provisions.

I have the honour etc.

(Signed) LAROCHE
(VAN ZEELAND)

The Anglo-French Declaration of Guarantee of April 24th, 1937,

In accordance with instructions received from their respective Governments, his Majesty's Ambassador and the French Ambassador have the honour to make the following communication to the Belgian Government :

(1) The Governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of the French Republic have not failed during the last few months to give their full attention to the desire of the Belgian Government to have the international rights and obligations of Belgium clarified in certain respects where this is rendered necessary by her geographical position and by the delays which may still occur before the negotiation and conclusion of the general act intended to replace the Treaty of Locarno.

(2) The Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Republic, being anxious to give full expression to their sympathy with this desire of the Belgian Government, have agreed to make the following declaration :

(3) The said Governments have taken note of the views which the Belgian Government has itself expressed concerning the interests of Belgium, and more particularly :

(1) the determination expressed publicly and on more than one occasion by the Belgian Government : (a) to defend the frontiers of Belgium with all its forces against any aggression or invasion, and to prevent Belgium territory from being used, for purposes of aggression against another State, as a passage or as a base of operations by land, by sea, or in the air ; (b) to organize the defence of Belgium in an efficient manner for this purpose ;

(2) the renewed assurance of the fidelity of Belgium to the Covenant of the League of Nations and to the obligations which it involves for Members of the League.

(4) In consequence, taking into account the determination and assurance mentioned above, the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Republic declare that they consider Belgium to be now released from all obligations towards them resulting from either the Treaty of Locarno or the arrangements drawn up in London on March 19th, 1936, and that they maintain in respect of Belgium the undertakings of assistance which they entered into towards her under the above-mentioned instruments.

(5) The Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Republic agree that the release of Belgium from her obligations, as provided for in paragraph 4 above, in no way affects the existing undertakings between the United Kingdom and France.

The Belgian Foreign Minister's Reply of April 24th, 1937.

The Government of His Majesty the King has taken note with great satisfaction of the declaration made to it this day by the Government of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland and the Government of the French Republic, for which it expresses its cordial thanks.

Extract from the Speech by M. Spaak, Belgian Foreign Minister, in the Belgian Chamber, on April 29th, 1937.

In his great speech in the Chamber on April 29th, 1937 the Foreign Minister, M. Spaak, again referred to the reasons which had caused Belgium in future to carry on an exclusively and purely Belgian policy. He then replied to the charge that, in so doing, Belgium was adopting an egoistic attitude and was lacking in loyalty to the principles of collective security and mutual assistance.

"But", he continued, "in order to understand each other, if we wish to penetrate to the truth of ideas, we must first overcome the obstacles created by mere words.

If collective security is an idea that implies that all States, whatever their importance, strength, traditions and geographical position, must take up the same attitude and subscribe to the same undertakings, if it means that the policy of Belgium must be identical with that of France, England or Germany, then I state that collective security is a mere vaporous ideology which will never lead to anything because it is profoundly contrary to realities and possibilities. But, if collective security means that, for the common well-being of all peoples and the organisation and maintenance of peace, each State must make the maximum effort, within its means, to fulfil its mission, then I agree with this, and I add that this is the position of Belgium; for the important matter is not the obligations undertaken but the obligations that are kept. And I again repeat that Belgium, by organising her national defence, by making a great military effort, by defending herself against any attack which may be directed against her and by taking upon herself the fearful dangers involved in this determination, is giving to Europe everything that Europe can legitimately demand of her.

This is the way in which England, France and Belgium have settled the obligations of the past among themselves.

I will now turn to the future.

The efforts made for months past will be continued. The Franco-British declaration leaves no doubt on this point. Precisely because the negotiations for preparing a Western Pact may still last a long time, an immediate solution of certain problems has been sought and found.

In these negotiations Belgium will play her part. The Government is well aware that its task will only be really finished when formulae have been found to which Germany can subscribe.

I have already stated what importance I attach to the last declaration of the German Chancellor; it was proof of a spirit which must be approved and it displayed possibilities which I would by no means abandon. The difficulties are not insuperable. The spirit in which they are approached is an essential factor of success or failure. The state of Europe is better to-day than six months ago, and the Franco-British declaration is a fresh element of appeasement.

The will for peace of most of the European statesmen is beyond doubt. It is necessary to have confidence.

We have reached the first stage. I am advancing with complete optimism to the next.

This completes the comments which I desired to make to the Chamber on the Franco-British declaration."

Turning to Article 16 and the question of General Staff discussions, M. Spaak continued:

"There are however two other problems which have not been touched upon in this declaration, about which I would like to say a few words, for I know they are occupying the attention of public opinion in Belgium and the rest of Europe. They are the interpretation of Article 16 of the League Covenant and the question of agreements among General Staffs.

My statement regarding Article 16 will be brief; for I am of opinion that it is for the Assembly of the League at Geneva to interpret the text officially. But in view of the present discussion, the Chamber will no doubt understand that the Minister of Foreign Affairs has no opinion or, if he has one, that he refuses to state it.

I therefore hope that what I have to say will help to clear up a problem which would ultimately be made even more confused and insoluble by exaggerated caution or exaggerated ingenuity. In this I am only following the example of the honourable Foreign Minister of the Netherlands who has just made important statements in the Netherlands parliament which call for our entire attention.

The most important and delicate point in Article 16 appears to be the penultimate paragraph which deals with the right of transit:

'The Members of the League agree... that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the Members of the League which are co-operating to protect the covenants of the League.'

When and how does such an obligation come into force?

It is very unusual and, I must confess, even somewhat alarming that such an important text, the application of which may have such serious consequences, is still left to the individual interpretation of each Member.

As far as the Belgian Government is concerned, the possible right of transit through the territory of our country is dependent on two essential conditions. The first is that the right to march through Belgium can in no case be imposed without her consent. The second is that such consent can only be given in connection with the carrying out of a common action.

It seems to me that these two conditions cannot be seriously contested.

The first condition is the only interpretation that is compatible with our complete sovereignty and also with our constitutional law.

I think it is superfluous to emphasise this fact, for it is quite clear.

The second condition, namely the existence of a common action, is derived from the text itself.

I certainly do not go so far as to state that common action requires the effective participation of all Members of the League, but it does require at any rate the participation of our neighbours.

These are the essential principles that I shall put forward at Geneva as soon as the question is raised.

As far as agreements between General Staffs are concerned, my answer will be clear. The Franco-British declaration of April 24th closes for us the period that may be called the period of military agreements, and I am glad of this.

On this point, however, a statement is necessary.

I am glad, not because these agreements were bad, but because, in spite of realities and in spite of the assurances repeated ten or twenty times by my predecessors, they were an element of confusion and distrust for us and for Europe.

Some of us regarded them as a proof of our dependence on one of our great neighbours. Others regarded them as an essential element of our national defence. Both these ideas were wrong.

Now that these military agreements no longer exist, I solemnly repeat that they were not political in character, that they did not affect the complete independence of our country, and that the spirit in which they were concluded remained the spirit in which they were applied.

But what is the position now?

The merit of the Franco-British declaration, as I have already said and again repeat, is that it sets matters right.

At the present time there is for us only one reason for a possible war: national defence.

This justifies me in stating that the military problems with which the responsible authorities are dealing are now freed from all superfluous complications, with which they were burdened by our former guarantees.

This simplified problem is now only a technical problem.

Our foreign policy now coincides exactly with our military possibilities.

It is for us to solve this technical problem in complete independence and freedom; we have not and shall not put up with the slightest hindrance or limitation in this respect.

We again assume the solemn undertaking to do everything that can be done within these limits for our national defence."

The German-Belgian Exchange of Notes of October 13th, 1937.

On October 13th the following Notes were exchanged in the Foreign Office in Berlin between the German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron von Neurath, and the Belgian Minister, Viscount Jacques Davignon:

The German Government have taken cognizance with special interest of the public declarations made by the Belgian Government with regard to the clarification of the international position of Belgium. They on their side have repeatedly given expression, especially through the declaration of the German Reich Chancellor in his speech of January 30th, 1937, to their attitude in this connexion. On the other hand the German Government have made a note of the declaration of the British and French Governments of April 24th, 1937.

As the conclusion of a Treaty designed to replace the Pact of Locarno can still take a considerable time, and in the desire to strengthen the peaceful efforts of the two countries, the German Government regard it as appropriate to define now, in precise terms, their position towards Belgium. To this end they make the following declarations:

"(1) The German Government have taken official notice of the attitude to which the Belgian Government, on their own authority have given expression—namely:

- (a) That they propose to follow, in full exercise of their own sovereignty, a policy of independence; and
- (b) That they are resolved to defend the frontiers of Belgium against every attack and every invasion, with all their forces, to prevent Belgian territory being used for an attack against any other country, either as a Durchmarschland (passage-way for military forces) or as a base of operations by land, sea, or air, and to this end to organize the defence of Belgium in effective fashion.

"(2) The German Government hold that the inviolability and integrity of Belgium are common interests of the Western Powers. They confirm their decision that in no circumstances, will they impair this inviolability and integrity, and that they will at all times respect Belgian territory, except, of course, in the event of Belgium's taking part in a military action directed against Germany in an armed conflict in which Germany is involved.

"The German Government, like the British and French Governments, are prepared to give support to Belgium in the event of her being subjected to an attack or an invasion."

I have the honour, etc.,

Baron von Neurath.

Belgian reply

The Belgian Note stated:

The Royal Government have taken official notice with the greatest satisfaction of the Declaration which has been made to them to-day by the Reich Government. They express to the Reich Government their warm thanks for it.

The Official Comment in Berlin.

The following statement is made by the competent authority on the above exchange of notes:

The object of the German note is to clear up the German standpoint in respect of the international position of Belgium, so long as a new Western Pact has not been concluded. In the Rhineland Pact of Locarno the international position of Belgium was regulated in such a manner as to guarantee the integrity of her territory, while she was at the same time, like England and Italy, in the case of a German-French conflict to take the side of one or other belligerents. Since the withdrawal of Germany from the system of the Rhineland Pact and since the inauguration of diplomatic negotiations on the conclusion of a new Western Pact, the Belgian Government, as pointed out publicly in various declarations, has taken the view that the special position of Belgium requires that the guarantee of her integrity should no longer be dependent upon her assuming corresponding guarantee obligations. In pursuance of this view, the Belgian Government has succeeded in prevailing upon France and England who in their relation to each other and in relation to Belgium still regard the old Rhineland Pact as binding until the proposed new Western Pact is concluded, to waive all the obligations assumed by Belgium in the Rhineland Pact. It will be remembered that this was done in an officially published exchange of notes of April 24th of the present year.

The Reich Government has from the outset shown the greatest sympathy for the desire expressed by the Belgian Government to pursue a policy of independence. In particular, the Führer and Chancellor made a statement in this sense in his Reichstag speech of January 30th last, to the effect that Germany was prepared to recognise and guarantee the inviolability of Belgium. As it cannot at present be foreseen when the negotiations on a new Western Pact, in which the question of Belgium's international position would also have to be settled, can be brought to a conclusion, the Reich Government has thought fit to put into effect and to define Germany's readiness as expressed by the Führer and Chancellor in a formal diplomatic document to the Belgian Government.

The Declaration of the Reich Government is based on the fact that the Belgian Government, by their own free decision, have proclaimed their intention of following, in full exercise of their sovereignty, a policy of independence, and of preventing with all their forces the use of Belgian territory as a base of operations by an attacking State. On the principle that the inviolability and integrity of Belgian territory are common interests for the Western Powers, the Reich Government in their declaration agree in no circumstances to impair this inviolability and integrity and at all times to respect Belgian territory.

*Only one condition is attached to this obligation, and it explains itself. Germany's freedom of action vis-à-vis Belgium will be restored if Belgium should join Germany's opponents in a war in which Germany is engaged. That would apply, naturally, not only if Belgium fought on the side of Germany's opponents, but if the Belgian Government—perhaps on the ground of Belgium's membership of the League of Nations—should find themselves ready to place Belgian territory at the disposal of the hostile forces as a Durchmarschland or as a basis of operations. In addition, in accordance with the announcement of the Führer and Chancellor, the Reich Government has linked up with its obligation to respect the inviolability and integrity of Belgium the assurance of granting Belgium assistance at her request should she be the object of attack or invasion.*

In this Declaration, the Reich Government have taken account so clearly and unambiguously of the standpoint of the Belgian Government that no room remains for doubts of any kind. Belgium has the complete certainty that so long as she refrains from cooperation in any military action directed against Germany, she remains immune from any military action on Germany's part, and that, in the case of her being attacked from any other side, she can rely on the full support of Germany.

The Reich Government may claim that, with this great, disinterested step, they have achieved a substantial new contribution to the securing of the peace of Europe. They believe themselves justified also in expecting that this step will have a favourable influence upon the development of good neighbourly relations between Germany and Belgium.

Text of the Official Statement in Brussels on October 13th, 1937.

The German Government has just handed to the Belgian Minister in Berlin, Viscount Davignon, a declaration in which it declares its determination to respect for all time the inviolability and integrity of Belgium.

This declaration is on the lines of the words uttered by Chancellor Hitler in his speech last January, when the German Government expressed its readiness at any time to recognise Belgian State territory as inviolable.

The Belgian Government, in thanking the German Government for the intentions thus notified expressed its willingness at the time to enter into negotiations with Germany and the other signatories of the Locarno Agreement in order to put these intention into effect.

Some months ago, the French and British Governments, in view of the time which will elapse until the conclusion of a treaty to replace the Locarno Agreement, decided to define their position in respect of Belgium.

As the German Government also realised that a certain time would elapse until a new security part for Western Europe was reached, it has for its part also thought fit to define its attitude towards our country, pending the preparation of the general treaty to be negotiated.

Germany promises to respect Belgian territory at all times, with the exception, naturally, of an armed conflict involving the Reich in which our country takes military action against Germany. The definitions of "military action" are clear. They refer to the case in which armed Belgian forces fight against Germany and naturally also to the case in which Belgium places her territory at the disposal of foreign forces whether as a territory of passage or a basis of operations.

If Belgium acts in this sense, Germany is naturally no longer bound by the obligation which she has assumed.

The German declaration, following upon the Franco-British declaration of April 24th, 1937, enables us to note the agreement of the three western Powers in respect of the attitude adopted by Belgium.

The fact that the inviolability and integrity of Belgium is regarded as of common interest to the three western Powers confirms the historical mission of Belgium and strengthens her international position.

Belgium is glad of the comprehension shown by the neighbouring States. The Belgian Government has expressed its keen satisfaction to the Reich Government. It regards the German declaration as an important contribution to the strengthening of peace and as a factor promoting the good relations between the two countries.

It need not be stressed that the Belgian Government, in taking note of the German Government's declaration and appreciating the spirit in which it is made, has not lost sight of its obligations as a Member of the League of Nations.

II. DOCUMENTS OF THE LEAGUE ASSEMBLY

I. THE ATTITUDE OF THE LEAGUE TO THE CHINESE CONFLICT.

(a) Text of the Resolution regarding bombing of open towns from the air by the Japanese air forces.

The Advisory Committee set up by the Assembly on February 24th, 1933, which again met in pursuance of the Council's decision of September 16th, 1937 in order to discuss the conflict which had again broken out in China, on September 27th, adopted the following resolution which was unanimously passed by the Assembly on September 28th:

"The Advisory Committee,

Taking into urgent consideration the question of the aerial bombardment by Japanese aircraft of open towns in China,

Expresses its profound distress at the loss of life caused to innocent civilians, including great numbers of women and children, as a result of such bombardments, and

Declares that no excuse can be made for such acts which have aroused horror and indignation throughout the world, and solemnly condemns them."

(b) Extract from the Reports of the Advisory Committee on Far Eastern Questions, and the Resolution of the Assembly.

After the drafting of the above resolution on the bombing of open towns in China, the Advisory Committee appointed a Sub-Committee consisting of 13 States, in which the United States of America were also represented. The task of this Sub-Committee was to examine the position created by the Sino-Japanese conflict in the Far East, to discuss the relevant questions and to submit to the Committee such proposals as it thought fit. The Sub-Committee submitted two reports which were published in League Documents A. 78, 1937 VII and A. 80 1937 VII.

Of the first report we reproduce merely the introduction and the conclusion, which are worded as follows:

The Sub-Committee has not attempted to deal with the historical and underlying causes of the conflict in the Far East. It has not, for instance, thought it necessary to revert to the Manchuria affair, which is dealt with in the report adopted by the Assembly on February 24th, 1933. Nor has it attempted to describe in detail the development of events either in the sphere of military action or in that of negotiation and policy. The accounts issued by the two parties in regard to these are contradictory, and on the basis of the material available it would be impossible to do so, especially in view of the fact that Japan, which, since March 28th, 1935, is no longer a Member of the League, did not agree to send a representative to sit on the Committee.

In any case, a detailed study is unnecessary. At the beginning of July 1937, there was no indication from either side that there was anything in their relations which could not be settled amicably. All that the Committee has to do is to describe and assess the events which led from a state of peaceful relations to a situation where large armies are in conflict.

It has, accordingly, been possible—in the time available to trace the main development of events—to examine the treaty obligations of the parties to the conflict and to draw conclusions which are set out at the end of this report.

(Then follows an account of these events since July 1937.)

Conclusions.

It is clear that the two countries take very different views as to the underlying grounds of the dispute and as to the incident which led to the first outbreak of hostilities.

It cannot, however, be challenged that powerful Japanese armies have invaded Chinese territory and are in military control of large areas, including Peiping itself; that the Japanese Government has taken naval measures to close the coast of China to Chinese shipping; and that Japanese aircraft are carrying out bombardments over widely separated regions of the country.

After examination of the facts laid before it, the Committee is bound to take the view that the military operations carried on by Japan against China by land, sea and air are out of all proportion to the incident that occasioned the conflict; that such action cannot possibly facilitate or promote the friendly co-operation between the two nations that Japanese statesmen have affirmed to be the aim of their policy; that it can be justified neither on the basis of existing legal instruments nor on that of the right of self-defence, and that it is in contravention of Japan's obligations under the Nine-Power Treaty of February 6th, 1922, and under the Pact of Paris of August 27th, 1928.

Second Report of the Sub-Committee.

1. In the report which the Sub-Committee has already submitted to the Advisory Committee, the facts of the present situation in China and the treaty obligations of Japan have been examined. That report shows that the action taken by Japan is a breach of Japan's treaty obligations and cannot be justified.

2. The establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments and the maintenance of respect of treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples one with another are matters of vital interest to all nations.

3. The present situation in China is a matter of concern not only to the two States in conflict but, to a greater or lesser degree, to all States. Many Powers are already directly affected in the lives of their nationals and in their material interests. But even more important than this is the interest which all States must feel in the restoration and maintenance of peace. This, indeed, is the fundamental purpose for which the League exists. It has thus the duty as well as the right to attempt to bring about a speedy restoration of peace in the Far East, in accordance with existing obligations under the Covenant and the treaties.

4. The Sub-Committee has considered in the first place the obligations which the Covenant places in such circumstances upon Members of the League.

5. The Advisory Committee has been set up under the wide terms of Article 3 (3) of the Covenant, which authorises the Assembly to deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

6. This Article places no limit upon the action of the Assembly, and Article 11 which, inter alia, has been invoked by China provides that "the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations".

7. The Sub-Committee has examined the situation with a view to determining what action would be "wise and effectual".

8. It cannot be admitted that the present conflict in the Far East, which has been shown to involve an infringement of Japan's treaty obligations, is one which can as of right only be settled by direct methods between the Chinese and Japanese Governments. On the contrary, the whole situation must be taken into the fullest consideration and in particular any appropriate means by which peace may be re-established, in conformity with the principles of the Covenant and of international law and with the provisions of existing treaties, must be examined.

9. The Sub-Committee is convinced that even at this stage of the conflict, before examining other possibilities, further efforts must be made to secure the restoration of peace by agreement.

10. In attempting a settlement, by negotiation, of the present conflict, the League cannot lose sight of the fact that one party is not a member of the League and has, in relation to the work of the Advisory Committee, explicitly declined to co-operate in political matters with the League.

11. The Sub-Committee notes that under the Nine-Power Treaty signed at Washington, the contracting Powers, other than China, agreed, inter alia, to respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China, and that all contracting Powers, including China, agreed that, whenever a situation should arise which involved the application of the stipulations of the Treaty and rendered desirable the discussion of such application, there should be full and frank communication between the Powers concerned. It appears, therefore, to the Sub-Committee that the first step which the Assembly should take, in the name of the League, would be to invite those Members of the League who are parties to the Nine-Power Treaty to initiate such consultation at the earliest practicable moment. The Sub-Committee would suggest that these Members should meet forthwith to decide upon the best and quickest means of giving effect to this invitation. The Sub-Committee would further express the hope that the States concerned will be able to associate with their work other States which have special interests in the Far East to seek a method of putting an end to the conflict by agreement.

12. The States thus engaged in consultation may at any stage consider it desirable to make proposals through the medium of the Advisory Committee to the Assembly. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Assembly should not close its session and should declare the League's willingness to consider co-operation to the maximum extent practicable in any such proposals. The Advisory Committee should in any case hold a further meeting (whether at Geneva or elsewhere) within a period of one month.

13. Pending the results of the action proposed, the Advisory Committee should invite the Assembly to express its moral support for China and to recommend that Members of the League should refrain from taking any action which might have the effect of weakening China's power of resistance and thus of increasing her difficulties in the present conflict, and should also consider how far they can individually extend aid to China.

(c) The League's Resolution on the Chinese Conflict.

"The Assembly:

"Adopts as its own the reports submitted to it by its Advisory Committee on the subject of the conflict between China and Japan;

"Approves the proposals contained in the second of the said reports (document A.80.1937.VII) and requests its President to take the necessary action with regard to the proposed meeting of the Members of the League which are Parties to the Nine-Power Treaty signed at Washington on February 6th, 1922;

"Expresses its moral support for China, and recommends that Members of the League should refrain from taking any action which might have the effect of weakening China's power of resistance and thus of increasing her difficulties in the present conflict, and should also consider how far they can individually extend aid to China;

"Decides to adjourn its present session and to authorise the President to summon a further meeting if the Advisory Committee so requests."

II. THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR

(a) The Text of the Rejected Spanish Resolution.

(League Document A. 70. 1937. VIII of October 1st, 1937).

(This draft resolution submitted by the Sixth Committee on October 2nd did not obtain the requisite unanimity and was rejected by two adverse votes and 14 abstentions, with 32 votes in favour of it.)

The Assembly:

(1) Associating itself with the Council in recalling that it is the duty of every State to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of other States—a duty which, for Members of the League of Nations, has been recognised by the Covenant ;

(2) Affirms that every State is under an obligation to refrain from intervening in the internal affairs of another State ;

(3) Recalls the special undertakings entered into by the European Governments, and the London Non-Intervention Committee which, in the intention of the countries to whose initiative it owes its origin, was set up for the purpose of restricting the Spanish conflict and thereby safeguarding peace in the rest of the world ;

(4) Regrets that not merely has the London Non-Intervention Committee failed, despite the efforts of the majority of its Members, of which the Assembly expresses its appreciation, to secure the withdrawal of non-Spanish combatants taking part in the struggle in Spain, but that it must to-day be recognised that there are veritable foreign army corps on Spanish soil, which represent foreign intervention in Spanish affairs ;

(5) Observes that the Council in its resolution of May 29th last justly described this withdrawal as “the most effective remedy for a situation, the great gravity of which, from the standpoint of the general peace, it feels bound to emphasise, and the most certain means of ensuring the full application of the policy of non-intervention” ;

(6) Sincerely trusts that the diplomatic action recently initiated by certain Powers will be successful in securing the immediate and complete withdrawal of the non-Spanish combatants taking part in the struggle in Spain ;

(7) Appeals to the Governments, which must all be animated by the desire to see peace maintained in Europe, to undertake a new and earnest effort in this direction ;

And notes that, if such a result cannot be obtained in the near future, the Members of the League which are parties to the non-intervention agreement will consider ending the policy of non-intervention ;

(8) Requests the Council, in view of the provisions of Article 11 of the Covenant of the League, to follow attentively the development of the situation in Spain and to seize any opportunity that may arise for seeking a basis for a pacific solution of the conflict.

(b) Supplementary Proposal to the above Draft Resolution submitted by the Austrian and Hungarian delegations, rejected by the Assembly on October 2nd by 31 adverse votes against 3 votes in favour of it and 14 abstentions.

On behalf of the Austrian and Hungarian delegations, we have the honour to propose the following amendments to the Draft Resolution submitted by the Sixth Committee to the Assembly, relating to the situation in Spain and connected questions.

1. In paragraph 4 insert the words “on both sides” before the words “on Spanish soil”.

2. Replace the words “army corps” by “armed forces” ;

3. In the 2nd sub-paragraph of paragraph 7, replace the term “the Members” by “certain Members” ;

4. In the same sub-paragraph, replace the words “will consider” by “might consider” ;

III. RESOLUTIONS ON COOPERATION OF THE LEAGUE WITH NON-MEMBERS

(a) Resolution on the basis of the Chilean proposals.

The Assembly,

In consideration of the Chilean Delegation's proposal ;

Appreciating the fact that it has been inspired by the desire to strengthen the authority of the League of Nations ;

In consideration of the opinion expressed by the Special Committee appointed to study the application of the principles of the Covenant ;

Whereas it would be eminently desirable for the League of Nations to associate the greatest possible number of States with the application of the principles on which it is based ;

Whereas, being anxious to neglect nothing which would promote such a development of international co-operation, the Special Committee would be glad to know the observations and suggestions which the non-member States and the States that have announced their withdrawal from the League might think fit to make in order to assist it in its studies ;

Requests the Council to examine the conditions in which such information should be obtained as and when opportunity offers, in order to be placed at the said Committee's disposal.

(b) Resolution on the basis of the Argentine proposals.

“Whereas the covenants of a universal tendency aiming at the pacific settlement of international disputes, by which the States Members and non-members of the League of Nations are mutually bound, such as the Treaty for the Renunciation of War signed in Paris on August 27th, 1928, and the Treaty of Non-Aggression and Conciliation, signed at Rio de Janeiro on October 10th, 1933, on the initiative of the Argentine Republic, are designed, like the League Covenant, and in accordance with Article 21 thereof, to ensure the maintenance of peace ;

“And whereas the Inter-American Conference for the Consolidation of Peace which met at Buenos Aires on December 1st, 1936, on the initiative of President Roosevelt, was actuated by the desire to supplement and strengthen the League's efforts to prevent war ;

“The Assembly declares that :

“In the event of war, or a threat of war, the League of Nations, while not delaying for that purpose its own action in virtue of the Covenant, shall take suitable steps and shall establish such contacts as may appear to be necessary to associate in its efforts for the maintenance of peace those States which are not members of the League, but are mutually bound by the above-mentioned covenants, the common aim of which is to maintain peace.”

IV. RESOLUTION OF THE ASSEMBLY ON THE QUESTION OF DISARMAMENT

“The Assembly,

“Considering it desirable that a first step should be taken towards the conclusion of a general convention for the reduction and limitation of armaments, and that accordingly use should be made of the work done by the Disarmament Conference :

“1. Recommends, in pursuance of the resolution of the Bureau dated May 31st, 1937, the conclusion of an international convention on the publicity of national defence expenditure and the working of an organ of supervision and co-ordination ;

“2. Recommends the Members of the League, each in so far as it is concerned and to the extent that this has not already been done, to examine the possibility of adopting internal measures with a view to the effective supervision of the manufacture of and trade in arms, ammunition and implements of war, on the basis of the work done by the Special Committee of the Disarmament Conference ;

“And asks Governments to inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations of the action taken on this recommendation ;

“3. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the present resolution to the States not members of the League of Nations.”

GERMANY'S CLAIM TO COLONIES

The Present Position of the International Discussion on Colonial Questions¹

Adolf Hitler on the German Colonial claim

"... Moreover in our economic life there is only one question which has for years continued to give us the greatest trouble: it is the difficulty of our food supply. The German scope is too small, without being supplemented by colonies, to guarantee an undisturbed, certain and permanent nourishment of our people. No other nation can show greater achievements in this sphere than ourselves... In the long run it is an intolerable thought to be dependent from year to year on the accident of a good or bad harvest. The claim to colonial possessions belonging to the Reich is therefore based on our economic distress, and the attitude of the other Powers to this claim is simply incomprehensible. Germany had neither deprived these Powers of her colonies nor stolen them. In a world that is at present dripping with moral phrases, it is well to take this fact into consideration... We have a harder struggle to carry on than others. 137 persons per square kilometre are more difficult to feed than 11 or 12..."

(From the Proclamation of the Führer and Chancellor at the Nuremberg Party Congress on September 7th, 1937.)

"When we now state that our scope is too small and that we must therefore absolutely supplement it by colonies, then some wiseacre goes about and says: What do you need with colonies? Colonies would be of no use to you. You can buy what you want. Of course we are clever enough to buy if we have money. They should not have plundered us for fifteen years, then we should have been able to buy."

There are rich people who say: wealth is a burden, which is very heavy to carry. Let no one yearn for wealth, lest this burden should be placed upon him. One would think that if wealth is such a heavy burden, those who possess it should be glad to give some of it away. But they will not do so. There are also foreign statesmen who say that colonies are a heavy burden, but they do not want to give up any part of that burden. They say colonies have no value. But they do not want under any circumstances to give back these "valueless" colonies to their rightful owners. When I speak of rightful owners, I do so only at a time and in a world that is full of the ideals of League morality and modesty; it was according to these ideals that we Germans formerly acquired our colonies, though we lost them according to other principles which should be most severely condemned from the standpoint of League morality."

* * *

Since Adolf Hitler's statements on colonial policy in the two proclamations at the Nuremberg Party Congress on September 9th, 1936 and September 7th, 1937, in his Reichstag speech on January 30th, 1937 and in his speech at the Harvest Thanksgiving Festival on the Bückeberg on October 3rd, 1937; since the numerous statements of a similar tenour by Dr. Goebels and other responsible statesmen, it is no longer a secret for the world that the demand for colonial equality of rights will not die down and will be advanced by the Reich with the greatest emphasis. Frankness and sincerity have always been the guiding principles of National Socialist foreign policy, and the Government of the Reich therefore makes no secret of its view that the treatment of the colonial question in 1919 in Paris and Versailles constituted a breach of President Wilson's peace programme and that the German colonial claim is therefore morally, legally and economically well founded in every respect.

Mussolini's Appeal

On October 28th, 1937 a fresh appeal, and at the same time a fresh warning, was sent from Rome to the colonial Powers.

Benito Mussolini took advantage of the State festival of Fascist Italy, the anniversary of the day, fifteen years ago, when the blackshirts marched on Rome, to tell the statesmen and diplomats and the peoples of Europe of the conditions which are to create the basis of a juster and better European order of peace which is desired by Italy and Germany: the elimination of Bolshevism from European politics, the revision of certain clauses of the Paris Treaties, and the repairing of the colonial injustice done to Germany.

"What is the watchword for the celebration of the 16th year of the Fascist era? The watchword lies in the simple word: Peace."

In order that this word may again become permanent and fertile, it is necessary to eliminate Communism from Europe, beginning with Spain. It is necessary to revise some of the crying and absurd clauses of the "peace treaties". A great nation like the German must regain that place to which it is entitled and which it possessed in the African sun. Lastly, it is necessary that Italy should be left in peace, because she has created her Empire with her own means and without touching a single square yard of foreign Empires."

After the Berlin toasts of Hitler and Mussolini and the remarkable speeches on the Berlin May Field, no particular gift of imagination was required in order to realise that Italy shows unlimited comprehension for the German colonial problem. It was Mussolini himself who made the cooperation of Germany and Italy with other nations dependent on the conditions that they should show respect and comprehension for their requirements and justified demands. These words contained a clear recognition of the justice of the German colonial claim. It was further strengthened by the utterances of the Duce on the May Field when he pointed out the identity of the aims of Germany and Italy in the sphere of economic autarchy and proclaimed the principle—which is also adopted by Germany—that without economic independence a nation can have no political independence.

It is not the first time that the head of the Italian Government has raised his voice in favour of a revision of the treaties of 1919. With the same stubbornness with which, since the conclusion of these treaties, France in particular has opposed every possibility of voluntarily admitting even the slightest change in that disastrous mistake, Mussolini has from the beginning of his government shown true foresight and proclaimed the principle that the oppression and disqualification of a nation like the German is incompatible with the striving for genuine peace in Europe. Recognising this fact,—whether in connection with reparations, disarmament or the Saar problem—Italian policy, unlike that of France, has logically represented the standpoint of justice and equity and the necessity for an early revision of "peace treaties" concluded in the triumph of victory. The necessity for a decrease in European tension was already realised in Italy at a time when her relations with Germany were not yet based on feelings of cordial fellowship as is the case at the present time when that fellowship has been erected not least on the struggle which the two countries, as young nations, and therefore as "have-nots", have to wage for equality of rights with the older satisfied nations, especially as regards the distribution of colonial possessions. Though Italy, according to a statement by Mussolini, now belongs to the "satisfied" nations, she nevertheless does not stand in this question on the other side of the barricade erected against Germany. Her struggle for the recognition and maintenance of what she has gained still shows that the other colonial Powers cannot yet stomach the role of possessor to which Italy has risen by founding a colonial empire.

The echo of Mussolini's appeal in England gave rise in the first place to a doubtless inspired article in the "Daily Telegraph" of October 29th:

"It is not very consonant with diplomatic usage for the leader of one State to make himself the spokesman of another, well able to speak for itself... It may not be irrelevant to remark, first, that Italy was a party to these "absurd clauses" and, secondly, that the questions raised are not such as can be conveniently or profitably discussed on the public platform, even by those whose motto is Peace. If the claim to colonies is to be amicably adjusted, it must be only by discussion or negotiation between the parties concerned, and the uninvited intrusion of an "amicus curiae" is more likely to keep the parties apart than to bring them together.

Again if this question of the German Colonies is to be raised it must be at a suitable moment, which the present international situation does not afford. The British nation is very ready to be on good terms with Germany, and is willing to discuss in a friendly way any grievances that hinder good relations. But in this matter of Colonies it would not unreasonably expect two preliminary conditions to be fulfilled—first, a precise statement of what would satisfy the grievance; and next, an assurance that any settlement reached would result in a genuine appeasement, and would not be an advance base for further claims. Apparently much is to be asked of this country. The least that could be required in return would be a real and assured contribution to the guarantees of the world's peace."

Heavy guns were brought up by Mr. Eden on November 1st in the House of Commons:

"The question was whether the Foreign Secretary, in view of Signor Mussolini's speech would inquire from the Italian Government which parts of Italy's African possessions they were prepared to offer to Germany..."

The House would no doubt have observed that during recent days the country that had itself, as an outcome of the Great War, gained very considerable accessions of territory in Europe, and had also received certain territorial concessions in Africa from countries which were her allies, was now championing the claims of Germany to African possessions. While I do not desire, to add anything at this moment about these claims so far as they concern Germany and ourselves, I must now declare plainly that we do not admit the right of any Government to call upon us for a contribution when there is no evidence to show that that Government is prepared to make any contribution on its own behalf...

We are ready enough to make our contribution to the peace of the world. We are ready enough to discuss the difficulties at issue with those concerned, but we are not prepared to stand and deliver at anyone's command. Such methods will never have any response here, such order will never be obeyed by the British public."

It is a pity that such opinions were never expressed from the platform of the British parliament by responsible British statesmen when such methods and orders were for fifteen years after the conclusion of peace constantly showered upon the German nation.

In France, Mussolini's initiative also had its effect, and the reaction varied from arrogant and provocative attacks on the head of the Italian Government to a certain comprehension for the necessity of a solution, which was however immediately made dependent on a prompt return of services by Germany in the general political sphere. It is indignantly pointed out that Mussolini has no right and no cause to support Germany so openly in the colonial question.

The Italian press was quick to give a reply to London and Paris. The "Giornale d'Italia" wrote on October 31st:

"... It is time that the whole of France should realise once for all that the time has gone for ever when it was possible to dispute Italy's right to do what she thinks fit without let or hindrance. It is also time for France to realise that, whether she likes it or not, Fascist Italy claims for herself the same right of free speech regarding European and world questions as is exercised so abundantly by the States or heads of Governments on both sides of the Ocean in order to judge international events with incredible arrogance and to constitute themselves arbitrators, distributing praise and blame according to whether the nations and their governments belong to their own clique or independently protect their national interests.

It is grotesque to state that the Duce is not entitled to raise the colonial problem. The Duce spoke in the name of the Great Power, Italy, which signed the Treaty of Versailles, out of which the problem of the German colonies arose. It is a European, and not a French or British, problem. The fact that a former régime signed the Versailles Treaty can in no way prevent the Fascist Government from proposing a revision. The Duce defended the German colonial demand with all the greater right as Italy has clean hands.

As against the paper Peace Treaties, the idea of justice is constantly gaining ground in reawakened Europe, and the conviction is being gained that a peace must not be based on new alliances and covenants but on an actual equilibrium and on the interest of each State to maintain it on account of the advantage which is derived from it. It was with a view to such a peace that Mussolini confirmed Germany's right and appealed to Europe's sense of responsibility before it is too late. The peace which Fascist Italy offers is not an armistice, but a permanent construction on a sound foundation, the erection of which, however, calls for magnanimity and not petty egoism."

An Italian official reply to Mr. Eden's speech was given on November 3rd by the "Informazione Diplomatica":

"While Great Britain and France divided Germany's great colonial empire between themselves, Italy merely received insignificant compensation, namely 91,000 square kilometres of "very doubtful value" in Jubaland from Great Britain, and 115,000 square kilometres of "authentic sand" from France. The British Foreign Office is the last authority that has the right to express itself in this matter, and Mr. Eden's arguments are therefore valueless. Italy can express her disinterested opinion of Germany's just colonial claim in complete frankness because she has herself demanded nothing from Germany."

The "Popolo di Roma" asks: "Must Italy first give back the wretched strips of desert transferred to her, before she has the right to state that on the day when Germany was deprived of her colonies the greatest injustice was committed?"

The "Tribuna" reminds England and France, in view of their attachment to the League of Nations, of the fact that the German colonies are still under mandate and are therefore still awaiting a final decision, so that they belong neither to Great Britain nor France nor Belgium. It is also possible to refer them to Article 11, paragraph 2, of the Covenant which they prize so highly, under which any Member of the League—and Italy is still a member—has the right to draw attention to any circumstance which threatens to disturb peace or the good understanding between the nations. "Is it thought that joint complicity has been purchased by a few ridiculous frontier revisions between the Italian colonies and those of England and France?"

The British Colonial Discussion

We reproduce below a number of letters to the Editor of "The Times," which show that on the other side of the Channel the view is constantly gaining ground that the German colonial claim can no longer be dismissed by a mere wave of the hand or by the old moralising objections. But this nevertheless took place on October 7th at the Conservative Party Congress at Scarborough, when Sir Henry Page Croft gave the grossest reply hitherto recorded to the German arguments. It is not worth while to go into his statements in detail. But in order merely to characterise the arguments which he still uses, it is sufficient to point out that he does not hesitate to refer to the notorious Blue Book of the South African Union, which provided the Paris Conference with the "documentary basis" for the assertion regarding Germany's colonial incapacity and therefore also for the seizure of the German colonies. It was however unanimously judged on July 29th, 1926 by the South African House of Assembly to be a "war instrument" and it was stated by the South African Prime Minister, General Hertzog on January 28th, 1927 that "the untrustworthy and contemptible character of that piece of war propaganda should suffice to condemn it to the dishonourable grave of all such writings of the war period." It cannot be assumed that all this is unknown to Sir Henry. But the astonishing thing is that on the basis of his babbling, the entire Congress unanimously adopted the following resolution which he proposed:

"This conference has noted with grave concern proposals emanating from certain Liberal and from Socialist circles for the dismemberment of the Empire by the surrender of sovereignty in the British Colonies to some international body, and records its emphatic opinion that any proposal of this character would be a callous disregard of the rights of property, both national and individual, a treacherous betrayal of all inhabitants of those Colonies, and disastrous to the welfare of our countrymen, whether engaged in the factories of Great Britain or in production oversea. This conference further calls upon the Conservative Party to resist these subversive proposals and to make the integrity and unity of the Empire under the Crown one of its foremost articles of faith."

The "Manchester Guardian" of October 8th, in an article entitled "A Tory Triumph" sharply criticised this resolution, in the following words:

"Yesterday's debate showed that Sir Henry Page Croft has won a victory. Last year at Margate there were still some wise Conservatives who refuse to accept the principle of what we have, we hold. Yesterday there were no such reservations. It is a sad conclusion. At a time when no statesman dare make an important speech without admitting the need for peaceful change and the satisfaction of legitimate grievances the Conservative party can think of no better policy than what we have we hold. Yet Germany has a legitimate grievance. It is not a moral grievance, it is not even an economic grievance, but it is a political grievance. So long as Britain and France regard their colonial empires as private property and the loot of wars Germany may be forgiven for wanting her share."

It is an astonishing resolution, and South African statesmen such as General Hertzog, the Minister of Defence Pirow and the High Commissioner Te Water must have shaken their heads over it.

Mr. Pirow, on the same date, October 7th, repeated his previous statements in a speech at Wartburg (Natal) before a large number of German settlers and spoke in favour of a decent and just solution of the colonial problem in the interest of close cooperation with equal rights between Germany, South Africa and the British Empire.

He was preceded in this path by the South African High Commissioner in London, Mr. Te Water during a holiday journey in Canada, who spoke at Montreal on September 15th in favour of the investigation of the colonial problem and the return of the German colonies by means of an international conference, which, he thought, could find a solution which would be acceptable both to Germany and to the mandatory Powers. This statement raised a good deal of dust in England and in the dominions, so that Mr. Te Water was compelled to make a corresponding correction, in which he said: "So far as the colonial question is concerned, it is my personal opinion, which I have had for a long time, that the nations cannot long hesitate to examine Germany's standpoint in this matter in a spirit of reason and moderation. In my personal opinion, South Africa will be prepared to take part in such a Conference."

Lord Sankey, the former Lord Chancellor, and Lord Samuel, the former leader of the Liberal Party, were apparently not satisfied with the treatment of the colonial question at Scarborough.

Lord Sankey, in a speech in the Guildhall on October 28th, advocated the return of a part of the German colonies. It was impossible to condemn a great nation to hard labour for life. Though a hard peace had been dictated, it was unwise to allow anger to continue to burn. A time of revision and resettlement must come. For it was a great mistake to regard any nation as an enemy for decades. The enemy of today might be the friend of to-morrow. It was undeniable that peace was seriously endangered when a nation with limited space had constantly before its eyes the prospect of other nations possessing huge territories which were not colonised.

Lord Samuel stated in a speech at Oxford on October 29th that "the true spirit of Liberalism must require us to take a positive action". Justice must be done between the nations irrespective of their domestic régime. To say that because Great Britain disapproved of the domestic régimes in these countries she could not consider any claim, whether legitimate or not, was the way to make war inevitable in the long run. If when Germany was unarmed it was found necessary to consider her claims, and then when Germany was armed it was found weak and dangerous to consider those claims, this would create a dilemma from which there was no escape. Great Britain should not get into the position that nothing was done without force. In conclusion, Lord Samuel said: "Let us have wisdom and statesmanship, even at the cost of some sacrifice, and adopt an attitude of justice to safeguard peace."

* * *

In this connection, and as a reply to the Scarborough resolution, the proceedings at the British Empire Migration Conference, which held its third annual assembly from October 11th to 13th in the Guildhall, was of interest. Its object was to discuss the troubles and difficulties in respect of population questions which had not received sufficient attention at the Last Imperial Conference, and to propose suitable measures. For the joint measures of Imperial defence decided upon at the Imperial Conference are of little use in the long run if the people are lacking who can alone make any security living and effective.

Lord Bledisloe, formerly Governor-General of New Zealand, therefore very rightly remarked that the British Empire, in view of its shortage of men, could not logically and equitably defend or justify its claim to possess a quarter of the surface of the globe including most of the habitable regions as a permanent and exclusive possession.

"The overcrowded, ambitious countries of the world," he said, "conscious of their virility, their stifled enterprise, and their need of expansion, inevitably represent our British race as owning all the earth's most habitable empty spaces and not utilising them."

They not unnaturally stigmatise us as "dogs in the manger"—an expression which does not conduce to world peace. Either we must "go in and possess the land" which our forefathers acquired for the British Crown or sooner or later combined pressure from foreign nations will operate effectively and impair the territorial integrity of the British Empire."

Lord Horne, formerly Chancellor of the Exchequer, expressed himself in similar terms. He said that in the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland there were 468 people to the square mile. In Australia the comparative figure was two to the square mile, in Canada three, South Africa 10, and New Zealand 15. When every qualification of those figures was taken into account the fact remained that there were great areas, rich in resources, which to-day were left untitled and idle because the population was not there to develop them. This situation was a source of weakness and potential danger to the Empire. Lack of population raised a grave question as to the security of some of our Dominions. In the world to-day there were many envious eyes cast upon these unoccupied territories and to those whose claims for colonies were being loudly asserted these undeveloped lands seemed to afford a moral justification for their claim.

Lastly Lord Mansfield said that "throughout the world there were nations and races which recognized no law save that of force. Some of them had undoubtedly justifiable claims to be allowed to expand somewhere. They were very much overcrowded, although some of those which complained most were no more overcrowded than we were ourselves. If we were to leave our far-flung territories practically denuded of inhabitants it would be difficult to resist, ethically, the claim that we should make available to other land-hungry nations some of those territories which we were unable or unwilling to use, and very difficult indeed to protect if and when another nation considered the moment opportune to try to acquire them for herself."

The figures mentioned at the Conference show clearly the vast space for human settlement in Canada, Australia and New Zealand alone. They also prove how hopeless the prospect of a natural increase of population must remain under the present state of population of Great Britain and the Dominions. They further make it clear that the artificial increase in population, the compensation for the "human deficit" by immigration from England can no longer take place, after the former flood of emigrants from that country has long been at a low ebb. Lastly, the representatives of the Dominions stated during the proceedings quite openly that the British immigrants are lacking in the pioneer spirit which, as Colonel Clegg of Australia pointed out, is present in a high degree among the German settlers and farmers.

Space without people, People without space! While other over-populated countries are carrying on a severe struggle for existence, because they are not granted the possession of sources of raw materials and empty spaces, a world empire is crying in vain for people. For what has been said here of the Dominions applies equally to the Colonies.

* * *

The letters to "The Times" are mainly directed against the arguments constantly used by the former Colonial Secretary Mr. Amery, Sir Henry Page Croft, M.P., and other politicians and Members of Parliament as a basis for their abrupt rejection of the German colonial claims. These letters show, it is true, that there are still many prejudices and false views in England regarding the seriousness of and the reasons for the German claim. Even in the case of people who are honestly trying to open up paths between England and Germany a certain opportunist policy makes itself felt, and they are not aware that the acceptance of such proposals would come close to that dangerous era of advance performances which always proved a disappointment to Germany and with which the policy of Adolf Hitler has definitely broken. There are also discussions and proposals which—though certainly with no evil or ulterior intention—show a tendency to evade the German claim by endeavouring to solve the colonial problem by means of a careful system of paragraphs and to formulate conditions, hypotheses and clauses which amount to an intolerable limitation of the German claim to equality of rights and, in spite of good will, to a solution which is unjust from the political and economic point of view. A return of the colonies to Germany would be no real return, if, as is proposed in many quarters, it were to take place within an extended mandatory system or with the participation of Germany in an international African bureau or African Federal Council. In all these proposals which have, moreover, little prospect of realisation, the problem of German equality of rights with the other colonial Powers is not solved.

The same applies to the leading article in the "Times" of October 28th—the day when Mussolini advocated the German colonial claim—in which the various opinions expressed in the letters are to some extent summarised to form the paper's own attitude. This article also, like many of the letters, deserves attention not so much on account of the proposals which it contains, but on account of the truths which it openly expresses. Moreover it shows a sense of political actuality, but gives no ground for illusions or exaggerated optimism. This is shown by the fact that the refusal to return German East Africa (Tanganyika) is a clear proof that in practice the German and British standpoints regarding this former German colony are still very far removed from each other. Further the article seeks salvation in a compromise which looks for a middle path between complete restoration and complete rejection. But even this medium solution is to be made dependent upon the debate regarding the German colonial claim being included in a general framework, which it is apparent from previous discussions means that in this framework the return to the League, the armaments problem, the Western Pact and presumably also the Eastern Pact are also to be settled. Lastly, the object of this medium solution is the turning of the German claim into a "field of activity or development" which, in other words, means that England does not think of giving up anything.

It is illogical to fear that the failure to settle with Germany will lead to war and the collapse of civilisation and, in complete contradiction of this fear, to state elsewhere that a colonial settlement cannot restore peace. Lastly, it is to evade responsibility and to take too slight a view of the German discussion to state, as the "Times" does, that Britain is not the only party to this discussion with Germany, that other States also administer German colonial possessions and, in short, to put on the "mask of the League of Nations" and to hint at mandatory policy and competent organs. England, or the British Empire, was the leading Power in Paris and Versailles, and at her special request received the lion's share of the former German colonies. England was mainly responsible for the injustice done and is at the present time mainly competent to make it good and to bring Germany back to the full extent of her territory into colonial work. If Great Britain is firmly resolved to do this, there will undoubtedly be little hindrance or difficulty on the part of the League of Nations.

That there is moreover no great fear was shown by the debate in the House of Commons on July 21st, 1937, in which the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, did not absolutely reject the idea of a revision of mandates.

"The Mandate in the minds of some people had become a sort of Bible every word of which was inspired. That was hopeless. The whole essence of the League of Nations was that treaties and international obligations when they were shown to be obsolete by the facts of the case, could and should be revised. Half the troubles to-day in the world was that the essence and spirit of the League were not being fully carried out in many matters."

It is true that this debate related to Palestine, and that England has every interest in the revision of that mandate. But what is good for the goose!...

As regards the desire expressed by "The Times" that the colonial debate should be withdrawn from publicity and placed in the hands of diplomacy, it should be pointed out that, as far as Germany is concerned, the colonial problem is a matter for the entire nation and should therefore be treated before and by the entire nation. If only the diplomatic channel had been used up to the present and the German colonial claim had not been brought to the notice of world public opinion and hammered in with loud speakers, the echo which is now to be heard everywhere would presumably be missing. This is proved by the years 1919 to 1933 in which the beneficiaries of the distribution of the colonial booty did not think for a moment of granting to "democratic" Germany, which bowed to all their desires and demands, the slightest concessions to compensate the German nation for the injustice which it had suffered.

Capax imperii! Capable of forming an Empire, says the "Times" in referring to Germany. In making this statement, the London newspaper has once for all cleared away the Versailles colonial guilt lie. But that alone is not enough. The injustice done as a result of that lie must also be removed by deeds. The peace of Europe and the advantage of all demands that the "ramp of ideals" which stood godfather to the Versailles "colonial order" should return to a real order built up on actual rights and actual equality of status.

If Germany again becomes the African Power that she was formerly, she will also be prepared to cooperate with the other colonial Powers in the African problem in the interest of the civilisatory development and economic welfare of the natives in the same spirit of community which animated the Congo Act of 1885 concluded under her leadership.

French Colonial Discussion

In France a fundamental discussion of the colonial problem has hitherto been avoided on the ground that it is a question of secondary importance, the settlement of which primarily concerns England. The various Paris Governments have, it is true, stated that they were prepared to discuss the question, but only within a general settlement of all the other outstanding problems. For instance Léon Blum, when he was Prime Minister, expressed himself in this sense in his Lyons speech, and the same view was expressed by the present Prime Minister M. Chautemps and also by the Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, in his last speech at Lille. The basic idea was always that Germany should not use an increased supply of raw materials for promoting her armaments and thus be enabled to forge weapons again France herself or against her allies in Central Europe etc. During this year's discussions in the League Assembly on the problem of raw materials the French delegate Mr. Faure who used the same argument, was given the correct reply by the Norwegian delegate, who pointed out that the raw materials used for armaments purposes represented only an extremely small proportion and the problem of raw materials was to be regarded as independent of the question of armaments. The idea that Germany might need raw materials also for pacific purposes, in particular for her food supply, scarcely seems to enter the minds of French politicians, or that the National Socialist State is acquainted with possibilities of acquiring raw materials and of settlement quite different from those known to pre-War Germany and the Germany of Weimar. The French colonial debate relates naturally mainly to the Cameroons and Togoland, the return of which is rejected on the grounds that it would mean the "ruin of French Equatorial Africa".

The Cameroons, it is said, belong to France on the basis of a proper military conquest, and the League of Nations can only claim a right of control over this colony but not a right of ownership, quite apart from the moral claim to possession which France has acquired by her twenty years' civilising work and her investments. Lastly, the establishment of an "ambitious neighbour" in the midst of the French African possessions would constitute a danger to peace. In an official publication, "L'Oeuvre de la France au Cameroun" by Pierre Chauleur, to which Governor-General Reliquet himself has written the foreword, we also find that France's right of possession to the Cameroons is based on the fact that, on the outbreak of War, Germany was still engaged on the "inventory" of her colony and, in particular, had scarcely penetrated into the hinterland to which the French had, moreover, a prior claim on account of previous reconnaissance expeditions.

All these arguments naturally overlook the fact that France has a gigantic colonial empire with an area of 11,200,000 square kilometres and a population of 60 millions, and that, in spite of possessing part of this territory for three hundred years, has been unable up to the present time to exploit it economically or to appease it politically.

That the French view, as expressed in the above statements, is untenable has for a long time past been proved from French sources. We observe in the well documented and very thorough work by Gilbert Maroger, "La question des matières premières et les revendications coloniales" (Paris 1937) a few remarks by French experts, some of whom advocated a juster solution of the colonial question immediately after the War. These statements have, however, remained isolated, but there are still a number of representatives both of the Right and of the Left who assume and give expression to a friendlier attitude, although the subject is usually distorted in their statements, so that economic concessions are to take the place of political concessions which are alleged to be impossible.¹

It would take too much time to enter into the economic, political and legal arguments. But one fact must be stressed in conclusion. Any concessions which the others are prepared to grant to Germany in the economic field can never equal the advantages lying in the political return of the colonies. If France and England, with their enormous colonial possessions, were able to reach an agreement after Fashoda, why should the trifling German claim to these possessions stand in the way of a similar agreement or even endanger the territorial security of these countries?

* * *

The German colonial claim must therefore find its fulfilment—and the sooner the better. Not only because it is impossible to exclude a nation of 70 millions with the cultural, economic and civilisatory qualities of the Germans from the colonial mission of Europe, but also because the just solution of the colonial problem is a matter of life and honour for the German nation. The claim is incontestable both from the German point of view and also from that of the best interests of Europe, for its fulfilment constitutes an essential condition for the political and economic appeasement of Europe and the world.

LETTERS TO "THE TIMES"

Sir,—Within the last few days the colonial question has been raised once more by two authoritative voices—Herr Hitler at Nuremberg and Mr. Te Water's at Montreal. Speaking as a citizen of a country which, like the United Kingdom, is at present administering part of the former German colonial empire under an international Mandate, the High Commissioner for South Africa in London has just pleaded, in Canada, for a speedy examination, at a conference table, of Germany's point of view.

In the hope that Mr. Te Water's initiative may be followed up, we venture to make the following suggestions regarding the conditions necessary for a satisfactory settlement, and the possibility of reconciling these conditions with each other. The first condition is that the natives of the non-self-governing territories (both those which are and those which are not at present under Mandate) should not be sacrificed in any way for the sake of improving the relations between European Powers. The second condition is that, both in the administration of non-self-governing territories and in the matter of access to such legitimate sources of supply and markets as these territories may offer, the European Powers should be placed upon a footing of approximate equality with one another.

The second of these conditions obviously calls for a revision of the colonial chapter of the Versailles Treaty; while the first of them forbids any relapse into an unrestricted exercise of sovereignty on the part of any European Power in any non-self-governing territory that is at present being held in trust and administered under an international Mandate. Both conditions can, we suggest, be satisfied simultaneously if the European Powers can bring themselves to agree upon three measures.

The first of these measures is that some, at least, of the former German colonies shall be handed back to Germany, to be administered by her, not under the pre-War régime, but under the existing Mandates. At the same time, those European Powers which possess Crown Colonies should consent to place at least an equivalent portion of those Crown Colonies under the same Mandatory régime. Thus, Germany will not find herself the only Power that is being asked to administer under a Mandate colonial territories over which she has once exercised unrestricted sovereign powers. In the third place, all non-self-governing territories ought to be thrown open to the trade of all nations on equal terms—as the Mandated Territories are to-day, and as our British Crown Colonies and Protectorates were until yesterday.

On such lines as these we see the possibility of a colonial settlement which might prove equally favourable to the well-being of the native peoples and to the peace and prosperity of Europe.

Yours faithfully,

Vernon Bartlett, Gilbert Murray,
Noel-Buxton, Arnold J. Toynbee.

("Times", October 7th, 1937.)

Sir,—Almost exactly a year ago I suggested in your columns the case for a return to Germany of some of her former colonies as part of a general settlement to which all (including Germany) must contribute and in which all must play a part. I urged that any rendition of mandated territories should be voluntary, from strength, and not from weakness. Mr. Te Water and Mr. Pirow have in the past year made it clear that there are those in South Africa who have an open mind upon the subject.

The policy pursued by Germany in the past 12 months has not smoothed the path of negotiations on these lines, nor have our declarations at Geneva pointed the way to common ground. Lord Noel-Buxton and his associates would extend the mandatory system, which suffers from inherent and ineradicable defects. Mr. Amery, on the other hand, stands for the status quo in Africa, at all costs, claiming that any change in sovereignty would mean sacrificing "the native populations who are happy under British rule" and would also be strategically dangerous. Judging from recent disturbances in Mauritius, Trinidad, Zanzibar, and Mombasa, and recent reports from various parts of East and South Africa, he perhaps overstates the Arcadian contentment of Africans and overrates our ability to deal wisely with the immense territories in our hands. He certainly underestimates the danger to international relations of a flat non possumus on the part of the beneficiaries of the colonial clauses of the Treaty of Versailles to any claim for a restoration of Germany's former colonies, and it is noteworthy that the Government have never committed themselves to such an attitude.

Were a conflict to arise on this issue we could not rely upon armed assistance in any quarter: apart from this, all that I hear and read indicates that the problem of Africa will in the next decade become so difficult of solution and so dangerous as to demand the active co-operation of all European Powers if disaster is to be avoided.

What is now required is not an extension of the mandatory system, but the establishment, independently of the League, of an International Bureau of African Powers, maintained, equipped, and staffed by all States exercising jurisdiction in Africa, all of whom would be members.

Such a body would start without unhappy associations. It would not restrict but could influence the exercise of sovereignty. It would not forbid trade preferences, but would devise many adaptations of those that exist. It would help all States to learn from each other: it would be acceptable to Africans, and to all States who may at any time enjoy sovereign rights in Africa. There are several international organisations, which are outside the League, and they are efficient. Let us try what we can do on these lines before placing fresh responsibilities on a moribund Mandates Commission and let us realize that if we refuse to negotiate any territorial changes by agreement we are making war, somewhere, some day, inevitable.

Your obedient servant,

Arnold Wilson.

Sir,—Mr. Amery should not assume that those who differ from him about German colonies are entertaining "amiable delusions." The world situation is so critical that it deserves examination in a less provocative and a more practical manner. Mr. Amery believes that a perfidious Germany is influenced only by insatiable ambition. Now, Sir, what have been Germany's declared ambitions in the international sphere? How far do they indicate any abnormal behaviour?

First, Germany took steps to obtain security. This included rearmament, reoccupation of her own frontier territory in the Rhineland, and an entente with other Powers to counter-balance the overwhelming forces of the armed nations which encircle her in military alliances. But she only did this after her requests for security based on equality had been repeatedly refused. Was this so unnatural?

Secondly, she has demanded colonies. She has done this partly on economic grounds which are about as sound or unsound as some of our economic policies. But her real claim is based on status.

Germany demands that she shall not be put in a lower category than Holland, Belgium, Portugal, not to mention France, Italy, and ourselves. Mr. Amery opposes the return of any of her colonies partly because he believes this would be unpalatable to the natives. But, if native wishes are to decide the ownership or suzerainty of their territory, he cannot limit this principle to the ex-German colonies. He must apply it to the Congo, Morocco, possibly even to some of the lands over which we exercise jurisdiction. Whether they are all contented or discontented not even Mr. Amery knows.

Lastly, Mr. Amery believes that Germany alone of all nations does not honour her pledges. Here he is on more dangerous ground as he will realize when he studies all the actions of the Allies since the Armistice. Their record is not blameless.

I do not put forward any concrete proposal at this moment beyond this. Let not Mr. Amery and others bolt any door unnecessarily. Nor commit themselves irretrievably against making some concession on colonies either direct to Germany or indirectly, as suggested by some of your recent correspondents. At some moment, such a concession might make all the difference to the success or failure of a settlement.

Mr. Amery is right in believing that a settlement of the colonial question may perhaps not bring contentment and confidence in Europe. But he would be doubly right were he to realize that unless and until there is some adjustment of the colonial issue there can be no confidence or any sense of security in Europe, nay, there must be an ever running sore liable at any moment to burst.

Yours truly,

Lord Astor.

("Times", October 13th, 1937.)

Sir,—Mr. Amery's letter refuses any appeal to reason, and asserts that because we are good colonizers, and because the cession of some territories might be dangerous, therefore no accommodation must ever be made with those who desire colonial expansion or prestige.

What we have gained we keep, and we take no risks. In other words we say, "If you think you ought to have colonies you must take them by force because you will never get them by reason." This attitude is simple, obvious, in a sense easy. And if we are armed to the teeth we might make it good. But an England which so speaks loses its moral position in the world. Future generations will blame us. It is a psychological question, not simply one of cheap raw materials. Germany might well say "Why are we the only Great Power without colonies?"

And to say "No" to Germany's natural desire for colonies is wrong for us who are saturated with colonies.

I am, &c.,

Walter Carey,

Bishop.

("Times", October 13th, 1937.)

Sir,—Will you allow me space to write to you in general support of the recent letter of Lord Noel-Buxton and others favouring a colonial settlement with Germany, and to urge the need of making up our minds as quickly as possible what we (Great Britain) are prepared to do in this matter?

I believe that half the troubles that now beset Europe arise from procrastination when the first symptoms appeared. Some of them could have been settled fairly easily if we had aimed at once at a moderate solution and made a more determined effort to reach some definite result. And anybody who now follows German propaganda must know that the demand for colonial territory is likely to become ever more clamant and insistent. Moreover, those of us who are not blinded by chauvinism have to recognize that Germany can make out a fairly substantial prima facie case. It is founded on the declared intention of the Allies in 1919 to make "an absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims", on Germany's proved ability in colonial administration, on her large and increasing population, on her inability to buy raw materials in her own currency, and on her position as the only Great Power of Western Europe which has no oversea possessions—whereas much smaller States like Portugal, Belgium, and Holland have considerable empires.

There is the further argument that British statesmen—members of the present Government—have quite frequently spoken in favour of "peaceful change" and against the notion that the world is for ever to be encased in the form moulded in 1919. The Kellogg Pact, moreover, implies change by other means than war, unless its framers supposed that the world was going to remain in statu quo for ever! And when they speak of peaceful change our statesmen surely cannot mean that only other countries are to make sacrifices, while Great Britain—owning more territory than any other—makes none. Let us not lay ourselves open to the charge of humbug. In the last resort there is only one way in which peaceful changes can be effected—concessions by the possessing countries to the unpossessing.

Are we prepared to set the example of peaceful change? If we are, the sooner we say what we think might be done the better.

Are we or are we not ready to accept Germany as a partner in Africa? I believe we should be, with certain proper precautions and negotiated conditions and on the basis of sensible internationalism in Africa and in Europe. But if we are not ready let us say so and make it clear to the Reich Government that the continuance of the officially conducted agitation for colonies will be regarded as an unfriendly act and can only make good relations between our two countries impossible.

I know many Conservatives (not M.P.s.) who feel like myself that an agreed settlement between ourselves and Germany is the primary need of international politics and that such an agreement would immensely facilitate the solution of every other problem.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. L. Kennedy.

("Times", October 14th, 1937.)

Sir,—To many of us there seems only one method that offers any hope of solving the most difficult problem of Germany's claim to colonies. That method has not yet been made sufficiently clear in the valuable correspondence you have permitted in your columns.

It is surely a mistake to lay stress upon the fact that colonies have little or no economic value for either trade or migration, if—having made such an assertion—Britain still retains her own colonies. That merely adds fuel to the fire of provocation. It is the emotion of prestige which makes Germany wish to get, and other nations to keep, a colonial Empire. It is a mistake to remind the new Germany that in 1914 the old Germany had considerable colonial possessions and yet went to war. That merely raises bitter controversies as to the causes of the Great War.

It is a mistake that colony-owning countries should reserve to themselves the right of deciding whether the interests of native populations require the transfer or retention of colonies.

It is a mistake to lay emphasis upon the strategic as distinct from the economic value of the African colonies, for that only intensifies Germany's determination to regain equal rights with other first-class Powers.

But equally is it a mistake to propose, as an isolated concession to Germany, the reconsideration of the colonial problem either in terms of mandates or of sovereign ownership. That method of making isolated concessions may only feed ambition and gives no guarantee against further indefinite demands.

Surely the wise procedure is to desist from these dialectical exchanges, and to say: "This problem of colonies can only be helpfully considered on one condition, namely, that such consideration is part of an all-round peace settlement." What detailed form a new colonial arrangement—if any—may take cannot now be discussed as an isolated subject. The only point worth making clear at this stage is that it must be part of a general settlement. To leave Germany in any doubt on this matter is a profound error.

The Treaty of Versailles may have been just or unjust (it was probably no worse than the treaty victorious Germany would have imposed upon the Allies). None the less, it was a general settlement, and it included the subject of colonies. Consequently, if this exceedingly difficult problem is now to be reopened, it must again be part of an all-round settlement. As such, it must include Germany's membership of a league of nations and be guaranteed by her acceptance, and by our own, of the limitation and international supervision of armaments on the basis of equality of status.

On that understanding, and probably on no other, can this delicate subject be reopened with any prospect of carrying the support of British public opinion or of guaranteeing both to Germany and to ourselves some hope of an assured peace.

But to state this essential condition only serves to underline the urgent necessity of a new effort being made to ascertain whether we are willing to offer, and Germany to accept, a proposal for such negotiations. If some means to this end be not found, and found speedily, the claim to colonies will—like Reparations before it—become a festering sore in the body politic of Europe.

Yours, &c.,

Lord Allen of Hurtwood.

("Times", October 16th, 1937.)

Sir,—“Mein Kampf” was written chiefly in 1924, when Herr Hitler was in prison and when the whole German race had been more embittered by the disastrous French invasion of the Ruhr than by the War itself. Sir Malcolm Robertson rejects every offer of cooperation or peace made since then by Herr Hitler and wishes us to assume that his outlook has not altered with time and experience. Sir Malcolm further invites us to stereotype our own War mentality and learn nothing from the Allies' post-War experiences and mistakes. Perpetual hymns of hate settle nothing.

His policy would repeat our errors over reparations and over the disarmament proposals of 1932. He would play the game of those Powers which tried to wreck Locarno; which have consistently impeded any rapprochement between Germany and England; which do not desire a spirit of harmony between Germany and France. Sir Malcolm's policy would compel us to mass most of our forces at home and so leave us too weak to cope effectively with the wide problems of Empire in the Mediterranean, Palestine, and the Far East.

Sir Malcolm Robertson's line must inevitably lead either to war or to diplomatic humiliation.

Why not at long last try the healing alternative? Why not try to remedy what is remediable? To-day we are strong enough to review the question of colonies without accusation of weakness. We can still count on powerful influences of answering good will. We can still negotiate with War veterans. Later we might have to deal with an entire nation which had no experience of the horrors of war. The currents of calamity might then be too strong for us all.

History shows that, on the whole, nations, like individuals, react to the treatment accorded them and that generosity and justice bring their reward.

Yours truly,

Lord Astor.

("Times", October 18th, 1937.)

Sir,—Mr. L. S. Amery writes:

The only ex-German colony held by the United Kingdom is Tanganyika. Does Lord Astor seriously suggest that we, or South Africa, can afford to contemplate the strategical risks involved in re-establishing Germany in this key position?

In those few words there shines the whole spirit of that elder statesmanship which leaves so many of us uncertain whether to laugh or to cry. A statesmanship which can still think of the final catastrophe of another European war in terms of key positions and strategical risks is a matter for tears, but the tears can only turn into hysterical laughter when we are told what the key position is. We shall get no general settlement in Europe if we start every argument with the major premiss that the "security" of the least part of the Empire is not to be "threatened". One has been told again and again by British statesmen that the British Empire is the greatest guarantee of peace in the world; that peace is the desire of every Englishman; that it is the other fellow who is so damnably aggressive; no doubt they believe this sincerely. But it should still be possible for them to understand how the British Empire appears to the "other fellow". Not only do we own, as it were, property all over the world, but we insist that there shall be an "all-red route" to that property; and on no account must the all-red route be "threatened".

Now, Sir, it is not understandable that the sacro-sanctity of the Empire, and of every line, visible or invisible, connecting up the Empire does not seem to the foreigner to be the clue to the world's happiness? We who announced a little while ago that we would not risk "one single ship" for the greatest ideal of the age, the ideal of collective security, have since announced that we will fight "to the last man" in the defence of any "British interest". Wherever the foreigner looks, he sees a British interest, wherever he moves, he is reminded that in one step he will be endangering a British interest.

There would be more hope, then, of what Lord Allen calls an "all-round peace settlement" if we began by realizing that to the rest of the world the British Empire is not a guarantee of peace but a guarantee of trouble; and will continue so to be until for our present motto, "What we have we hold", we substitute the more gracious one, "Noblesse oblige". It would also be an advantage if just occasionally we could discard that hypocrisy which, to the foreigner, is so infuriatingly characteristic of England. We announce complacently that we have done all we can for peace: we offered to disarm; we set the example . . . and so on. Of course we want peace. What dictator, once in power, what tyrant, what plutocrat ever wanted civil war? But at least let him avoid the hypocrisy, when civil war comes, of saying that it wasn't his fault, he didn't want it.

Above all, Sir, let us remember, when we talk of strategic risks and key positions, that the tragedy of the next world war will not lie in the result of it but in the happening of it. Compared with the war itself, victory or defeat will be a triviality. To endanger, in however small a degree, the chance of a peace settlement by an intransigent insistence on the key positions in the ensuing war would be criminal folly. To endanger it for a key position in the middle of Africa—O God! O Tanganyika!—there is nothing left to say.

Yours, &c.,

A. A. Milne.

("Times", October 21st, 1937.)

Sir,—I hope this question will be solved but by a careful statesmanlike investigation of the whole question of Powers and their right to colonies and their share of colonies. I see, of course, that each Power is saying, "Germany ought to have colonies, but not our little lot".

As I shall write no more, may I put the following questions:

(1) Is it fair that Germany alone of the Great Powers should have no colonies? Yes or no.

(2) If it is not fair then isn't it better to deal with the situation by forethought and conference now, rather than wait for some crisis involving war?

(3) Is it always necessary to be so suspicious of Herr Hitler? He has broken agreements, but so should I have, for they were unjust and repressive. But all my instincts tell me that if Herr Hitler pledged the Reich to certain agreements—e.g., not to raise a black army in Tanganyika—he would keep his word. For peace you must have trust.

I am, &c.,

Walter Carey, Bishop.

("Times", October 21st, 1937.)

Sir,—Will you allow me to associate myself wholeheartedly with the views expressed by Lord Astor, Dr. Carey, Mr. Rees Jeffreys, Sir Arnold Wilson, and Captain A. L. Kennedy on Mr. Amery's attitude in bolting the door against any suggestion of our making a concession to Germany in the matter of the return of any part of her colonies? In "The Times" of May 4th, last the late Mr. Molteno gave a striking list of the successive offers made by Germany in her efforts to secure equality of status—16 years after the War—all of which except one had been either rejected or ignored by the Allies. Later, while failing to carry out part of their undertaking, they seemed, and still seem, determined to keep Germany down to the level of the smallest and most unimportant European State, and to forget the pledge given by them in 1919 to make "an absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims," a point to which Captain Kennedy draws attention in the letter published in your issue of October 14th. In the light of that declaration and of the other circumstances upon which that adjustment was based it is difficult to understand the non possumus attitude adopted by Mr. Amery, which apparently aims at imposing on Germany till the crack of doom the stigma of being unfit for any colonial possessions.

Is not this attitude bound to produce in the long run an exasperation which might ultimately produce disastrous consequences ?

In view of the attitude hitherto adopted towards Germany's claim to a return of at least some part of her colonies, an attitude so strongly supported by Mr. Amery, Germany must inevitably wonder what has become of the old English tradition of fair play, especially towards a beaten enemy, who has surely been severely punished and has given pledges of non-aggression towards France, Belgium, and Holland. It is surely clear, by the way, that these pledges would undoubtedly have been given last year had Germany been invited to a renewed Locarno Conference instead of being kept outside the schoolroom door as a naughty boy. The Germans will contrast their present treatment with that given to France by the victorious Allies at the Congress of Vienna. They will see, too, that while we are urged on no account to return any part of their colonies to them we cannot even maintain the white population of a vast part of our Empire.

The truly appalling position revealed in the letter of Sir Hal Colebatch, Agent-General for Western Australia, in your issue of October 12th, following upon statistical data with regard to population per square mile in different parts of our Empire, should surely give pause to those who seem determined, coûte que coûte, to keep every inch of our territories, including the 2,500,000 square miles with a population of 93,000,000 which we have acquired by the Treaty of Versailles, although a large proportion of our younger manhood have apparently become permeated, as Sir Hal Colebatch says, with an "idleness tending towards permanent degeneration," which is hardly the stuff to produce the right kind of colonist! The late Mr. Fleetwood Chidell had already drawn attention to the danger to our very existence as a Colonial Empire which is involved in such circumstances in his book "Australia, White or Yellow" (1926). Fortunately it would seem that we are now, very late in the day, about to consider what measures, if any, can be devised to prevent the crumbling away of our colonial possessions, not by attack from without but by a process of inanition.

The fact is, Sir, that, as I ventured to suggest in my letter of September 29th, the time has come—is, indeed, long overdue—for us to accept the offer of friendly discussion with a great people which was beaten in the Great War, and which, even under the terms of a dictated peace, has hardly had a fair deal. Germany is, moreover, undoubtedly anxious for a real understanding with Great Britain, the fundamental basis of which should be, in her opinion, the establishment of Germany's status among the European Powers, great and small—a status which is definitely and scornfully challenged by the refusal even to discuss the question of her colonial claims.

But, above all, if we are to act on the lines indicated by your correspondents, let us be prompt and frank in the matter. Captain Kennedy is absolutely right in saying that half the troubles that now beset Europe arise from procrastination . . . some of them could have been settled fairly easily if we had arrived at once at a moderate solution and made a more determined effort to reach some definite result.

I look for the time when some great man will say to England : We must initiate a conference to ascertain if we can satisfy Germany's reasonable claims, established on the basis of prestige and status, while we safeguard the Empire and the world for generations to come.

In such a conference Mr. Amery's great gifts as a statesman and administrator would render incalculable service, not merely to Britain, but to Europe and indeed to the world. I venture, then to suggest to him, with great respect, that he should add to his rich equipment a little of that very English quality of magnanimity to which I referred in my letter of September 29th, and to which the Prime Minister has just alluded in saying that it is not in the temperament of our people to bear malice, and that we have the shortest memory for quarrels of any nation in the world. There is no body of British citizens which has given a nobler example of magnanimity than the British Legion, the vast majority of whom are full of friendly feelings towards the gallant enemy whom they met in the field, and I feel sure that they would look upon the bolting of the door to Germany's colonial claims as an act not in consonance with wisdom, justice, and our national character.

You obedient servant,

George Shee.

("Times", October 23rd, 1937.)

Sir,—Since 1918 you have allowed me so often to state from different standpoints Germany's claim to colonies that I dare not ask for permission to repeat arguments which must be familiar to every reader who systematically follows this lamentable controversy. May I, however, answer several objections to the reinstatement of Germany as a colonial power which have lately been advanced in your columns ?

Your correspondent, Sir Malcolm Robertson, points to the fact that in "Mein Kampf," written many years ago, when Hitler was an unknown and irresponsible private person, the need for colonies is denied. But why should it be strange that, when in office he recognized the strength of national opinion on this question, he changed his attitude ? After all, Bismarck reacted to the colonial movement in precisely the same way. I ask your correspondent what he would think if a German writer were to deny our need of colonial empire because of the fact that in the middle of last century Disraeli was willing to abandon what he called the "wretched colonies", and that a little later both the Privy Council (in a petition to the Queen) and a Committee of the House of Commons declared strongly against any further addition to the Empire. (Since then we have acquired many millions of square miles of territory, inasmuch that the Empire now comprises nearly a quarter of the whole globe.)

Again, with no justification whatever, it has been suggested that Germany could not be relied on to observe treaties. Let us be English and fair, and acknowledge that if Germany has violated the Treaty of Versailles it was because the Allied Powers had set the example—first by refusing to implement the articles providing for revision where existing stipulations were dangerous to international harmony, and then by refusing to adopt the measures of disarmament to which they were pledged both by verbal assurances given to the German delegation and by the treaty itself. If the invasion of Belgium be advanced as a reason for distrusting Germany, though it is arguable that Belgium had herself abandoned a neutral attitude, shall it not be remembered that it was not the German but the British Government which refused to honour the article of the Congo Treaty of 1885 which stipulated that in the event of war between European Powers the Congo Basin should be regarded as neutral territory and be kept out of hostilities ?

As to the un-English fears of Germany as a colonial neighbour, I will only recall—particularly for the encouragement of the member for Birmingham—the manly and generous words spoken by Joseph Chamberlain in 1885, when, in certain political circles, the same faint-hearted spirit prevailed.

If it be necessary (he said), as I think it may be, to review our foreign and colonial policy in the light of recent events, let us face the altered circumstances of the problem in the spirit of full-grown men, and not with the pettish outcry of frightened children.

To those who have not Chamberlain's faith and courage, I would say, in conclusion, that the best way of conserving the Empire is to discourage distrust and envy of it and to increase the number of its friends.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. Dawson.

("Times", October 22nd, 1937.)

Sir,—It is astonishing that Mr. Amery, an ex-Cabinet Minister, and a travelled man, cannot see Mr. A.A. Milne's point of view, which is that the sight of the great British possessions—increased since the War—makes others jealous, and that our protestations that we desire peace seem to them hypocritical.

Again, our protestations that we cannot hand over because of our love for the natives do not ring true in the ears of others. They know, if we do not, that in a British Dominion a few hundred miles south of Tanganyika a policy of steady repression has been pursued for a dozen years. In South Africa the colour-bar Act, the masters and servants Act, the white labour policy, the land policy, the suppression of the native franchise, are all indications of a steady determination to keep the native down. This policy has made tens of thousands of natives lose any hope of progressing.

What right have we then to talk as if we were the only people who knew how to treat natives?

Personally I should like to support strongly the suggestion that Germany and ourselves should hold our non-self-governing colonies under mandates, a policy good for the natives—good for peace, and so good for ourselves and the world in general.

Yours truly,

Arthur Southampton.

("Times", October 26th, 1937.)

Sir,—The letters published in your columns show that most of your correspondents fall into one of two groups. One group feel that it is worth taking risks for peace rather than to head for another world war. They wish to recognize frankly that Germany must have full equality among the great Powers of the world. They see a chance of a peace pact covering most of Europe and the whole of the Dominions, and wish to seize this large half loaf as a worthwhile instalment towards the re-establishment of confidence.

The other group feel that they can never satisfy Germany's ambitions. Some were anti-German before Hitler's advent. They seem unable to bury the hatchet and are more concerned with renewing the past War than in avoiding a future one.

Now, Sir, the attitude of this second group translated into policy may well involve the suicide of the British Commonwealth.

Such a policy may compel us at some moment to choose between a diplomatic retreat with dangerous loss of prestige or else war on some issue for which the Dominions may not fight; a war that must shatter all the main combatants. Such an attitude on our part must inevitably lead to competitive preparations for war during which troubles probably would be fomented for the British Commonwealth in the Far East, in the Mediterranean, in the Arab world—in the Moslem world—in India.

All this I foresee as the almost inevitable result of an anti-German policy by Britain, of a refusal to make any concession to German demands for equality of status as regards Colonies and of continuance of encircling military alliances, which impose a sense of insecurity on Germany until she can form counter-alliances. Moreover, such a result would serve the strategy of Communism, which desires to see non-Communist countries at war in the belief that revolution must follow.

What has Herr Hitler offered since "Mein Kampf" was written?

(1) Pacts of non-aggression with "neighbour States".

(2) Equality of status as regards Colonies.

(3) A German Navy 35 per cent. of the British Navy.

(4) For five years an air arm equal to 50 per cent. of the French air arm or 30 per cent. of the combined forces of Germany's neighbours, whichever be the less, followed after 10 years by air parity with the principal air Powers.

(5) Return to the League on terms.

Point 4 is no longer open because of M. Barthou's rejection and of the subsequent French Soviet alliance.

Point 5 would probably necessitate amendments of the Covenant to separate it from the Peace Treaties and to make the League more of a consultative than a coercive body. The unwillingness of the Dominions and of the British public to commit themselves automatically to war, economic or military, on relatively minor issue, such as a self-determination plebiscite in Austria or redress of the Sudetan Deutsche grievances, makes such a revision a prime British interest as well as a peace interest.

As to Point 3. If we continue refusing offers of settlement and adopt, a policy of permanent antagonism, may not the naval pact be terminated and murderous naval competition follow?

This brings me to Point 2.

Many of your correspondents have put forward interesting suggestions. I purposely refrain from making any proposal. Prerequisites of successful negotiation necessitate the barring of as few solutions as possible and the preliminary confidential private exploration of all alternatives.

What else is there?

Black African armies? If they are to be prohibited to Germany, should not this prohibition apply also to others with African colonies? Mussolini has accepted this principle.

Central Europe? Some of the countries in Central Europe have recently shown a disposition to follow the example of Belgium, Switzerland, and Scandinavia and to consider their prospects of preserving territorial integrity and political independence as greater if they are neutral than if they form part of an anti-German military bloc even if this be labelled collective security.

French security? Surely France must be more secure if she relies on a German non-aggression pact coupled with a whole-hearted British guarantee of help in case of unprovoked aggression than if she depends on her existing provocative military alliances (of diminishing military value) and a British entente inevitably more half hearted and less cordial and binding because of France's provocative alliances.

Risks to Britain? Of course there are risks associated with this policy. But these risks for peace are less dangerous than the competition in armaments and search for military allies, the growing tension with Germany, and the increasing anti-British activities in the Near East, &c. We cannot deal effectively with any of the vital British problems in these regions so long as we are obliged to keep our main fighting strength near home because we have not reached a settlement with Germany.

Yours truly,

Lord Astor.

("Times", October 27th, 1937.)

Sir,—To those of us who hold that Germany should not be deprived of colonies, the correspondence in your columns has afforded a valuable opportunity for understanding the motives which inspire opposition to their return. We can see that repugnance to a German colonial empire is based upon premises which, if true, would be impressive, but which are in fact illusory. They appear to be as follows :

- (1) That Germany is inevitably hostile to England.
- (2) That Germany is determined upon aggression in Europe, and it is useless to make colonial concessions in the hope of inducing her to keep the peace.
- (3) That Germany can be defied.
- (4) That Germany was rightly deprived of her colonies by the fortune of war.
- (5) That the interest of the natives would be injured by their transfer to German rule, and that this consideration must be paramount.
- (6) That, whether the deprivation of Germany's colonies was right or wrong, the needs of Imperial strategy compel us to retain possession of Tanganyika.

Those who may claim to belong to that middle body of opinion referred to in your leading article of October 28th can see an answer to these arguments, somewhat on the following lines :

- (1) The assumption that one Great Power is to be permanently an enemy is an impossible basis of foreign policy.
- (2) If it were certain that Germany intended to expand eastward in Europe by war (an expansion which would ultimately involve us all) and could by no means be deflected from this purpose, then it would be reasonable to make no concessions to her, but to occupy the remaining years or months of peace in preparations for her defeat. But, failing such certainty, it is incumbent upon us not to increase the incentive to the Germans to embark upon such a disastrous course. If they are made to feel that they can get no consideration for their claims from their brother nations of Western Europe, then the bitterness of despair may well turn their thoughts towards carving out a new destiny to the Eastward.
- (3) Those who assume a peaceful future while Germany nurses a grievance, deeply felt, are living in a fools' paradise. It was presumably such an outlook which inspired France, prior to 1933, when an incapacity for long views led her to assume a permanently helpless Germany.
- (4) If there are some to whom the deprivation of Germany's colonies appeared to be morally justified, there are few to-day who, on the moral score, can contemplate calmly the breach of the promise conveyed in the fifth of President Wilson's Fourteen Points—"an absolutely impartial investigation of all colonial claims."

(5) Consideration for the interests of the natives is the most creditable of the motives expressed ; but it should not be forgotten, in a large view of the tremendous problem of native welfare in Africa, that Germany has a real contribution to make to the fund of talent in science and organization that Africa so urgently requires. And it is idle to deny that the system of mandation does offer a powerful factor tending towards native welfare. Moreover, the greatest injury that could befall the natives of Africa would be war, which the denial of colonies to Germany might well produce.

(6) Those who oppose the restoration of colonies to Germany on the ground of strategy in the Indian Ocean have not reflected that, while the German Government has no ground for requesting the return of any but its former possessions, it would be in the German interest to "do a deal"; indeed, German ambition looks rather to West Africa than to East. Sir Claud Russell, in your issue of February 3rd, suggested a way in which a new distribution of territory might be made, satisfying Germany in the West.

Transfer of territory would, of course, involve difficult problems of vested interest and established tradition ; but sacrifices of some kind are inevitable in the cause of peace.

Yours, &c.,

Noel-Buxton.

("Times", November 2nd, 1937.)

Extract from the leading article in the "Manchester Guardian" of November 1st, 1937 :

It has for some time been obvious that no general settlement will be possible in international and European affairs which does not include a solution of "the colonial question". The motive force behind the Nazi regime in Germany is provided by national grievances. One by one these grievances have been removed either by time or by the action of the German Government. There still remain, however, two grievances outstanding : the existence outside the boundaries of the Reich of several million Germans and the loss of all her colonies. If one or both of these grievances could be assuaged it would deprive National Socialism of much of its sting. It must be admitted moreover, that up to a point Germany has a strong case. It is not an economic case, or at least it would not be if Britain and France abandoned restrictive tariffs in their own empires. (It is worth pointing out that so far Germany has made no response to Mr. Eden's offer to negotiate on colonial preferences.) It is not really a moral case, for one cannot admit that any Power has a moral right to rule over other peoples. But as things are she has a political right of a sort. Germany was certainly given to understand before she signed the Armistice that her colonies would not be taken away ; yet in spite of this they were taken away, and the excuse offered, that Germany was incapable of colonial administration, was a specious one. In truth they were taken away because Germany had lost the war, and the fact must be a perpetual encouragement to her to try and win another one. It is true, of course, that her colonies do not now belong to Britain, France, and Belgium but to the League, and that the mandatory system is a great advance in colonial theory. Alone, however, it is not enough. Just as it was useless to disarm Germany if the Allies refused to disarm, so it was useless to make Germany's colonies League mandates if the other empires remained a species of private property.

The true solution is not to go back to what was before but to go on still farther. The ideal, as has repeatedly been urged in these columns, is direct administration of all colonies by the League of Nations, but that, we may admit, is a long step. One might fall short of this and yet go forward. Germany might, if necessary be offered territory in Africa to hold under a mandate to the League as part of a general settlement and on condition that she returned to the League. With the exception of a small band of Tory die-hards, whose bark is much worse than their bite, public opinion in this country would be willing to accept some such settlement, and one hopes that the Government itself is not determined against it.

Extract from the leading article in the "Times" of October 28th, 1937 :

Nothing but good can come of the correspondence which has poured into these columns during the last three weeks on the thorny question of the German claim to colonies. It is an urgent claim, and it is an integral part of the larger problem of the future peace of the world. For various obvious reasons it cannot for the moment be discussed between Governments in the calm surroundings which are necessary to a settlement.

All the more reason, therefore, why the conclusions which are forming themselves in England, among those who have some claim to speak on the subject from different points of view, should be exposed and canvassed in public against the day when they can be tested officially. Their letters have already covered most of the ground. They have dealt with the broad political issue raised by the German claim and with the practical difficulties of meeting it in certain specific cases. They have propounded a number of novel solutions of the whole problem of European colonization—a wide extension of the mandatory system, for instance, or the establishment (particularly for parts of Africa) of an international bureau of the Powers concerned. They have argued the right of the native populations to be consulted on any change of administration and have touched on the menace of black armies. The discussion has wisely been kept to the point at issue. There has been no attempt to confuse it by importing any sentiment of dislike. It has revealed a very general desire for a peaceful settlement with Germany, in the direction where this country can contribute to it most, emerging midway between those who would tolerate no change at all and those who are prepared to restore the former German colonies wholesale as a hopeful gesture of good will.

It is safe to say that the best and the bulk of British opinion stands on neither of these extreme positions. There is certainly no support in this country for the view that the peace of the world would be assured by a mere reversal of the colonial settlement of Versailles. Nor indeed is such a step within our competence. The responsibility for the mandates over the former German colonies has never been a British interest only. No doubt the largest share of them was entrusted to the British Empire—by no means always to its material advantage: but a number of these are a matter of deep concern to the people of the self-governing Dominions, some of whose spokesmen show an ingenuous disposition to abandon any mandate but their own; and in a lesser degree there are other countries involved. No simple solution therefore is possible even if it were desirable. But there is equally no support in this country for the crude belief that the Versailles settlement must persist for all time in every detail, and without the revision for which its own clauses provide. In the matter of colonial administration we are all entitled to be proud of the long and glorious record of the British Empire; but it is rightly held sheer hypocrisy to pretend that no other European race is fit to be entrusted with it. More particularly in Africa, where the destinies of the native races present one of the supreme problems of the future, there is a strong case (as more than one correspondent has urged) for enlisting the cooperation of all the best European experience in its solution. That does not mean the retrocession of Tanganyika—which presents unanswerable difficulties, administrative, economic, and strategical—nor does it necessarily mean the extension of the present mandatory system to all the African native territories. But it does mean a genuine attempt to find for Germany some acceptable field for development. The recognition that she was capax imperii would be all the more satisfactory if such a field could be opened to her by the common action of three or four of the great colonizing Powers with contiguous African territories.

The truth is that British public opinion is probably far ahead of the Government in its conviction that a clear understanding with Germany would have consequences more profound and more conducive to a stable peace than any other single object of our foreign policy. There is little sympathy here with the view, which has sometimes seemed to prevail on the Continent, that the proper way to treat Germany is to ring her about with vigilant allied States, sometimes masquerading as the League of Nations, like trained elephants round a tiger in the jungle, to prevent her expansion in any direction beyond the limits imposed twenty years ago. She has broken those limits here and there already and every article of statesmanship suggests that a halt should be called to a process which must otherwise lead inevitably to war and to the downfall of civilization in the West. Let us at least be clear at what point a stand should be made, and let us make a supreme effort, so far as Great Britain is concerned, to do what is possible for appeasement before that point is reached. The German appetite for expansion is not to be satisfied by an isolated gesture. The recovery of her former colonies may not even be what Germany most desires. But her other known desires are not directly a British interest; for the moment at all events the colonial issue takes first place in her list of grievances; and there is assuredly no case for refusing to discuss it, as part of a general settlement, in a frank and friendly spirit.

The point that the discussion must envisage a general settlement is vital; but there are two conditions to be satisfied before it can begin. In the first place it will be stultified from the outset if there is any disposition to conduct it by a shouting-match. Is it conceivable that any British Minister, confronted with a public demand through the German megaphone for this or that colonial concession, could possibly make an affirmative reply through a similar instrument? Is it conceivable that British opinion would support him if he were to attempt it, or that there could be any other outcome than a final banging of the door? Here, even more than elsewhere, it is essential to get away from the long-range challenges of politicians and back to normal diplomatic methods. And, in the second place, there must be an end of the Spanish trouble before it is possible to face any other problem in a tolerable atmosphere. That open sore—the growth in turn of imported Bolshevik and Fascist intervention—most effectually prevents all progress so long as it is running. But Germany has prudently refused to become involved in it to any serious extent by comparison with some other nations; and this country is not involved at all except as a mediator. There is no reason whatever why Spain should prove a permanent stumbling-block in the way to better relations between them.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE DISCUSSION ON GERMANY'S DEMAND FOR COLONIES

Our Standpoint under International Law

Text of the Speech by General Ritter von Epp in the Colonial Law Committee of the Academy of German Law in Munich, on October 29th, 1937

The Führer has on various occasions—the first time after the restoration of German military sovereignty in his Reichstag speech of March 7th, 1936 and later at every suitable opportunity in his speeches—given the Powers clearly to understand that Germany cannot waive the settlement of her colonial claim.

What has been the reaction to this German claim in foreign countries? The "German colonial question" has become the subject of lively international discussion. In particular the countries which exploit German colonial property in the form of mandates have given careful attention to all the utterances of the Führer and his collaborators regarding the necessity for Germany to regain her colonies. They do not, however, meet the clear arguments put forward, but advance every possible reason on the other side, although, it is true, there are some people who are definitely in favour of the solution of this question which is of such vital importance for our people.

What does Germany want? According to the logical utterances of the Führer, her demand comprises the definite liquidation of a political status which has arisen and the removal of the economic difficulties of our people of which this is the essential cause. When did this political and economic position arise? It owes its origin to the political and legal monstrosity of Versailles: the mandatory system. Its consequences are making themselves more and more felt in Germany's economic position which is conditioned by the absence of the necessary economic outlet and of vital resources.

The accuracy of this short description of the core of the German colonial question is also shown by the fact that the most stubborn opponents of the reinstatement of Germany as a colonial Power endeavour by their comments to conceal or contest this position, while making strenuous efforts to ignore the situation created by the spiritual work of Versailles.

The tactics of the adversaries therefore aim at finding reasons for the incontestable German economic distress which would from the outset preclude a return of German colonial possessions. This is apparent in the assertion which is made in many forms: Germany's economic distress is not connected with the colonial question; it cannot be removed by the return of the colonies; there is merely a raw materials question which arises internationally and the settlement of which must be left to the League of Nations.

Thus the revision of the Versailles Treaty has been allowed to disappear from the debate. Presumably the justified claim to the return of territory has thus been put out of sight. In accordance with long practice the way has thus apparently been found for evading the troublesome German claim without a direct negative. But these tactics are useless, for all these fine reasons come up against the following unchangeable realities:

(1) Germany's economic question cannot be separated from her colonial question. It is impossible to separate the raw materials question, the question of outlets and the colonial question, or to make any other division of the problems, according to the historical development which determines the present economic position in general and in particular after Versailles.

(2) Germany's severe struggle for foodstuffs and for industrial raw materials is to a very great extent due to the seizure of her colonies, that is to say of her overseas economic possibilities.

(3) The German nation which, since the seizure of the colonies by the manipulations of Versailles, has protested against this reduction of its economic outlet, has reached the conviction in the course of the development of the last twenty years, and especially since the assumption of power by National Socialism, that it must again obtain possession of its colonial property. This conviction is at present held by the entire German nation. This conviction cannot be changed by any tactics of the other side.

When at the end of last century Germany acquired overseas possessions by peaceful and legal means and thus became the last Great Power to enter the ranks of the colonial Powers, this was done not least in order to be prepared in future for a development which arose out of the rapid industrialisation and the unprecedented growth of the population and the corresponding reduction in outlet to which this gave rise. Germany introduced into her colonies the basis of orderly development and of a suitable reservoir of supplementary forces. The primary meaning and object of all the colonial activity of the colonising Powers was to create such forces in their own colonial possessions. Though before the war international economic interests were so intertwined that the belief in a further peaceful development of world policy and the belief in the firmness and security of capital investments abroad formed the fundamental condition of the economic structure, the colonial Powers and other countries that were indirectly concerned concluded a treaty to guarantee their colonial territories in Africa—the natural outlet reservoir of Europe—against all possibilities of a war.

On February 26th, 1885 this treaty, the so-called Congo Act, was concluded. Germany, Great Britain, France, Belgium, the United States of America, Italy, Portugal and a number of other States concluded a treaty with the preamble: "Wishing to regulate in a proper spirit of mutual agreement the most favourable conditions for the development of trade and civilisation in certain districts of Africa, and of ensuring to all nations the advantages of free navigation on the two principal African rivers which flow into the Atlantic Ocean; being desirous on the other hand of preventing misunderstandings and disputes which might be caused in future by the taking possession of fresh territory on the coasts of Africa, and being concerned at the same time with means for increasing the moral and material well-being of the native populations, have resolved..." In Article 11, the contracting Powers undertake, in case a Power exercising sovereignty or protectorate rights in the conventional Congo Basin is involved in war, to use their good offices in order that the possessions of that Power in the conventional Congo Basin may be declared neutral. Such possessions declared as neutral shall be subject for the duration of the war to the laws of neutrality and shall be regarded as if they did not belong to a belligerent State. It could not be more clearly expressed that all war should be excluded from these territories of the conventional Congo Basin, which was far greater than the geographical basin. The conventional Congo Basin comprises the whole of German East Africa, about a third of the Cameroons, the whole of British East Africa, Uganda-Nyassaland, a small part of North Rhodesia, about half of French Equatorial Africa and the whole of the Belgian Congo.

The preventive measures for maintaining the natural overseas outlets of Europe taken as a result of the far-seeing spirit shown at that time—especially by the American representative, Mr. Kasson, who referred on December 10th, 1884 to the first conflicts of the Europeans in America—were destroyed by the Great War. The Congo Act was ignored by the opponents of Germany and the war was carried over into the colonies.

Here also, as in all the other cases, the clear breach of a treaty was excused by the corresponding document, the Belgian Grey Book¹ in spite of the obvious foundation for Germany's belief in the security of her colonies by treaty.

The injustice of the attack on our colonies was also sanctioned at Versailles by the taking away of the remaining German possessions in the world.

* * *

The War deprived Germany of 12,000 million Dollars of foreign investments. Belief in the safety of private property invested abroad was removed by the entrance of very many States into the War against Germany for the purpose of taking possession of German private property merely by writing out a declaration of war.

These results of the War were recorded at Versailles in the following paragraph: The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right "to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty."²

According to similar paragraphs, Germany's colonies came under compulsory administration and the enjoyment of them was entirely removed from the German owners. To crown everything, the dictated Peace which sanctioned the most glaring injustice created an institution the express purpose of which still consists in supervising the further maintenance of the injustices sanctioned, namely the League of Nations.

To the natural results of the disturbance of the world economic system was added the beginning of an economic epoch which is characterised by increased egoism, i.e. monopolies and protectionism. The owners and producers of certain raw materials and foodstuffs combined in the service of egoistic interests and converted the exchange of goods from a means of attaining mutual advantages into an instrument which enabled them to exploit the distress of foreign purchasers exclusively for their own benefit.

By means of the Versailles Treaty and its supervisory institute, the League of Nations, incredible injustice was codified as a guiding principle. The situation created at Versailles determined the line of economic development, i.e. the violent removal of outlets, an unbearable burden of reparations and the most highly developed position of monopoly. The entire weight of these effects was exercised against Germany whom the victors characterised in contradistinction to themselves with the name of "Have-not".

* * *

The colonial empires of the European nations were founded in order to prevent the results of a development which divides the world into "Haves" and "Have-nots", i.e. those who are one-sidedly favoured and those who are one-sidedly deprived of their rights. Though the politicians before the war were not fully conscious of their actions, they nevertheless displayed a certain far-sighted magnanimity and showed by the Congo Act that the solution of a European question in respect of outlet and raw materials which would at some time become urgent would be found in Africa on account of its favourable position in proximity to Europe. The Congo Act is the first example of a far-sighted "clearing of the ground" in Africa, the natural reserve outlet of Europe. This fact found expression, even in the atmosphere of triumph which existed in 1919, in the so-called Lyons broadcast of October 29th, 1918. At the instance of Colonel House, one of President Wilson's advisers, American delegates prepared an expert opinion in which the question of the "justified German colonial claims" was expressed as follows: "Germany requires access to tropical raw materials. She needs a field for the expansion of her population. Under the principles of peace proposed, conquest gives her enemies no title to her colonies."

President Wilson spoke in the same sense on December 4th, 1917 in the American congress, when he said that "the War must not end with an act of vengeance of any kind, and no nation or people must be deprived of possessions or punished". On February 11th, 1918, he added in the same Congress that "there shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages." This was also the sense of Point 5 of President Wilson's fourteen points, which provided for the much talked of "free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims". Germany had accepted this point along with the others in her note of October 3rd, 1918 and her adversaries had also agreed to it after President Wilson's point 5, which so deeply affected Germany's fate, had been explained and commented on by Colonel House.

As against this standpoint there were the undisguised annexationist demands of Great Britain, who was bound by the London Secret Treaty of April 25th, 1915 on the basis of which Italy entered the War, and by the Secret Treaty of February 1917 with Japan in respect of the presumable division of the German colonial territories. It was also opposed by the Prime Ministers of the British Dominions, the representatives of France and naturally also of the other countries. Differences of opinion arose between the protagonists of the secret treaties and the peacemaker President Wilson, as is shown by the secret protocol of the Council of Ten of January 24th, 1919. President Wilson said:

"The world would say that the Great Powers first portioned out the helpless parts of the world, and then formed a League of Nations. The crude fact would be that each of these parts of the world had been assigned to one of the Great Powers.

I wish to point out, in all frankness, that the world would not accept such action; it would make the League of Nations impossible, and they would have to return to the system of competitive armaments with accumulating debts and the burden of Great Armies."

(²) Art. 297 of the Versailles Peace Conditions of May 7th, 1919.

In order, however, to obtain possession of the German colonial territories, the mandatory system was invented, a new version of the former concealed British annexationist methods.¹

Just as England when occupying Egypt in 1882 called herself the "mandatory of Europe",² this mandatory system of Versailles was based on the lie regarding atrocities which had proved so serviceable in the War, though in this case the reference was to German colonial incapacity. Thus Germany's colonies were not annexed, but came under the administration of the Powers, just as had been previously arranged in the various secret treaties. Only Italy was cheated of the guarantee contained in her secret agreement.

With regard to the true character of the mandatory system it is of interest at the present time to recall the statements made by President Wilson's Secretary of State Robert Lansing³ in 1921: "It may appear surprising that the Great Powers so readily gave their support to the new method of obtaining an apparently limited control over the conquered territories, and did not seek to obtain complete sovereignty over them. It is not necessary to look very far for a sufficient and very practical reason. If the colonial possessions of Germany had, under the old practice, been divided among the victorious Powers and been ceded to them directly in full sovereignty, Germany might justly have asked that the value of such territorial cessions be applied on any war indemnities to which the Powers were entitled. On the other hand, the League of Nations in the distribution of mandates would presumably do so in the interests of the inhabitants of the colonies and the mandates would be accepted by the Powers as a duty and not to obtain new possessions. Thus under the mandatory system Germany lost her territorial assets, which might have greatly reduced her financial debt to the Allies, while the latter obtained the German colonial possessions without the loss of any of their claims for indemnity. In actual operation the apparent altruism of the mandatory system worked in favour of the selfish and material interests of the Powers which accepted the mandates."

What is a mandate? The New Oxford Dictionary of 1933 defines a "mandate" as "a commission issued by the League of Nations authorising a selected power to administer, control and develop a territory for a specified purpose". I will not go into the discussions which have taken place regard the idea of mandates. I have quoted a definition to which even well-known Englishmen refer.⁴

* * *

The primary condition for the mandatory administration of the German colonies was the colonial guilt lie in the notes of the Allies of July 16th, 1919, namely: "The Allied and Associated Powers are satisfied that the native inhabitants of the German colonies are strongly opposed to being again brought under Germany's way, and the record of German rule, the traditions of the German Government, and the use to which these colonies were put as bases from which to prey upon the commerce of the world, make it impossible for the Allied and Associated Powers to return them to Germany, or to entrust to her the responsibility for the training and education of their inhabitants." These statements were based on the British Blue Book⁵ with regard to which the South West African House of Assembly decided on July 29th, 1926 that it had "the significance of a war-instrument and that the time has come to put this instrument out of operation."

"... The mandatory principle of trusteeship for backward peoples is actually embodied in the South Africa Act 1909."

General Hertzog, South African Prime Minister, said on January 28th, 1927: "The untrustworthy and contemptible character of that piece of war propaganda should suffice to condemn it to the dishonourable grave of all such writings of the war period."

As regards the content of the colonial guilt lie, the present French Colonial Minister Marius Moutet said on August 26th, 1924 as Rapporteur of the Mandatory Committee of the Inter-Parliamentary Union at Berne: "It cannot be denied that Germany in many respects transferred her methodical spirit, her orderly qualities and her characteristic discipline to her former colonies and to a great extent promoted the development of the territories now under mandate."

The former British Colonial Minister, Mr. L. S. Amery, one of the stubborn opponents of the return of the colonies to Germany, said in reply to my statement of the German standpoint in the colonial question: "As for Germany's moral unfitness to govern natives, that was of a piece with much else that was said, in speeches and even official correspondence, that belonged to the not wholly dispassionate atmosphere of the time."⁶

The last mentioned statement finds a parallel in Mr. Lansing's words regarding Mr. Wilson and the idea of mandates⁷: "His high-mindedness and loftiness of thought blinded him to the sordidness of purpose which appears to have induced the general acquiescence in his desired system of mandates." Is that perhaps the reason why Mr. Amery and the considerable number of his followers are endeavouring after the event to turn the mandate into an annexation, or merely to create a basis on which, after the reason for the mandatory administration has disappeared, Germany's claim for the removal of the mandatory system can be carried «ad absurdum» and her colonial possessions further exploited? This is the reason that explains why Mr. Amery merely refers to Article 119 of the Versailles Treaty as a proof of his assertion of the definite cession of the German colonies. The League of Nations, which otherwise seldom fails in theoretical matters must now therefore again make way for the Allied and Associated Powers—according to Mr. Amery's argument—for according to him the "League of Nations had nothing whatever to do" with the distribution of the German colonial possessions.

In so far as the German standpoint can at all enter into a discussion regarding the Treaty of Versailles after the solemn declarations of the Führer and Chancellor in the Reichstag on January 30th, 1937 and at the Party Congress in 1937, the question must be asked: "Why should there be mandates at all, why Article 22 of the League Covenant which should in any case form a whole with Article 119?" The fact that Germany under Article 119 of the Versailles "Diktat" had to give up her colonies in favour of the Principal Powers does not transfer sovereignty to these Powers any more than the similar wording in respect of Danzig⁸ and Memel⁹.

Germany formally and legally establishes the fact that the foundations for the compulsory abandonment of colonial possessions have disappeared and there is therefore no legal ground for a continuance of mandates. All attempts to bring to life the stillbirth of Versailles by means of tactical manoeuvres fail in view of the natural inadequacy of these methods.

THE THREE-POWER AGREEMENT AGAINST COMMUNISM

The Pact between Germany, Japan and Italy of November 6th, 1937

A Measure against the Bolshevik World Danger and in favour of Political, Economic and Social World Peace

On her Eastern frontier France has erected gigantic impenetrable fortifications consisting of a wall of steel and concrete one kilometre deep—the Maginot Line. At the expense of further thousands of millions, this line is being extended to the Mediterranean and along the Belgian frontier to the Channel by the so-called Daladier Line. After its completion, France's territorial frontier will be protected by the most tightly closed and strongest fortification system of all times which, it is constantly affirmed, is only intended to serve her own security and to protect her against warlike attacks and the attempts at invasion by enemies. If, for a moment, the undoubted importance of these mighty frontier fortifications as a point of departure and base for active military operations is left out of account, it must be admitted that France's possibilities of defence against any kind of military action provide a maximum of security. The same applies more or less to most of the other European States, and this calculation would be quite correct if these States were able to adapt their defensive measures merely to military opponents and were not threatened by a much greater and more dangerous, because invisible, enemy, for whom no armies or fortifications, however strong and well equipped, provide an obstacle, namely, world Bolshevism and the subversive activity of the Communist International.

In the act of penetrating through Germany to Western Europe, Bolshevism was caught and hurled back at the decisive moment by National Socialism. Here an Adolf Hitler Line was erected as a dam against the Bolshevik flood, and it guarantees that the road to the west through Germany remains for ever closed to the disintegrating effect of the Comintern. Since the Party Congress last year, when the great alarm was given, the active dispute with world Bolshevism has become a subject of world discussion on which a searching light has been thrown by the events in Spain. Thereby the world has recognised more and more the danger that would be involved for every other country if the "red bacillus" were to be established beyond the frontiers of the Soviet Union.

The world revolution carried on by the Communist International assumes practical shape in the propaganda for popular fronts with a view to creeping into a position of power from which it can strive after its aims under official forms. It has recourse to sanguinary revolts when it considers the circumstances suitable. It unchains and promotes civil war for the destruction and annihilation of a nation, as witness the terrible proof given in Spain.

We do not need to describe in detail the whole history of the preparations made by the Communist International to an ever increasing extent during the past twenty years with the object of inciting and unchaining world revolution. The men of the Comintern have in fact stated often enough in recent years that they are advancing towards their aim methodically and with cold calculation. They have even given a list of the victims which they are prepared to make one by one and have established an order of priority of nations that are more or less ripe for Bolshevik attack. The Seventh Comintern Congress of 1936 was in this respect an undisguised declaration of war on the other States of the world according to Lenin's principle: the practical task of Communist policy is to take advantage of the hostility of bourgeois States to each other and to set the capitalists against each other; we Communists must play off one against another. In 1936 Spain was regarded as the next and ripest victim and its Bolshevisation was prepared and carried out on a large scale. Russian policy at the Conferences in Nyon, London and Brussels has clearly proved that the principle of Communist policy set up by Lenin has in no way disappeared from Russian foreign policy under the rule of Stalin.

But the Comintern does not restrict its activity to Europe, but stirs up trouble in North and South America, incites the black nations of Africa and rummages among the dock workers of India and Australia and in the over-populated large cities of China. We also remember that Marshal Tukhachevsky said it was a self-evident right of Bolshevism to encompass the whole world by direct action on all neighbouring countries, the Red Army being given the part of "shock brigade of the world proletariat". The fact that he has in the meantime himself become a victim of this world danger does not make it any less a danger. Nations who are wide awake and conscious of their responsibility, however, do not wait for this "direct action" or until they are encompassed by the strangling arms of the Communist International.

After Germany, therefore, another Great Power adjacent to the country of origin of the Comintern soon recognised this world danger and carried on a successful struggle against its subversive work, namely Japan. It counteracted with a strong hand the destructive activity of the Comintern agents and radically crushed all Bolshevik undermining work.

What was therefore more natural than that these two Powers should come together for common defensive measures and erect a new bulwark or anti-communist wall in the form of the Berlin Agreement of November 25th, 1936.

An agreement of this kind is by no means a novelty in history. It has no other significance than the international treaties which have been repeatedly concluded in order to avert dangers threatening the community, such as the agreements to prevent the spread of cholera and plague. Germany and Japan, two leading Great Powers in the West and in the Far East, both situated in the centre of the spheres in which the Comintern is constantly trying to exercise its activity, will take joint measures of "political hygiene" in order to prevent the dissemination of the "red bacillus" and to protect the world from the danger of infection.

A third bulwark has now been added, on November 6th, 1937, to this anti-communist wall by the accession of Italy to the German-Japanese agreement. Mussolini also, since he came into power, has shown iron determination in pushing back the Bolshevik wave that threatened to flood Italy. It is a logical consequence of this repeated challenge to Bolshevism, for instance in his Milan speech of November 1st, 1936 and recently in his appeal on the occasion of the sixteenth anniversary of the march on Rome on October 28th, that the Italian Government, after reaching an agreement with the German Government during Count Ciano's visit to Germany as to the necessity of combating Bolshevism, should now formally accede to the German-Japanese agreement as an original signatory.

The significance of the protocol of November 6th does not ultimately lie in the fact that it is made quite clear to the world that at any rate three Great Powers comprising 200 million people are not prepared to make compacts with Communism as such or to allow the primary necessity of the defensive struggle against Bolshevism to recede into the background on account of political considerations. The organisation of the revolution is opposed by the organisation for maintaining and safeguarding peace, and the planned attacks of the Moscow central authority is met by planned defence. This defence can only count on success if it is organised in practical cooperation between the Governments. The Agreement is therefore open to any other State desiring to accede to it. Against the Bolshevik pressure there is now the impregnable wall of nationalist defence; in the South of Europe Fascism keeps guard and the Communist expansion in the Far East is checked by the land of the rising sun.

That part of the world which still regards the Moscow International as a harmless society club will now have to reckon with this great and powerful line of defence. It is a part of the world that is constantly diminishing, while the States that are alive to the danger of the Bolshevik threat and are determined to oppose it are constantly increasing in number. For it is now an undisputed fact, and one that no longer needs to be explained in detail, that the emissaries of Moscow are carrying on their dangerous work in all continents. For England too, for the British Empire, its dominions, colonies, protectorates and mandates there is a Bolshevik problem, and the "Bolchévisme Colonial" and its repression is a source of great trouble for the Paris authorities in the French colonial empire.

It is natural that the foundation and tendency of the German-Japanese agreement have remained the same. It is well known that they are in no way directed against a State or nation, but are intended solely as a defence against the menace of a subversive movement which has nothing in common with evolution but rather aims at the destruction of the material and ideal values of all nations. The agreement is therefore by no means directed against the Soviet Union as a State, but only relates to the Moscow of the Comintern with which—as has so often been affirmed—official Moscow, the State which calls itself the Soviet Union—has nothing whatever to do. Has not the Soviet Government frequently undertaken—we need only recall the promises given in London and Washington—to renounce all Communist propaganda, and then, when the "value" of these promises became clear, declared with a polite shrug of the shoulders that it has unfortunately no means of influencing the Comintern and accordingly cannot assume any responsibility for its actions. If, therefore, Moscow is really running "on a single rail", it cannot feel itself "threatened". After the first rumours were heard of a German-Japanese understanding, the Soviet Ambassador in Tokio, Yureneff, asked the Foreign Minister Arita for an explanation; the latter replied: "If the Soviet Government desires to cultivate close friendly relations with the Japanese Government, there is nothing in the way of this, and the latter will do everything to attain this object. This is in no way incompatible with the Japanese Government's fight against Communism and its central bureau, the Comintern, for the latter has nothing in common with the Moscow Government." The Tass Agency, which published this report, did not record what the Ambassador replied. He could, of course, only have replied that in fact the Japanese Government's view was correct. That this is unfortunately not a fact was shown by the Moscow reaction, which took the form of a protest by Boris Stein, the Soviet Ambassador in Rome, to Count Ciano, the Italian Foreign Minister, on November 8th. This reaction was sufficient to reveal the double-faced Janus of Moscow. On November 9th, 1937, the "Petit Journal" and other French newspapers rightly pointed out that Soviet Russia had admitted by this step that its internal régime was identical with the Third International. When it now declared that a treaty directed solely against the Comintern was an unfriendly act, it was undoubtedly on dangerous ground and was thus justifying the ideological crusades directed against it.

This "crusading spirit" of the agreement is specially emphasised in France and it is at the same time pointed out that it is impossible to share in it. In the same breath, however, it is compared with the western democratic front, the special characteristic of which is that it does not hesitate to include the Soviet Union in its ranks and to represent it as a protagonist of democratic ideals. The fact that strategical speculations play a decisive part in this respect makes this attitude perhaps more comprehensible but not more pardonable. The record in this respect was taken by the "Prager Presse", which wrote on November 9th: "The position created by the treaty would not be a happy one, if the proportion of power were not such that the treaty or, more correctly, the alliance of the three totalitarian Great Powers, cannot represent a serious threat to democratic States."

The British Empire, France, the United States and Soviet Russia, together with the smaller States belonging to this bloc, possess practically all the raw materials of the world; they have all the capital, absolute mastery of the seas and excellent armies. As these Powers are absolutely peace-loving, they are doing everything to maintain peace, and as they are aware of their military, financial and economic supremacy, they do not require to pursue a policy of prestige."

This jubilant statement by the Prague newspaper is not so very remarkable in view of the articles published in the rest of the Czechoslovak press on November 7th to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution, in which the political, cultural and economic cooperation with the Soviet Union is glorified and a more fruitful development of that cooperation than hitherto is desired. Naturally all these newspapers do not realise that the crisis through which Europe is passing does not originate in the misunderstanding or misinterpretation of a crusading idea imputed to Germany, but is due to two very obvious causes which are closely connected, namely the alliance of France and Czechoslovakia with the Soviet Union which is bent on world revolution, and the Bolshevik programme which is painted with bloody letters on the Spanish sky. On the contrary, as in the case of the German-Japanese agreement of 1936, all kinds of fantastic combinations have been imputed to the present additional protocol. Not only has it been represented as a political alliance with secret political and military clauses, a camouflage of imperialistic intentions and aims, but it is even declared to be directed quite definitely not so much against Russia as against England, France and America. Those who have learned to think only in terms of military alliances and secret treaties directed against third parties have difficulty in imagining a "triple alliance" in which nations which are closely connected in their views on life and history have come together in order to safeguard the order and soundness of the life of their States and peoples from Communist contagion.

They therefore take no interest whatever in the methods by which Russia is governed, so long as Russia keeps her "political form of life" for herself and does not try to export it by cunning or violence.

It is therefore extremely surprising that foreigners should try to shift the Three Power Agreement, which is solely intended to defend culture and civilisation, into the international sphere, by asserting that the accession of Italy implies the end of the idea of an agreement with England. The latest development in Anglo-Italian relations on the contrary shows that the anti-Communist pact extended in Rome does not lie in the plane of international policy as such. Participation in this pact, which is in no way intended to be exclusive, can therefore never mean that there is any desire to form a bloc going beyond anti-Bolshevik solidarity or that the international relations of the participants with the rest of the civilised world are to be in any way changed or affected.

If any event could still further stress the necessity and opportuneness of the Rome signature of the Anti-Comintern Protocol, it was the manner in which the 20th anniversary of the Communist revolution was celebrated on November 7th in the place where Bolshevism reigns. To take a particularly gross symptom, special interest in this connection attaches to the Moscow broadcast which, in a message to the citizens of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, very frankly and as a matter of course "congratulated all nations of the world on the great festival of the whole of mankind." At present, it said in so many words, the Soviet Union stood before the eyes of the world, the safeguard of freedom, the bulwark of peace, the fortress of culture, the most powerful and the happiest State throughout the world. The proclamation of the Central Executive Committee of the Communist International, which was addressed through the same transmitter to the "proletarians of all countries and the nations of the whole world", was even more pointed. It reveals in plain terms the expansionist aims of Bolshevism which consist in uniting the international proletariat of the entire globe in an insoluble connection with the nations of the Soviet State. "Long live the victory of the proletarian world revolution" are the closing words of the proclamation of the Executive Committee of the Communist International.

It is only to be hoped that these broadcasts were also really heard abroad, and in the first place by those who for one reason or another, and with one incrimination or another, thought fit to attack the German-Japanese-Italian agreement. For all countries are ultimately affected by the above proclamations, and the critics together with their countries form no exception. The blood-stained balance-sheet of this jubilee of terror, the crying contrast between Bolshevik promises and Bolshevik performances should open the eyes even of those who still sympathise openly or secretly with Bolshevism or think they should include it in their political calculations.

It is therefore only to be hoped that the Three Power Agreement of November 6th, 1937 will in future find the appreciation to which it is entitled as an instrument for the creation and maintenance of political unity and social peace between the nations and as a protection of their culture against the subversive machinations of the Communist International.

The World in Arms

Under this heading our Journal will in future from time to time publish short summaries of the armaments position in the world, divided up into countries, on the basis of official data and reliable press communications, just as we have given such information in past years in the course of current articles.

In our Special Number 176/185 of February 2nd, 1937, we gave the position of European armaments as it existed at the end of 1936. In continuation thereof and in order to complete the documentary material, we give particulars in the present number for the first few months of the present year; this information has already become known through the press, but is not out of date because it relates to armaments measures taken for the most part in respect of the budget year 1937/38.

Australia

Increased expenditure on Australian national defence. The national defence budget for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937) submitted to the Australian Federal Parliament on August 27th amounts to £11,531,000. This "record figure in peacetime" is divided up as follows: Army £3,264,000; Navy £3,616,000; Air Force £2,672,000; Munitions £1,039,000; Civil Aviation £940,000. As Mr. Casey, the Federal Treasurer, pointed out in introducing the new budget, the expenditure on armaments was nearly £3,500,000 higher than for 1936/37, when a considerable increase had been made over the previous year. The further increase proved Australia's determination to contribute an adequate amount for the defence of the British Empire. The expenditure was possible because Australia was experiencing the highest level of material prosperity in its history. The extent of the increase in expenditure is apparent on comparing it with 1932-33, when only slightly more than £3,000,000 was expended on defence. The increase is therefore fourfold in five years. Of the total amount of the new defence budget, £2,500,000 is raised by loans in London and allocated to the payment of corresponding British supplies. The plans include the following: the extension of munitions and other arms factories, an increase in the strength of the Navy, the rearming of the coast fortifications, an increase in the air force in four years to 17 squadrons with 204 planes, the creation of new air bases at Sydney, Darwin, Brisbane, Cardwell (North Queensland), New Guinea and one of the islands in the Pacific. Mr. Curtin, leader of the Federal Labour Opposition, in the debate on the result of the London Imperial Conference, even demanded the creation of 50 fighter-bomber squadrons at a cost of £15,000,000 giving double the strength of Japan's seaborne aircraft. ("Times", No. 47773, and 47775, Aug. 26 and 28; "Daily Telegraph", No. 25662, Aug. 28th, 1937.)

Denmark

Improvement of Danish national defence. The Government submitted to the Folketing on February 4th two laws on the strengthening of the army and navy. The annual expenditure, which has hitherto amounted to about 26 million kr. for the army and 13.75 million kr. for the navy (making 39.75 million together), is to be increased under the Government proposal to 26.38 and 14.385 millions (making 40.765,000 kr. together). In addition, it is proposed to expend a total of 20 million kr. during the next five or six years for modernising national defence, this amount to be divided equally between the army and navy. The law on compulsory service is maintained, but the number of annual conscripts and the training period are somewhat reduced. On the other hand, the possibility of voluntary admission to the forces is extended. In the army, the mechanisation of the artillery is to be accelerated and the entire technical equipment is to be improved. In the course of the next six years the additions to the navy include 5 torpedo boats and submarines.

The object of the proposals, as pointed out by the Defence Minister Andersen, when introducing the budget in parliament, is to provide the best possible safeguard for Danish neutrality in case of a European war. ("Times", No. 47605, Feb. 2nd "Berlingske Aftenavis", Feb. 4th, 1937.)

Danish Naval Budget 1937/38. According to the "Temps" No. 27,650, May 22nd, 1937, the Danish defence budget for 1937/38 (from April 1st, 1937) amounts to 41.3 million kr. (as compared with 39.5 million kr. for the previous financial year 1936/37). On this amount 14,385,000 kr. (as against 13.5 millions in the previous year) is allocated to the ordinary naval budget. In addition the extraordinary expenditure for the navy amounts to 1.5 million kr. for new vessels, 0.3 million kr. for material and for the coast artillery, and 0.6 millions for fisheries, so that the total amount available for the navy in the new financial year will be 16,785,000 kr. According to the draft law on the strengthening of the army and navy submitted to the Folketing on February 4th, the new constructions in the next six years will be: 3 submarines, 3 torpedo boats, 1 mine layer, 3 mine sweepers, 3 rapid boats, 1 supervision ship and 1 survey ship; a further submarine is to be begun during this period.

United Kingdom

British Defence Loan and Five-Year Plan. On February 18th the House of Commons adopted by 329 votes to 145 a resolution announced on February 11th by Mr. Neville Chamberlain on behalf of the Government, empowering the Treasury during the five years from April 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1942 to raise loans to an amount of £400,000,000 for armaments purposes.

In explanation of the resolution, the Government published a White Paper on February 16th contraining particulars of a vast armaments programme extending over the above five years at a total cost of about £1,500,000,000. This amount includes the normal annual budgets of the three arms and the additional loans for the period from April 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1942. In the general explanation given as an introduction to the new programme, reference is made to the statements in the White Paper of March 3rd, 1936, the essential features of which remain unchanged, and it is pointed out that recent years have witnessed an immense elaboration of the mechanical equipment of fighting services in many countries and that modern forces must be provided with arms and defences more formidable and costly than any conceived a generation ago. The growth in the destructive powers of air forces compels the adoption of a whole system of new measures, necessarily involving heavy cost, for air defence at home and overseas. The modernization of the defence of strategic points in various parts of the British Empire, states the White Paper, is a formidable item in the cost of the new defence programme. The White Paper states that the loan of £400,000,000 represents a maximum. Parliament will, it explains, still retain control over defence expenditure through the requisite approval of defence budgets. The defence programme will remain flexible in accordance with the future development of the position and may be curtailed or spread over a longer period. Taking the programme as it stands today, the White Paper adds, it would be imprudent to contemplate a total expenditure on defence during the next five years of much less than £1,500,000,000. (In No. 1 of this Journal, of October 1st, 1937, we gave extracts from the debate in the House of Commons on the British defence programme.)

Detailed statements of the White Paper on the Five-Year Armaments Plan:

1. Navy

Heavy expenditure must be incurred over the next few years in order to bring the Navy up to the necessary strength. A series of heavy building programmes will be carried out. The construction programme for 1937/38 will include three further capital ships, so that in the first half year of 1937, five capital ships in all will be laid down, including the two which had been begun on January 1st. The total building costs of all new constructions to be started in the next financial year are considerably higher than those of the ships of the last building programme, which will require £50,000,000 as against an average cost of less than £12,000,000 for the years 1931-1934. Further heavy expenditure will also be incurred for the necessary modernisation of older capital ships and cruisers. The same applies to improved anti-aircraft defence, and to the acquisition of a sufficient quantity of ammunition, fuel and other stores. The personnel of the Navy must also be considerably increased and the naval establishments on land must also be extended. The Fleet Air Arm is also being substantially increased. The number of its first-line aeroplanes is to be increased in proportion to the progress in the building of new aircraft carriers, from the present number of 217 to 450 (according to the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,418 of February 17th, 1937, to 500).

The British Navy Estimates for 1937/38. The Navy Estimates for the year from April 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1938, which were published in the "Times", No. 47,624 of March 4th, 1937, together with the statement by the First Lord of the Admiralty, amount to £105,065,000, i. e. £23,775,000 more than the estimates for the previous year plus the two supplementary estimates (69.93 + 10.30 + 1.06, making together £81,290,000). The increase from the one year to the other is thus 29.24 %. Since 1932, the Navy Estimates (in round millions) have been: 50.2; 53.6; 56.6; 64.9; 81.3; 105.1; the annual expenditure has thus been more than doubled in the last five years. Of the new estimates, £27,000,000 will be provided from the Defence Loan of £400,000,000. The budget is based on the policy laid down in the White Papers of March 3rd, 1936 and February 16th, 1937. The largest increase, namely, according to the First Lord's statement, £14,000,000, is required by the New Construction Fund amounting in all to £28,000,000, partly on account of the fundamental acceleration of the rate of building, and partly because the considerable increase in the number of annual new constructions begun with the previous year's building programme now has its full effect in the shape of complete annual contributions. A further part of the increase,

i. e. £9,000,000, is for the increased cost of placing in commission and maintaining the Fleet, including the modernization of capital ships, increase in personnel and the making good of deficiencies in stores and material reserves. Personnel: The estimated strength of the personnel of the Fleet is increased by nearly 11,000 to a total of 112,000 officers and men. (At the end of 1913 the number was 144,419.) New construction: The new construction programme provides for: 3 battleships (King George V type, i.e. of 35,000 tons with 35.6 cm. guns), 2 aircraft carriers of 23,000 tons, 7 cruisers (5 of 8000 and 2 of 5,300 tons), 16 destroyers (improved "Javelin" class, of 1650 tons, according to the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,511 of March 4th, 1937), 7 submarines (Patrol type of 1,100 tons), 3 escort vessels, 4 minesweepers, 3 patrol vessels; in addition, 1 destroyer depot ship and 1 submarine depot ship, 1 surveying ship, 2 large river gunboats, 2 special service vessels, 10 motor torpedo boats of 15 tons, 16 boom defence vessels, 2 tugs; total 80 vessels. In the construction of new ships, the qualitative limitations of the London Naval Treaty of March 25th, 1936, which are now alone applicable, have been taken into consideration.

£4,200,000 are provided for the Fleet Air Arm as against approximately £3,600,000 in the previous year, i.e. an increase of £600,000, which is to be devoted mainly to the acquisition of new aircraft material.

In the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,511 of March 4th, 1937 the Naval Correspondent of the paper calculates that in the year 1937, including the 1937/38 building programme, a total of 148 new British vessels will be under construction, i.e. 5 battleships, 21 cruisers, 5 aircraft carriers, 49 destroyers, 19 submarines, 3 depot ships, 24 sloops, 2 surveying ships, 3 gunboats, 17 motor torpedo boats. The new submarines will bring the total number of submarines up to 70.

British Naval Rearmament. Mr. Hector E. Bywater learns from naval quarters that next year's building plan, i.e. 1938/39 will include three more battleships, so that the total number of new vessels of this class, including the one laid down since January 1st, 1937, will be eight. In all, ten new battleships of 35,000 tons are to be placed in commission by 1942, so that Great Britain will then have a total of 25 battleships, including the existing 5 capital ships all of which will by that time have been modernised. ("Daily Telegraph", No. 25,598 of June 15th, 1937.)

2. Army

Of the four new infantry battalions described in the White Paper of March 3rd, 1936 as necessary for the overseas garrisons, two are to be set up in the near future according to the present plan. A further reinforcement is supplied by two new tank battalions, one of them in the near future, and certain auxiliary troops. The greatest part of the increased cost in the Army Estimates is required by equipment: the modernization of the field artillery, infantry and all other arms, the accelerated execution of mechanisation and motorisation and the supply of war stores of all kinds, in particular ammunition reserves. The territorial army will have a more modern arms equipment.

The British Army Estimates 1937/38. The Army Estimates for the year April 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1938, published in the "Times" of March 5th, 1937 together with the memorandum by the Secretary of State for War, amount to £82,170,000 net (of which £19,050,000 is borne by the new Defence Loan), i.e. £26,290,000 more than the last estimates plus the supplementary estimate of July 6th, 1936 (49.28+6.60, making a total of £55,880,000). Within one year, therefore, there has been an increase of more than 47 %. Of the new estimates £73,720,000 is for the effective services and £8,450,000 for the non-effective service (half-pay and pensions). Since 1932 the Army Estimates (including supplementary estimates, in round millions) have been: 36.5; 38; 39.6; 44.9; 55.9; 82.2. Next year's estimates therefore are £45,700,000 higher than those of 1932, in other words, an increase of 125 % in five years. The Memorandum of the Secretary of State for War points out that, in the comparison with the previous year, two factors must be taken into consideration. 1. In 1936 £551,800 was included in Army Estimates for arms factories. Army expenditure for this purpose (£7,950,000) in 1937 appeared in the special Royal Ordinance Factories Estimate relating to the three arms, which (according to the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,512 of March 5th, 1937) amounts to a total of £16,160,000 (including £7,950,000 borne by the Defence Loan), i.e. £10,180,000 for 14 new factories more than in the preceding year (£5,980,000). 2. In the previous year some £2,800,000 was included in connection with the Italo-Abyssinian dispute and does not recur in the present year. These amounts under 1 and 2, making together about £3,350,000, are to the benefit of the increased armament of the army in 1937, so that the amounts really available for this purpose are: £26,290,000 in the actual Army Estimates, £7,950,000 representing the Army's share in the Royal Ordinance Factories Estimate, and the above £3,350,000, making a total of £37,590,000 or nearly as much as the entire Army Estimates in 1933. The increase in the new Army Estimates is due to the armaments measures described in detail in the White Papers of March 3rd, 1936 and February 16th, 1937. Most of the increased costs are caused by the increase in warlike stores of all kinds, especially ammunition. For this purpose the gross estimate is £30,330,000, as against £12,360,000 in the previous year and (according to the "Daily Telegraph" of March 5th, 1937) an average of £2,500,000 in the years 1928 to 1934. Effectives: The strength of the Regular Army inclusive of British troops overseas (without the air forces and the troops in India and Burma) is to be raised by 10,500 to 168,900, in order to be able to set up the new battalions etc. and to make the other changes in organisation which have already been announced. Including the British troops in India (about 57,500) the future strength of the Regular Army (without the air arm) is to be about 226,400. At the beginning of the financial year it will be below this by 980 officers and 20,200 other ranks; in addition the number of men leaving the Colours during the year will be approximately 27,000. The recruits required will therefore be about 47,200, a number which will be very difficult to reach in spite of the proposed new provisions (increased pay, better accommodation etc.). Reserves. (a) The strength of the Army Reserve on April 1st, 1937 will be about 121,900, and at the end of the financial year about 131,500. Section A of the Army Reserve, which is required to meet peace-time emergencies is to be raised from 3,000 to 6,000. (b) The strength of the technical Supplementary Reserve will be about 21,130. In the last ten months only 400 officers and 1,620 recruits were obtained for this reserve. (c) The Infantry Section introduced in September 1936 to provide for the completion of mobilization of units of Infantry of the Line for the first few months after mobilization has so far made little progress. From September 1936 to January 1937, only 1792 recruits were obtained. It is hoped that in the course of 1937 a total of 4,460 volunteers will be obtained. The attainment of the proposed future strength of 17,000 is therefore still far distant. The strength of the Territorial Army on January 1st, 1937, was 7,870 officers and 133,283 other ranks, making a total of 141,153 (exclusive of Permanent Staff), as compared with 128,321 in the previous year, i.e. 12,832 more. The future number is to be 184,321, i.e. a further number of about 43,000. The annual camps were attended by 123,524 men.

The military correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph", Major-General Temperley, points out in No. 25,512 of March 5th, 1937 that the new Army Estimates are the highest for sixteen years. The "Times" of the same date states in its leading article that the estimate comes as a surprise because the increase is greater than that of the Navy Estimates (£26,290,000 as against £23,780,000). It points out that the estimate for 1937 is nearly double that of 1935.

3. Air Force

As the White Paper repeatedly points out, the reinforcement of the striking power of this arm is a matter of supreme importance for England, because the island kingdom has become to an increasing extent vulnerable to air attacks on account of the rapid increase in aircraft and the perfection of this weapon. The programme of the Royal Air Force comprises the following points: the construction of numerous new aerodromes, the creation of more than 75 new flying schools and training centres at home and overseas, an increase in the number of squadrons and aircraft, improvement of types, further considerable increases in personnel, which has already been raised from 31,000 in 1934 to 50,000 last year. Preparation of special stores of equipment, bombs and ammunition and of fuel reserves, erection of additional State aircraft factories ("shadow" factories) for the mass production of aircraft material in wartime.

In addition, the new arms programme provides for a general rise in the "war potential" of all parts of the defence forces, i.e. an extension of all armaments industrial plant, improvement in the possibilities of converting it for war material in case of mobilisation and the accumulation of supplies of raw materials. Lastly the air defence is to be substantially developed. Two divisions of the Territorial Army have already been reorganised for this purpose, and further transformations are intended.

The Britain Air Estimates 1937/38. The Air Estimates published in the "Times" No. 47,626 of March 6th, 1937, together with the Memorandum of the Secretary of State for Air, for the year April 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1938, amount to a net sum of £82,500,000, i.e. £31,800,000 more than the estimates for the preceding year plus the supplementary estimate of July 6th, 1936 (39.0 + 11.7, making a total of £50,700,000). The increase therefore amounts to 62.72 % in one year. The estimates for the Air Force since 1932 have been (in round millions): 17.4; 17.4; 17.6; 27.6; 50.7; 82.5; the annual expenditure has accordingly been increased five-fold in the last five years. Of the net amount of the new estimate, £82,018,000 is for the effective service and £482,000 for the non-effective service (half-pay and pensions). The sum of £82,500,000 includes £26,000,000 borne by the £400,000,000 Defence Loan. The total expenditure for aviation (military and civil) in 1937/38, including appropriations from other estimates (inter alia £4,200,000 from the Fleet Air Arm Grant as against about £3,600,000 in the previous year), is estimated at the gross amount of £88,590,000, i.e. £32,880,000 more than in the previous year when £43,490,000 plus £12,220,000 for the supplementary estimate of July was voted, making a total of £55,710,000. Civil aviation receives in the new estimates a gross amount of approximately £2,500,000 as against £908,000 in the previous year. Reinforcement of the Royal Air Force: According to the Memorandum of the Secretary of State for Air, the estimates are based on the air armaments programme of May 22nd, 1935 which is still to be completed (1500 first-line aircraft by the end of March 1937), the extended programme of March 3rd, 1930 (1750 first-line aircraft by the end of March 1939) and the White Paper of February 16th, 1937. Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister of Defence, stated in the House of Commons on March 22nd ("Times", No. 47,640 of March 23rd, 1937) that up to date 102 home squadrons had been formed, to which would be added one more in April making a total of 103; of these the whole of the regular squadrons were at full strength in pilots and mechanics and ten were under strength in aircraft. According to the statement by the Secretary of State for Air, Lord Swinton, in his memorandum on the air estimates, the number would be increased during the summer to 124 home squadrons (including 20 non-effective squadrons of the Auxiliary Air Force) with a first-line strength of 1500 aircraft. These 124 squadrons would be gradually increased in size to give the necessary total first-line strength of 1750 aircraft. The overseas air force (which was to be 415 aircraft in 37 squadrons by the end of March 1939) amounted to 20 squadrons after one new squadron had been formed in the previous year. The Fleet Air Arm (at present 217 aircraft in 20 squadrons) is to be raised next year by 61 to 278 aircraft for aircraft carriers and catapult ships. The ultimate strength of all front-line aircraft at home, overseas and in the Navy will therefore be about 1750 + 415 + 450, making a total of 2615, while at the present time, according to the "Times" of March 6th, 1937, only 1610 first-line aircraft are available. In the Auxiliary Air Force 10 special units are to be created for operating a balloon barrage in connection with the defence scheme for the London area. Personnel: In the estimates of July last year the numbers were increased to 55,000 officers and men and are to be raised in the present year to 70,000 (exclusive of India); three years ago the number was only 31,000. In order to train the newly organised air reserve, it is hoped next year to obtain 800 volunteers from civil occupations. They are to practise 15 days a year, and are also to be trained in the evenings and at week-ends. For technical equipment, in particular aircraft material and warlike stores, a net amount of £43,500,000 is provided in the new estimates as against £26,500,000 in the previous year. According to the Memorandum, next year's amount is more than six times as high as the corresponding figure for 1934. The aircraft industry, without auxiliary industries, occupies 63,000 persons. The extension of works, buildings, aerodromes etc. requires next year £18,000,000, i.e. £8,650,000 more than last year; it also includes the extension of "shadow" factories. The existing 65 aerodrome sites in the home country are to be increased by 15 to 80. Overseas seven new sites are to be provided.

The "Morning Post" No. 51,384 of March 6th, 1937 points out in its leading article that in 1913/14, the total expenditure was £49,000,000 for the Navy and £23,000,000 for the Army, making a total of £72,000,000 and that the cost of the Air Force alone, which is estimated at £82,500,000 for 1937/38 is higher than the total British defence expenditure in the last year before the War. The "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,521 of March 16th, 1937 stresses the remark made by Sir Philip Sassoon, Under-Secretary for Air, in introducing the new estimate in the house of Commons that it is the greatest air estimate ever laid before Parliament and that such a vast increase in a single branch of national defence in such a short time, amounting practically to the trebling of the air force, is unexampled in the history of the country.

France

French Expenditure on Armaments for 1938. The estimates for 1938 submitted to the Chamber on September 9th, according to the "Temps" No. 27781 of October 1st, 1937, show a total expenditure on the ordinary estimates of 52,179 millions francs (as against 48,168 millions francs for 1937). Of this amount 10,898 millions francs are provided for the three Defence Ministries as against 9,610 millions in the current financial year, so that the increase in ordinary expenditure on defence is approximately 1,300 million francs. The draft law states that this increase in expenditure is to a great extent due to the rise in prices of food, clothing, fuel etc. and also to the increase in personnel, especially in the air force and navy. The extraordinary estimates, raised by loan, for carrying out the programme of rearmament and work (Compte des investissements en capital), amounting to a total of 13,630 millions francs, provides 11,260 millions francs for armaments alone, i.e. about 1,760 million higher than the 1937 estimates in which the extraordinary expenditure on armaments amounted to only 9,502 millions. The total expenditure on armaments for 1938 is therefore estimated at 10,898 + 11,260 = 22,158 millions francs, i.e. more than 3,000 millions higher than in 1937, and that only for the three actual defence estimates, without considering the national defence expenditure in the estimates of the Ministries of the Interior, Agriculture and the Colonies, the details of which are not yet known. In comparison with the total State expenditure for 1938 (52,179 millions francs in the ordinary budget and 13,630 millions in the extraordinary budget, making a total of 65,809 millions francs), the armaments expenditure represents 33.67 % in the new financial year, as against 30.3 % of 63,056 millions for 1937.

Strengthening of the French Navy. Three-Year Plan. At the meeting of the Chamber on January 29th, M. Gasnier-Duparc, Minister of Marine, stated that it was proposed to make a further increase in the French navy so that, in case of war, it would in any case be in a position to maintain the connections between the home country and Africa and the other overseas possessions. The Government would submit to parliament in the near future an extensive naval construction programme which had for some time been under discussion by the Supreme Naval Council. Contrary to the usual practice, the necessary credits for carrying out a three-year plan would be asked for at the same time. The credits would comprise the floating forces, the naval air arm and the necessary buildings on land. The present procedure of asking parliament for money year by year for a single construction section was one of the reasons for the delay in new construction. The systematic extension of the navy since 1922 had had the result that up to July 1st, 1936 about 150 new warships amounting to about 420,000 tons had been placed in commission and three battleships had been modernised. The French navy had at present a total of 630,000 tons, including 475,000 tons of modern vessels, as against 332,000 tons of modern Italian vessels and 90,000 tons German. At present, therefore, the French navy was superior to the Italian and German, even taking both together. In view, however, of the efforts being made by other countries and the obsolescence of a number of French vessels, France could not consider herself satisfied with the present position. The naval estimates for 1937 therefore already contained a building plan of 43,570 tons outside the normal programme. In addition, the Supreme Naval Council considered further reinforcements were necessary in order to bring the navy up to a total of 850,000 tons. The Ministry of Marine endorsed this demand, if not in full, at any rate to a substantial extent. ("Temps" No. 27,540 of Jan. 31st, "Daily Telegraph" No. 25,483 and "Morning Post" No. 51,354, both of Jan. 30th, "Le Capital" No. 4431 of Feb. 23rd, 1937.)—In this connection René La Bruyère wrote in the "Petit Parisien" of February 5th, 1937 that the new naval construction programme extending over several years was not yet fixed. But he could say that it would include all the necessary types of ships: apart from battleships of 35,000 tons, one or two aircraft carriers of 15,000 tons which could carry forty aircraft and do 30 knots, also cruisers of 8000 tons, large and small destroyers, large and small submarines. In other words, the navy intended to bring in a complete naval construction law. "Le Jour" of December 10th, 1936 had already announced that the new great building programme would contain 39 ships with 273,000 tons, including five additional battleships of 35,000 tons, and that the number of the 8000 ton cruisers would probably be ten. The five battleships would thus be additional to the two already under construction ("Richelieu", begun on October 22nd, 1935 and "Jean Bart" begun on December 12th, 1936).

The French Three-Year Building Plan. Commandant A. Thomazi wrote as follows in "Le Yacht" of June 12th, 1937: During the debate in the Chamber on the naval estimates for 1937, the three-year building programme prepared by the Ministry of Marine came up for discussion. The last of the ships provided for in the plan were to be laid down in 1939 and completed by the middle of 1943. This programme has not become law, but various newspapers have given figures which have not been contradicted and which may be regarded as correct. According to these figures, the following are to be laid down in addition to the present building plans; two battleships of 35,000 tons; two aircraft carriers of 19,000 tons; two cruisers of 8000 tons; 12 submarines of a total of 20,000 tons; 23,000 tons of light surface vessels; three tank steamers, each with a capacity of 4500 tons. In addition, provision is made for building 60 new air squadrons (board and other naval aircraft). The total increase would amount to about 175,000 tons, or approximately 58,000 tons per year. The necessary personnel would be gradually raised from 67,000 to 80,000 men, and from 4180 to 5400 naval officers; at the same time the number of engineers and administrative officers would be correspondingly increased. The programme provides in particular for replacement construction for obsolete ships. A real increase in the navy would only take place in respect of the two aircraft carriers.

The submission of the proposal as a law was opposed on the grounds that a large programme covering several years might give other countries reason to increase their armaments. On this point, M. Gasnier-Duparc, Minister of Marine, stated that, in spite of his personal preference for a building plan on big lines extending over a lengthy period, he realised the necessity of submitting to Parliament a plan of new construction every year, as in the past. Commandant Thomazi points out in conclusion that it can no longer be counted on that the proposed three-year building plan will become law. It will, however, tacitly retain its validity and be put into execution just as in the case of the proposal of 1922 which did not become law but is still followed as a guiding principle.

Increase in the Personnel of the French Navy. The Government submitted to the Chamber a draft law on the further increase in the numbers of officers and men in the navy. The number of naval officers is increased from 2,112 to 2,340 and the engineer officers from 418 to 516—exclusive of reserve officers and midshipmen. The number of men is to be increased from 61,113 to 70,817. The latter figure is considerably in excess of the strength provided for in the 1937 naval estimates, which mentioned a figure of 66,890 men. ("Nation Belge" No. 65 of March 6th, 1937.)

The French Navy Estimates for 1938. The ordinary navy estimates for 1938 (from January 1st, 1938) provide for current expenditure amounting to approximately 2,123 million francs, as compared with 1,757 million in the 1937 estimates. The increase therefore amounts to 366 millions. In the extraordinary estimates covered by loan (Compte des investissements en capital) an amount of 2,460 million francs is provided for new constructions and works for the navy, i.e. 190 millions less than in 1937. The total naval expenditure for 1938 thus amounts, according to the estimates, to 4,583 million francs as against 4,407 millions in the current year (and 3,395 millions in 1936). There is thus an increase of 176 millions for 1938, which is raised to 179 ½ millions when it is considered that 3 ½ million francs for training aircraft pilots for the naval forces is no longer included in the navy budget but in the air budget. Personnel: The number of men is to be increased from 67,000 to 69,500 in order to provide crews for the new constructions to be placed in commission next year, including the "Strasbourg" and three destroyers. No provision is made for an increase in the number of officers. A law on this subject which is at present before Parliament has not yet been passed. The number of officers is therefore at present still the same as that fixed in the law of 1929. According to particulars given by Commandant Thomazi in "Le Yacht" of October 16th, 1937, the new estimates provide 1,303 million francs for new constructions, as against 1,367 million for the financial year 1937, i.e. a reduction of 64 millions. The amounts provided for the Navy Air Arm are also less than in the previous year: for aircraft in series the amount is only 176 millions instead of 206 millions last year, while the Army Air Arm obtains 1,125 millions for the same item as against 879 millions in 1937. The distribution of the naval forces in 1938 will not differ considerably from the present: High sea fleet: A. Atlantic squadron. 1. Ships with full crew: 3 battleships (including "Dunkerque"), 1 aircraft carrier ("Béarn") with three board squadrons, 3 cruisers of 7,600 tons, 1 mine cruiser ("Emile Bertin"), 7 flotilla leaders, 12 destroyers, 1 submarine flotilla. 2. Ships with reduced crew: 1 battleship, 2 flotilla leaders, 7 destroyers. II. Mediterranean squadron. 1. Ships with full crew: 7 cruisers with 1 air squadron, 1 aircraft depot ship ("Commandant Teste") with 2 air squadrons, 11 flotilla leaders, 3 destroyers, 1 submarine flotilla. 2. Ships with reduced crew: 3 cruisers, 4 flotilla leaders, 4 destroyers. 3. Training division: 2 older battleships ("Courbet" and "Paris"), 3 cruisers and 3 flotilla leaders.

French New Construction 1938. According to "France Militaire" No. 16,780 of October 26th, 1937, the building programme for 1938 is to include: 2 aircraft carriers, probably of the maximum tonnage and armament allowed under the London Naval Agreement of March 25th, 1936 (23,000 tons and 15.5 cm.); 1 cruiser, "De Grasse" type of 8,000 tons; 3 large destroyers, "Le Hardi" type of 1,770 tons; 3 light destroyers "L'Agile" type of 1,000 tons; 1 submarine "La Praya" type of 1,540 tons; 4 smaller submarines, "L'Africaine" type of 700 to 800 tons; 2 motor torpedo boats. The new constructions will therefore amount to nearly 67,000 tons as against about 43,600 tons in the previous year. The reason for this, according to "France Militaire" is that a considerable number of ships will soon reach the age limit and will require replacing. In the years 1922/23 to 1924/25, the ships laid down included 3 cruisers of the "Duguay-Trouin" class, 26 submarines of various sizes and 18 destroyers of the "Simoun" class.

The Result of French Air Rearmament up to date. In his speech on the opening of the new air-port at Bordeaux on June 18th, M. Pierre Cot, French Air Minister, reviewed the position and development of the French air force since June 1936. A year ago, he said, of the 1023 first-line aircraft provided for in the plan adopted by the Government at the end 1933 and passed by Parliament in 1934, only barely 60 % were available as modern aircraft. The modern air material had been increased in the last twelve months by 110 %; at the end of 1937, this increase would amount to 180 %. The reserve aircraft would be increased by 80 %. The bombing aircraft had increased by 400 %. No other air force, he said, had achieved so much in one year; the French air force had again become one of the most powerful in the world, and occupied the second position in Europe, coming immediately after Soviet Russia. The aircraft industry had been assisted by standardisation and by transfer to the State. Production had increased in one year by about 30 % and would be 100 % greater at the end of 1938 than in 1936. Lastly, the organisation of the air force had been improved and adapted to present requirements. In order to obtain sufficient capable officers for the front, the upper age limits had been lowered and at the same time the number of officers required had been increased by 25 % in one year. In addition the military scientific training of the officers was constantly being improved in order to give the troops leaders who were intellectually and technically well prepared. The reserve personnel of the air force had been reorganised ("Temps" No. 27,678, June 19th, 1937).

The Transfer of French Aircraft Works to the State. The Air Minister, M. Pierre Cot, on June 2nd made communications to the Aviation Committee of the Chamber on the position in respect of the taking over of the French air industry by the State. He said that up to the present 17 expropriations had been pronounced by the Air Ministry. For actual aircraft construction six regional groups had been formed, a company had been founded for engine construction, there was a committee for coordinating the various companies and for studying joint questions, and lastly a sales office for the export of flying material. The cost had amounted up to the present to 250 million francs. He added that the small companies founded to administer the firms taken over by the State would receive definite form by an increase in their capital. In order to show the result of manufacture M. Pierre Cot made a comparison between the years 1936 and 1937. He said that in the first four months of this year the construction of aeroplane bodies had decreased by

2.75 % and the construction of engines by 10 % as compared with the previous year. This decline was, however, less than in the case of some works remaining in private hands. He therefore hoped that his building plan, which provided for 1500 aeroplanes could be carried out in three years instead of four. An improvement in the production results was to be expected at the end of the current year. ("France Militaire", No. 16,658 of June 4th, 1937.)

Netherlands

Netherlands Defence Estimates 1938. Period of Service. Effectives. The estimates for 1938 submitted to Parliament on September 21st show a total expenditure of 703,196,000 florins as against 657,794,000 for 1937. Of this amount, 110,359,000 florins represent ordinary expenditure and 41,620,000 florins extraordinary expenditure to be raised by the mother country for national defence, making a total of 151,979,000. According to the "Times" Nos. 47796 and 47802 of September 22nd and October 4th, 1937, about 37,200,000 florins of this amount is to be devoted to increases in the navy, i.e. more than double the amount in 1937. The newspaper estimates the increase in next year's national defence expenditure at about 25,500,000 florins compared with the last financial year, without counting the increased expenditure for the proposed extension of the period of service and the increase in effectives. The ordinary defence estimates for 1938 are 30 % higher than in 1937 and 1936, while the extraordinary estimates are eight times as high as in 1937 and about five times as high as in 1936.

According to a draft law amending the Defence Law, which was introduced by the Government at the same time as the new defence estimates, the period of service of the infantry is in future to be extended to 11 months and the annual contingent of recruits is to be raised from 19,500 to 32,000 men, i.e. by more than half. In addition, it is proposed to abolish the system under which men have hitherto been exempted from military service on account of a brother having been called up and the system of payment in lieu of service, so that in future exemption can only be granted on the ground of incapacity for service. On account of the urgency of strengthening the army, these amendments are to be applied to the 1938 class. The annual cost of the draft law is estimated at about 12 million florins, to which must be added 5 millions for increases in active officers and n.c.o.'s necessitated by the amendments, i.e. a total of 17 millions per year. In addition there are non-recurring costs of 22 millions for the construction of new barracks ("Temps" No. 27775 of September, 25th, "France Militaire" No. 16755 of September 27th, 1937).

Netherlands Naval Policy and Estimates 1938. According to the "Times" No. 47806 of October 4th, 1937, of the 151,979,000 florins which the mother country will contribute in accordance with the 1938 estimates to the defence of the Netherlands and their possessions, £4,160,000, or approximately 37,232,000 florins is intended for increasing the navy, an amount which the "Times" describes in its leading article of October 4th as more than twice as high as the sum expended in 1937. The increase is mainly due to new shipbuilding. The new estimates provide for the following new constructions: 1 cruiser of an improved "De Ruyter" type to replace the "Sumatra" (launched on December 29th, 1920), 3 flotilla leaders, 6 submarines, 8 mine-layers and 12 mine-sweepers. These demands are all the more remarkable as the 1937 estimates already provided for the new construction of 2 destroyers, 4 submarines (ordered on April 11th, 1937) and 4 mine-sweepers. The fleet in the Netherlands Indies, in order to carry out its task, must, in accordance with a memorandum recently submitted by the Minister of Defence van Dijk to the Second Dutch Chamber, be raised as far as possible to the following strength: 3 cruisers, 2 flotilla leaders, 12 destroyers, 18 submarines and 72 aeroplanes. The cost of new construction for this purpose and for the requirements of the home fleet will amount to 17,500,000 florins per year (as against only 6,700,000 hitherto). The naval estimates for 1938 also include 2 million florins for arming merchant ships with guns, so that they may be used in case of war for guarding the Dutsch coast. ("De Standard", September 4th, and "Morning Post", No. 51555 of September 23rd, 1937.)

Italy

Italian Defence Estimates 1937/38. On January 13th the Cabinet approved the estimates for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937), providing the following amounts for defence: Army 2,491 million lire, Navy 1,793 million lire, Air Force 1,250 million lire, making a total of 5,534 million lire. As compared with the current financial year, the new estimates of the three arms show increases of 200, 250 and 280 millions respectively, making a total of 730 millions. The increase in expenditure (5,534 millions instead of 4,804 millions) thus amounts to 15.2 %. As the total State expenditure for 1937 is estimated at 23,770 million lire, the defence expenditure at 5,534 millions represents a proportion of 23.3 %. Other Ministries, however, also have military expenditure, for instance 1,614 millions for the Colonies and 1,794 millions for national education. ("Corriere della Sera" No. 9 of January 10th, "Forze Armate" No. 1176 of January 11th and "Temps" No. 27523 of January 14th, 1937.)

By a Royal Decree amending the estimates of 1936/37 and 1937/38 the following supplementary amounts making a total of 301 million lire were granted to accelerate military armament: 200 million lire as a first instalment for creating an army corps in Libya; 64 million lire to improve the air defence throughout the country; 37 million lire for extraordinary expenditure on technical material and work in connection with national defence.

Strengthening of Italian defensive power. The Grand Council of the Fascist Party decided at its meeting of March 1st, 1937, as a supplement to the four-year plan started in October of last year, upon a further suitable reinforcement of the Italian defensive power, the prolongation for five years of the duties entrusted to the General Commissariat for the manufacture of war material, the complete militarisation of all active forces of the nation between 18 and 55 years with the regular calling-up of annual classes that can be mobilised, and the attainment of a maximum of autarchy for military requirements with the extensive cooperation of science and technical skill, if necessary to the disregard of civil requirements. ("Daily Telegraph" No. 25,508, March 1st, "Forze Armate" No. 1198 and "Corriere della Sera" No. 53, both of March 3rd, 1937.)

Frontier Defence Corps. A law approved by the cabinet on April 13th, 1937 refers to the final organisation of the "Frontier defence corps" mentioned in the army estimates for 1936, which is to guard the defence works on the frontier and in case of emergency to serve as first covering troops. ("Forze Armate" No. 1215, April 14th, 1937.)

The Ministry for the Colonies was converted into a "Ministry for Italian Africa". A special head command was established for North Africa, under whose orders all the forces of the army, navy and airforce stationed in that area are placed. The Commander-in-Chief is the General Governor of Libya. ("Corriere della Sera" No. 87 of April 11th, 1937.)

Italian Naval Policy. In the report on the Navy Estimates for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937) submitted to the Chamber on April 6th, amounting to 1,858 million lire, i.e. about 250 millions more than in the previous year, the following statements are made on Italian naval policy: The most important events in recent times in the sphere of naval policy have been (1) the starting of the British naval base at Singapore, (2) the cancellation of the prohibition to fortify certain British, American and Japanese possessions in the western Pacific, and (3) Great Britain's desire for the most favourable possible naval base in the eastern Mediterranean. In view of these events and of the new Italian possessions overseas, attention must be called to the necessity of improving Italy's delicate position in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean. Italy's naval policy does not aim at a competition in naval armaments, but it must take account of the immense armaments prepared by the main Naval Powers. Special consideration is required for the development of naval bases and increased protection against air attacks by strengthening the naval air arm and the coast air force.

The Minister of Marine, Admiral Cavagnari, when presenting the new navy estimates in the Chamber, like the Rapporteur, pointed out that Italy was compelled to adapt herself to the armaments of the great Naval Powers. The increase in the estimates would make it possible during the next year to complete certain works which had already been begun in the naval bases of the home country and the colonies, and to take further steps to raise the preparedness for defence of the overseas possessions. A part of the new credits would go to increase the personnel, about 300 units of all kinds. As a proof of the accelerated rate of building in Italy, he stated that the two 7874 ton cruisers "Guiseppe Garibaldi" and "Duca degli Abruzzi" (speed over 35 knots; ten 15.2 cm. and eight 10 cm. guns; four aeroplanes) would be placed in commission in the near future, although they had only been launched a year ago. ("France Militaire" No. 16624 of April 23rd, 1937.)

In the "Corriere della Sera" No. 90 of April 15th, 1937, A. Ginocchietti examines the tasks of the Italian navy after the foundation of the Empire. The author starts with the decision of the Grand Fascist Council of March 1st this year to strengthen the Italian navy. The navy of Imperial Italy, he says, must be capable of protecting the Fascist fatherland wherever it may be necessary. The protection of interests does not merely include the safeguarding of the commercial sea routes. The much greater and most important problem is to create the necessary favourable conditions for the decisive naval battle. The future Italian fleet must therefore be a real battle fleet. In addition to the lighter surface and submarine forces essential for minor warfare, large, rapid, heavily armed and effectively armoured battle cruisers were to be demanded as the main core of the navy, i.e. ships which alone offered the possibility of holding their own under equal conditions against the most powerful adversaries of the enemy fleet. The Naval Powers ranked according to the number of powerful battleships which their navies possessed.

The Rise of the Italian Navy. Varo Varanini, in connection with the formation of a new battleship division from the battleships "Conte di Cavour" and "Giulio Cesare" which after their conversion have again been incorporated in the fleet, referred in "La Sera" ("Il Secolo") of June 11th, 1937 to the vast development of the Italian navy. The new battleship division was, he said, a first step in the development of the programme recently explained in Parliament by the Minister of Marine, Admiral Cavagnari, which aimed at the creation of a high sea fleet which would be ready for battle at all points. The naval manœuvres recently held in the Gulf of Naples had shown what had been achieved after the War: in 1921/22 they had begun with the three flotilla leaders of the "Leone" class (1526 tons) and the 6 torpedo boats of the General class (635 tons). These were followed, under the impulse of the Duce, by seven heavy Washington A cruisers (10,000 tons and 20.3 cm. guns), from "Trento" and "Trieste" in 1923/24 to the "Pola" in 1931. At the same time the twelve flotilla leaders of the Navigatori class (1628 tons and 12 cm. guns) were laid down in 1926/27; since 1927/28 the additions had been in all twelve light B cruisers (5000 to 8000 tons and 15.2 cm. guns), including in the first place the four first cruisers of the Condottieri class of 5000 tons, followed by eight more, namely two each of the "Cadorna", "Montecuccoli", "Duca d'Aosta" and "Garibaldi" types (the latter of 7874 tons). In 1934/35 four further flotilla leaders (1850 tons) were added. In addition the destroyer and submarine flotillas and the number of auxiliary ships were correspondingly increased. In spite of the scrapping of older ships which could not be used, the total tonnage had constantly increased since 1926. A new era of naval construction started with the laying down of the two battleships "Littorio" and "Vittorio Veneto" (begun in 1934: 35,000 tons; 38.1 cm. guns). From 1923 to 1936, the Italian navy had increased by about 150 new warships with an approximate total of 260,000 tons.

Launching of two Italian 35,000 ton battleships. The battleships "Vittorio Veneto" and "Littorio" were launched on July 25th at Trieste and August 22nd at Genoa respectively. Their main features are: displacement: 35,000 tons; length: 230 metres; speed: 30 knots; armament: nine 38.1 cm., twelve 15.2 cm., twelve 10 cm. anti-aircraft, 20 machine-guns, four aeroplanes. They were laid down on October 28th, 1934. Construction was delayed by the Abyssinian War, and the work was only fully reassumed at the end of 1935, so that the actual period of construction, as the Italian newspapers point out, has hitherto been only 19 months. When the two vessels are completed at the end of 1938 and during 1939 respectively, they will be the strongest in the world. The Italian navy will then possess the following modern vessels: six battleships, namely the two new ones and the four completely modernised older capital ships "Andrea Doria" and "Caio Duilio" (21,555 tons each), "Giulio Cesare" and "Conte di Cavour" (23,622 tons each); seven heavy A cruisers of 10,000 tons; 12 light B cruisers of approximately 5000 to 8000 tons; 15 larger destroyers (reconnaissance) of 1528 and 1628 tons; 44 destroyers of 845 to 1498 tons; 36 torpedo boats; 98 submarines. ("Forze Armate" No. 1254 and 1266 of July 26th and August 23rd, 1937).

In an article on "the Mediterranean problem" in the "Revue des Deux Mondes" of September 1st, 1937, the French naval writer, René La Bruyère describes the formation of a submarine fleet of about 100 submarines as "the sensational result" of Italian naval policy. This programme, he says, clearly shows Italy's determination to create a fleet which is in a position to close the connection between the western and eastern halves of the Mediterranean, especially as Italy is at the same time creating further bases and greatly developing her air force. In about eighteen months Italy will be the only Naval Power to possess entirely modern 35,000 ton battleships, as the French battleships "Richelieu" and "Jean Bart", and the five British battleships begun this year will not be ready by that time. The result for France will be a critical period of Italian naval superiority in the Mediterranean.

Norway

Norwegian Armaments. In connection with a journey of inspection by the Minister of Defence Monsen through northern Norway, various press organs wrote in favour of strengthening armaments. Deputy Colbörnsen (according to a report in "France Militaire" No. 16,710 of August 5th, 1937) urged the Government to raise the military credits to 55 million kr. a year. The estimates for 1937/38 contained 38 millions of defence expenditure, to which is added 7 millions granted on June 14th by the Storting as a first instalment of the 21 millions to be spent in the next three years on strengthening the defence. In the current financial year, therefore, 45 million kr. is available. The proposal of the deputy in question would accordingly mean an increase of 10 million kr. "France Militaire" pointed out that the Norwegian army was only reorganised in the autumn of 1936, the fortifications were improved and air defence was developed. The air force was to be increased in July this year from 64 to 160 aircraft. All these measures were due to the necessity of protecting the country against Russia's aspirations towards extension from the White Sea.

Reorganisation of Norwegian defence. The parliamentary National Defence Committee set up in March decided on April 28th to apply 21 million kr. over a period of three years for strengthening Norwegian defence. The money was to be raised by an increase in taxation on large incomes and by an extraordinary capital tax. The decision was approved by Parliament. The Conservatives had demanded 90 million kr. for armaments ("Temps" No. 27629 of April 30th, 1937).

Norwegian Navy Estimates 1937/38. The navy estimates for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937) amount to about 12,710,000 kr.

of ordinary expenditure (as against 11,800,000 in the current year); in addition, there are 700,000 kr. from the Crisis Fund as in the previous year and 1,620,000 kr. in the special estimates of the coast artillery (previously 1,530,000 kr.). Accordingly the total estimates for the navy in the new financial year amount to 15,030,000 kr. as against 14 millions for 1936/37. The increase of 1,030,000 kr., of which 568,580 kr. is in the normal estimates, is partly due to the slight increase in vessels placed in commission. New construction calls for 2,872,000 kr. in the ordinary estimate and the above-mentioned 700,000 kr. in the crisis estimate, making a total of 3,572,000 kr. (as against 3,500,000 kr. in the previous year). This will defray the cost of the continuation of the two torpedo boats "Sleipner" and "Aegir" and the commencement of a further torpedo boat of this class. The new Norwegian total estimates for 1937/38 amount to approximately 522 million kr., i.e. 28,200,000 kr. more than in the previous year. Of this amount national defence calls for 38 million kr. ("Tidskrift for Sövaesen" III. 37, "Temps" No. 27642 of May 14th, 1937.)

Poland

1. French Defence Loan and Armaments Credits. The Franco-Polish agreement concluded on September 6th, 1936 during the Paris visit of Marshal Smigly-Rydz and worked out in detail on November 30th, 1936 regarding a loan and credits for the purchase of Polish war material in France and for the erection of arms factories in Poland was approved by the French Chamber on December 29th, 1936 and by the Polish Sejm on January 5th, 1937. Including the former railway loan (of 540 million francs), the loan amounts to a total of 2,600 million francs (approximately 650 million zloty), i.e. 1,350 million francs as a long-term loan payable in cash in four annual instalments for armaments purposes (nearly 337 million zloty), and 1,250 million francs as a military credit, of which four-fifths is to be used for supplies of war material from France and the remainder for erecting arms factories in Poland. ("Times" No. 47546, 47565, 47569 and 47572 of December 1st, 23rd and 30th, 1936 and January 2nd, 1937.) The supply of the first instalment in cash and material, according to the "Times" No. 47575 of January 6th, 1937, began in January.

2. Four-Year Armaments Plan. On January 22nd the Cabinet decided upon an armaments plan extending over four years, according to which a total of 1,000 million zloty is to be transferred to the National Defence Fund in the years 1937 to 1940. The amounts will be covered at first from the French loan, and later from internal loans and credits. ("France Militaire" No. 16556, Feb. 2nd, 1937.) M. Kwiatkowski, Minister of Finance and Vice-President of the Cabinet, gave an account of the Four-Year Plan in the Sejm on February 5th. He said the armaments plan formed a part of the programme of public works over a period of four years requiring the total amount of 2,500 million zloty. The original Four-Year Plan of June 1936 (1,800 million zloty) would thereby be considerably extended out of military considerations. It had been decided for military reasons to create a new armaments industrial district in the centre of Poland in the neighbourhood of the town of Sandomierz (Sandomir) on the Vistula, about 180 km. to the south of Warsaw, a district that was well equipped with natural resources (water power, gas, oil). The plant would be completed in about ten years and would take over the industrial works of importance for national defence which were now scattered about, and those situated in an unprotected position near the frontier in Upper Silesia. The programme of public works provided for a first instalment of 800 million zloty for 1937, including 136 millions from the French loan. ("Times", No. 47603, "Daily Telegraph", No. 25490, "Morning Post", No. 51361, all of February 8th, 1937.)

Sweden

Swedish Defence Estimates 1937/38. The defence estimates for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937) amount to 170,560,000 kr.,

namely : army 99,480,000 ; navy 45,570,000 ; air force 22,970,000 ; joint expenditure (Ministry etc.) 2,540,000. In comparison with the current year, the new estimates require almost 500,000 kr. more ; but on considering a refund from pay deductions for pensions which occurs in the new estimates for the first time, the actual increase in expenditure is more than 1,500,000 kr. The surpassing of the normal budget of 148 million kr. established by the Defence Ordinance of 1936 by the amount of 22,500,000 kr. is due, accordingly to the "Ny Militär Tidskrift" of January 1937, to allowances for increased cost of living, the higher cost of materials for the army and coast artillery in the years 1936-37 to 1938/39 and increases in prices since last year. Of the 79,500,000 kr. provided in the ten-year armaments plan for the improvement of army and air material, of which 50 millions is to be allotted to the first three years 1936/37 to 1938/39 and the remaining 29,500,000 kr. to the ten years from 1936/37, 17 millions and 7,750,000 are included in the new estimates, the latter amount mainly for air material, making a total of 24,750,000 kr. (as against 17,000,000 and 5,850,000, making a total of 22,850,000 in the previous year). The increase in personnel planned for 1937 to 1940 is already taken into account in next year's estimates to the extent of one-third. The increase comes into force in the army administration and air force on July 1st and in other departments on October 1st. According to the plan, an annual amount of 9,800,000 kr. is provided for aircraft, to which is added a non-recurring amount of 993,000 kr. The changes in organisation, as reported by the "Temps" No. 27,554 of February 14th, 1937, include the appointment of a higher command and the creation of a common Defence Staff for the army, navy and air force.

New Swedish Naval Construction Plan. The Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, Vice-Admiral de Champs, submitted a Memorandum to the Government on the necessary reinforcement of the Swedish navy, its reorganisation and the question of types of ships which had been under discussion for a long time. According to "Tidens Tegn" of September 4th, the "Times" No. 47782 of September 6th and "Tidskrift i Sjöväsendet", IX, 1937, which give extracts from the report to the Swedish Naval Officers' Association by Lieutenant-Captain Ericson, who is on the staff of the Commander-in-Chief, the memorandum contains the following proposals : 1. New Construction. In amendment and extension of last year's ten-year building plan for 1936/37 to 1945/46, the following are to be built in the five financial years 1938/39 to 1942/43 : 3 armoured cruisers (of 8000 tons, six 21 cm. guns, speed 28 to 30 knots, cost 34,600,000 kr. each, making a total of 103,800,000 kr.) ; 4 torpedo boats (4,300,000 kr. each, total 17,200,000 kr.) ; 3 small submarines for coast defence (2,500,000 each, total 7,500,000 kr.) ; 1 submarine depot ship 3,600,000 kr., 12 torpedo motor boats (together 7,500,000 kr.) ; 2 destroyers of an improved "Ehrenschild" type (about 1000 tons each) instead of the two small destroyers to be built according to previous plans in the years 1941/45 (extra expenditure 4,000,000 kr.). The following are also considered necessary : 500,000 kr. to increase docks and 600,000 kr. for various purposes. The total cost of the supplementary five-year building plan thus amounts to 145,200,000 kr. The "Tidskrift i Sjöväsendet", IX, 1937, estimates the total cost of construction during the five years in question at 185 million kr. 2. Reorganisation of the navy. It is proposed to create two fleets, one in the east and one in the west. The Baltic fleet would consist of the existing armoured ships, 2 destroyer flotillas, 1 torpedo boat flotilla and 4 submarine flotillas, while the west coast fleet would have to comprise 1 armoured cruisers, 1 destroyer flotilla, 1 torpedo boat flotilla and some older submarines.

The Memorandum gives the following considerations as grounds for these proposals. The Swedish navy has to fulfil the following main tasks within the total national defence : cooperation in preventing landing attempts by foreign forces, defence of the islands and of the parts of the coast not protected by the skerries and protection of merchant shipping. As regards the last point a totally new position has arisen by the stationing of strong foreign forces suitable for warfare on the high seas in the Antarctic. The Swedish navy must therefore be better able than in the past not only to operate in the skerries and coastal waters but also on the high seas, and to meet an attack from the east and a threat from the west. The possibility must be counted on that foreign attacking Powers may use their battleships against Sweden.

Soviet Russia

Russian Defence Estimates 1937. According to the "Times", No. 47583 of January 15th, 1937, the new Russian defence estimates for the calendar year 1937 amounting to 20,102 million roubles were adopted by the Central Executive Committee on January 13th. To this sum must be added, as the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25467 of January 12th, 1937 reports, 2000 million roubles included for the first time in the estimates of the new Commissariat for the Armaments Industry, so that the direct armaments expenditure is calculated at 22,102 millions. In comparison with the total State expenditure for 1937 which, according to the above-mentioned issue of the "Times", amounts to 97,700 million roubles, the percentage would be about 22.6 %. As the "Daily Telegraph" No. 25463 of January 7th, 1937 points out, however, this figure is not comparable with the percentages of defence expenditure in other countries ; for the Russian Estimates include considerable amounts (according to the experience in previous years more than a quarter of the total) which according to general budgetary ideas are not usually regarded as State expenditure. Mention may be made, for instance, of the State subsidies for Russian socialised economy. In addition, the estimates of other Ministries in many cases contain items which serve military purposes. After taking these considerations into account, the above-mentioned percentage of 22.6 % representing the ratio of military expenditure to the total State expenditure should be increased to 30 or 35 %. The increase in this year's Russian defence estimates as compared with the previous year amounts to 7,286 million roubles (22,102 millions less 14,816 millions) or 49.2 %. When compared with the year 1932, in which the Russian defence estimates amounted to 1,279 millions, they will be found to have increased 17 times.

As an explanation of the gigantic increase in the Russian armaments expenditure, the Commissary of Finance Grinko gave as one reason the news that the Russian defence treasury must in future pay the general prices for supplies obtained in the country, while the War Commissariat had hitherto been charged very low special prices. But, according to the "Nation Belge" No. 13 of January 13th, 1937, he added that the increase in expenditure was mainly due to the measures decided upon last year for a general increase in Russian armaments : inter alia, the doubling of the effectives of the army (from 1,500,000 to 3 millions), the strengthening of the air force and the development of the navy.

Russia's naval plans. "France Militaire" No. 16632 of May 3rd, 1937 gives details taken from reports in the "New York Herald Tribune" (Paris Edition) and the "Daily Herald" regarding the great Russian naval plans announced by Admiral Orlov, Commander-in-Chief of the Russian naval forces, at the Soviet Congress in November last year. According to these plans, Russia intends as from the present year to lay down in the first place two battleships of 35,000 tons and ten cruisers. During the naval negotiations which took place a short time ago in London the Russian Government was granted by England naval equality with Germany and it now desires the recognition of naval equality with Japan. Russia at present possesses 130 submarines, though most of them are of the coastal type and not suited for high seas. A considerable number of the submarines are in the Pacific. "France Militaire" recalls the statement by the Japanese Minister of the Interior Suhiyama that Japan must draw her own conclusions from the great Russian rearmament on land, at sea and in the air, and must also increase her own forces. The Japanese six-year plan, he said, takes account of this requirement.

The "Morning Post" No. 51419 of April 17th, 1937 learns from Washington that the Soviet Union is endeavouring to obtain technical assistance from the United States in developing the navy. Two American shipyards, it states, have received orders for the supply of plans, materials and equipment for a modern battleship to be built in Russia with 40.0 cm. guns. The American Government has, however, not yet given its consent.

According to "France Militaire" No. 16734 of September 2nd, 1937, Russia has ordered several warships from the United States, including three battleships of the latest construction, of 35,000 tons with a main armament of nine 40.6 cm. guns. Reserve tubes are to be supplied for these guns, as Russia is not in a position to manufacture them. The total order will amount to about 175 million dollars. The "Daily Telegraph" No. 25646 of August 10th, 1937 calculates a building period of four years.

The "Daily Telegraph" No. 25506 of February 26th, 1937, also estimated the total number of Russian submarines at the beginning of this year at 130. The danger of the Russian submarines stationed in the Pacific for Japan was, it said, obvious, when it was remembered that Vladivostok was only about 400 sea miles from the west coast of the main Japanese island. The Russian Pacific fleet was increased on an average by one new submarine per month, so that there would be more than 50 Russian submarines there at the end of this year.

Czechoslovakia

Increase in the Czechoslovak Defence Estimates. The "France Militaire" No. 16,705 of July 30th, 1937 reports from the "Lidove Noviny" that next year's Czechoslovak defence estimates for 1938 show an increase of 700 million kr., mainly for increasing the personnel of the army. The ordinary defence estimates, which amounted to 1,360 million kr. in 1937, will thus be increased for 1938 to 2,060 million kr., so that the total defence expenditure of the War Ministry, including the annual amount of 315 millions from the Armaments Fund, will amount to 2,375 million kr.

Reorganisation of the Czechoslovak Army. According to the "France Militaire" No. 16664 of June 11th, 1937, the Czechoslovak army has been redivided. Until 1937 there were 4 district military commands, in Prague (for Bohemia), Brno (Moravia-Silesia), Bratislava (Slovakia) and Kaschau (Sub-Carpathian Russia). Recently, instead of these the following 7 army corps have been created: 1st Army Corps, staff at Prague (comprises a part of Bohemia), 3 infantry divisions; 2nd Army Corps, Königgrätz (remainder of Bohemia), 2 infantry divisions; 3rd Army Corps, Brno (south west of Moravia-Silesia), 1 infantry division; 4th Army Corps, Olmütz (remainder of Moravia-Silesia), 2 infantry divisions; 5th Army Corps, Trentschin (North West Slovakia), 1 infantry division and 1 brigade of mountain infantry; 6th Army Corps, Kaschau (Eastern Slovakia), 2 infantry divisions and 1 infantry brigade; 7th Army Corps, Neusohl (remainder of Slovakia), 2 infantry divisions and 1 brigade of mountain infantry. In all 12 infantry divisions, 2 infantry brigades and 2 mountain brigades. The paper observes that some parts of this reorganisation are possibly not yet to be regarded as final, especially the distribution of the divisions among the army corps. It states that at present each Czechoslovak infantry division has 2 infantry brigades consisting of 2 regiments each. It was observable at the last manoeuvres that certain divisions had only 3 infantry regiments, and it is possible that this organisation may be finally adopted for the Czechoslovak army.

Increase in the Czechoslovak Army Effectives. By means of an addition to the Defence Law, the Czechoslovak Minister of Defence was empowered, with the consent of the Government, to raise the annual contingent of recruits to an unlimited extent beyond 70,000 men if this appeared necessary in the interest of national defence. Hitherto the Minister of Defence was only entitled under a supplement of May 11th, 1932 to the Defence Law to exceed the limit of 70,000 conscripts originally fixed by at most 5000 men with the consent of the Government. This limitation is now repealed so that there will be a possibility in future of raising the contingent solely by means of a decree within the discretion of the Government. ("France Militaire" No. 16,572 of February 20th, 1937.)

United States

Further increase in the American armaments expenditure for 1937/38. The Budget message sent by President Roosevelt to Congress on January 8th for 1937/38 (from July 1st, 1937), as in previous years shows a considerable increase in the ordinary expenditure for national defence. According to the estimates published in the "Army and Navy Journal" of January 9th, 1937 and the memorandum on the subject, provision is made for 416,486,000 dollars for the army (including the War Department) and 563,996,000 dollars for the Navy; the total defence expenditure, therefore, amounts to 980,482,000 of nearly 1000 million dollars. In the financial year 1936/37 (up to June 30th, 1937), the army estimate adopted by Congress amounted to 388,245,000 dollars and the navy estimate to 529,820,000 dollars, making a total of 918,065,000 dollars; the increase is therefore 62,417,000 dollars. In the financial year 1935/36 the defence estimates amounted to 744,800,000 dollars and in 1934/35 to only 533,600,000 dollars. In comparison with the total estimated State expenditure of 6,158 million dollars for 1937/38, the new defence estimates represent nearly 16 %. The "Morning Post" No. 51,336 of January 9th, 1937 calculates that the sums available next year for military purposes from the fund for providing work amount to about 10,835,000 dollars which would be additional to the above 980,482,000 dollars. (Also the "Times" No. 47,578 of January 9th, 1937.)

The final amount of the new army estimates is 28,241,000 dollars higher for purely military expenditure than the last estimates approved. As regards the regular army, provision is made for an active strength of an average of 12,175 officers and 165,000 men (previously 156,000); the national guard is to consist of 205,000 officers and men (previously 200,000); 25,000 officers of the reserve (out of 95,000) are to practise 14 days (previously 20,000), and 35,000 men are to attend the civil training school for 30 days (previously 31,500). 172,000 scholars and students will receive military training.

The Army Air Arm will be allotted in the new financial year 60,500,000 dollars of direct expenditure within the army estimates, instead of 59,400,000 dollars in the current year, i.e. 1,100,000 dollars more. 449 additional aeroplanes will be provided for the active army and 81 for the National Guard and the organised reserve. In the next two years, a total of 2320 army aeroplanes is to be reached.

Development of the American Army Air Arm. In the Army and Navy Register of September 25th, 1937. Major General Westover, Commander-in-Chief of the Army Air Arm, gives the following table in order to meet unjustified criticism and prove that the amounts granted for the Army Air Arm as compared with the total military expenditure of the War Department has constantly shown a rising percentage in recent years (in round millions of Dollars).

Financial Year	Army Expenditure Total	Army Air Arm, direct and indirect expenditure	Percentage
1933/34	243,33	53,42	21,96
1934/35	273,49	68,37	24,99
1935/36	382,65	85,84	22,43
1936/37	394,10	96,87	24,58
1937/38	393,46	101,85	25,89

In a further table, he shows that the personnel of the Army Air Arm has also constantly increased. The figures are as follows : 1933/34 : 1299 officers and 14,316 men ; 1934/35 : 1303 and 14,720 ; 1935/36 : 1359 and 15,640 ; 1936/37 : 1408 and 17,286.

Reorganisation of the American Fleet. The proposed reorganisation is intended to give the battle force a maximum of fighting power, to equip the scouting force better for its duties by transferring to it the patrol aircraft squadrons, and to ensure greater striking power by closer tactical connection between the two forces. At the same time all the destroyers are to be combined under a sole command, a measure which has constantly had to be postponed on account of lack of cruisers in the scouting force, thus rendering possible a more regular training. ("Times", No. 47,797 of September 23rd, "Army and Navy Journal", September 25th and October 2nd, 1937.)

Since October 1st, 1937, all the destroyers of the scouting force have been transferred to the battle force, while at the same time the 17 patrol aircraft squadrons which have hitherto belonged to the base force have been transferred to the scouting force. Both the battle force and the scouting force are, as in the past, stationed in the Pacific.

According to the reorganisation plan of the American fleet published in the "Army and Navy Journal" of October 2nd, 1937, the home fleet, after the changes proposed in the financial year 1937/38 (July 1st to June 30th) have been carried out, will be made up as follows : 1. Battle Force. a) Battleships : 4 divisions with a total of 12 battleships (3 with 40.6 cm. guns and 9 with 35.6 cm. guns). b) Cruisers : 2 divisions with a total of 8 light B cruisers (7050 tons) ; a further division is to be added later with 2 new light B cruisers (10,000 tons ; 15.2 cm.) ; making in all 10 light B cruisers. c) Destroyers : 2 destroyer flotillas with a total of 7 destroyer squadrons (of 9 destroyers in 2 divisions) and one single division (4 destroyers) which will be extended in 1938/39 to a squadron. Total 67 destroyers. In addition in each flotilla 1 light cruiser as leader. d) Aircraft carriers : 1 division with "Saratoga", "Lexington", "Ranger" ; to be added later a second division with "Yorktown" and "Enterprise" after they are completed. e) Mine vessels : 1 mine squadron with 2 divisions, with a total of 9 mine-layers or mine-sweepers. 2. Scouting Force. a) Cruisers : 4 divisions with a total of 16 heavy A cruisers (10,000 tons, 20.3 cm.). b) Aircraft carriers and depot ships : 5 scouting formations (Patrol Wings), inter alia in Coco Colo (Colon) and Pearl Harbour (Hawaii), with aircraft-carrier "Wright", aircraft-carrier "Langley" and a number of small tenders. In addition, 17 patrol aircraft squadrons, 2 each on "Wright", "Langley" and "Thrush" (Norfolk), 3 each on "Owl" (Seattle) and in Coco Colo, 5 in Pearl Harbour. 3. Submarine fleet. With the battle force 1 squadron with 2 divisions, making in all 12 submarines ; in New London 8 submarines, in Pearl Harbour 2 divisions with 10 submarines ; total 36 submarines. 4. Training Squadron : 3 battleships, "New York", "Texas", "Arkansas" and the battleship "Wyoming" which has been converted into a training ship under the London Agreement of 1930.

The American Navy Estimates for 1938. According to the Army and Navy Journal of April 17th, 1937, the Navy Estimates for 1938 (1937/38, starting July, 1st 1937), after the discussions in both houses of Congress, now amount to 516,258,000 dollars. As compared with the preliminary estimate of the Navy Department of 563,996,000 dollars, therefore, a cut of 47,738,000 dollars has been made. On comparing the above new estimate of about 516 million dollars with the estimate for the current year 1937 (1936/37), the final amount of which was 526,546,000 dollars, it should be borne in mind that the defence estimates for 1936/37, according to the Army and Navy Journal of April 24th, 1937, were cut by 47,881,000 dollars in January this year as the result of an economy by the President in order to reduce the total deficit on the American budget. As these economies are mainly connected with a delay in shipbuilding, the greater part of the sum of 47,881,000 dollars doubtless falls on the Navy, so that the real naval expenditure for 1936/37 is only about 480 million dollars. The estimate for 1937/38, amounting to approximately 516 million dollars, therefore in practice represents a substantial increase over the current year.

THE THREE-POWER AGREEMENT AGAINST THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL

I. GERMAN-JAPANESE AGREEMENT AGAINST THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL OF NOVEMBER 25TH, 1936

The Government of the German Reich and the Imperial Japanese Government, recognizing that the aim of the Communist International, known as the Comintern, is to disintegrate and subdue existing States by all the means at its command ; convinced that the toleration of interference by the Communist International in the internal affairs of the nations not only endangers their internal peace and social wellbeing, but is also a menace to the peace of the world ; desirous of cooperating in the defence against Communist subversive activities ; have agreed as follows :

Article I.

The High Contracting States agree to inform one another of the activities of the Communist International, to consult with one another on the necessary preventive measures, and to carry these through in close collaboration.

Article II.

The High Contracting Parties will jointly invite third States whose internal peace is threatened by the subversive activities of the Communist International to adopt defensive measures in the spirit of this agreement or to take part in the present agreement.

Article III.

The German as well as the Japanese text of the present agreement is to be deemed the original text. It comes into force on the day of signature and shall remain in force for a period of five years. Before the expiry of this period the High Contracting Parties will come to an understanding over the further method of their cooperation.

In witness whereof the undersigned, being duly and properly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement and affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Berlin on November 25th, 1936—that is, November 25th of the 11th year of Showa Period.

(Signed) von Ribbentrop, Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary Ambassador of the German Reich.

(Signed) Mushakoji, Imperial Japanese Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary Ambassador.

Additional Protocol to the Agreement against the Communist International of November 25th, 1936

On the occasion of the signing to-day of the agreement against the Communist International, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have agreed as follows :

(a) The competent authorities of the two High Contracting States will work in close collaboration in matters concerning the exchange of information over the activity of the Communist International as well as investigatory and defensive measures against the Communist International.

(b) The competent authorities of the two High Contracting States will within the framework of the existing laws take severe measures against those who at home or abroad are engaged directly or indirectly in the service of the Communist International or promote its subversive activities.

(c) In order to facilitate the cooperation of the competent authorities provided for in paragraph (a) a permanent committee will be set up. In this committee the further defensive measures necessary for the struggle against the subversive activities of the Communist International will be considered and discussed.

The protocol is also signed by Herr von Ribbentrop and the Japanese Ambassador.

Statement by the German Government on November 25th, 1936

By this agreement concluded between the Government of the German Reich and the Imperial Japanese Government, a light has finally been cast into the thick mists with which the Communist International endeavoured to cover Europe and the whole world.

Two Great Powers have thus united in a strong and firm declaration that they will neither give way nor capitulate before the threats of red anarchy.

This agreement states with complete clearness that it merely relates to defensive action. For it is not the two High Contracting Parties that have challenged the Communist International, but it is the Communist International that has endeavoured to disturb the world to its depths and to hurl it into the most serious and scarcely imaginable confusion by means of an uninterrupted series of provocative acts, attempts at revolutionary risings, anarchistic subversive movements and unscrupulous tendencies of national disintegration.

The Government of the German Reich and the Imperial Japanese Government, in defending themselves against these attempts by the means which they think fit, are not only exercising their own right but are carrying out their political and moral duty. For the revolutionary tendencies of the Communist International not only threaten in the most serious manner the entire civilised world but wantonly play with the most sacred possessions of the nations. It is therefore expressly emphasised in the agreement concluded to-day that its aim is to serve the maintenance of internal peace and social well-being, and also of world peace.

In view of the fact that in Article II the High Contracting Parties jointly invite other States whose internal peace is threatened by the subversive activities of the Communist International to adopt defensive measures or to take part in this agreement, it is made perfectly clear that the agreement is directed against no one, but that its sole aim is to oppose a clear and unmistakable halt to the revolutionary attempts of the Moscow International.

The National Socialist movement from the first day of its existence has most consistently waged the fight against Communism. It has had to sacrifice over four hundred killed and tens of thousands of wounded to the murderous activities of the Communist International. It knows Bolshevism. And it hopes that it is also known to Bolshevism.

Since the Führer assumed power, the National Socialist German Reich has taken upon itself on the widest front this struggle of the National Socialist movement. Both the movement and the Reich have very clearly recognised the acute danger to which the civilised nations are exposed by the Communist International and they have shown the necessary determination and courage to remove it unscrupulously and radically from Germany. The Reich and the nation are now proof against Bolshevism.

The Moscow Red International, for its part, since the assumption of power by the Führer, has left no means untried to regain in other ways the position in Germany which it lost through the victory of National Socialism.

In a wide-spread, infamous world propaganda it is endeavouring to incite the nations of the whole world against Germany; it would be prepared at any time, if it were able, to overthrow National Socialist Germany in a sanguinary war.

These attempts at encirclement have failed all along the line. A strong army now protects the frontiers of our Reich.

The propagandist strangling manoeuvres of the Moscow Red International have, however, been thrown back by Germany with courageous and stubborn tenacity; at our Party Congresses in Nuremberg we have even gone over to the attack on these attempts.

How necessary it was to avert this danger from Germany has received a bloody example and terrible proof in the countless violated Spanish women, the innumerable tortured and tormented children, the murdered families, burning churches and towns laid waste.

Germany has opposed an unsurmountable obstacle to these red subversive intentions.

The most profound practical effect of our consistent struggle against Bolshevism, however, is the agreement concluded to-day between Germany and Japan. Two civilised States thus openly defend themselves against the devilish attempts of the Communist International. They show the world how this danger must be met with complete clearness and firmness.

This agreement is intended to make a valuable contribution to the peace of the world, which is threatened in the most serious manner by the unscrupulous machinations of the Communist International. It makes it perfectly clear that the High Contracting Parties do not desire to provoke, but will no longer allow themselves to be provoked.

The German nation will, however, look forward with calm security to any future developments. The German Government is on guard and will know how to ward off any impending danger with the proper means. An enemy to the Communist International has arisen that knows communism and therefore attacks it effectively.

May other nations learn from this, so that the agreement may really be a beginning in the struggle against the menace to the highest cultural possessions of mankind and therefore in favour of true world peace.

Statement by the Japanese Government, of November 25th, 1936

On the occasion of the signature of the German-Japanese agreement, the Japanese Government made a statement on November 25th, 1936 to the effect that, since the foundation of the Communist International which, with its headquarters in Moscow, aimed at the destruction of the national and social structure of every country, the Comintern in accordance with its principles of world revolution had undertaken actions which profoundly threaten world peace.

At the VIIth Comintern Congress, it was decided to form a united front to combat Fascism and Imperialism, directed mainly against Japan, Germany and Poland. The same applied to the support of communist armies in China to fight against Japan.

A glance at the events in Spain would suffice to convince anyone of the extraordinary importance and of the malevolent influence of the Comintern on the well-being of the nations and on the peace of the world. In particular, the countries which protested to the Soviet Government against the activity of the Communist International during the Comintern Congress should be aware of the harmful effect of that organisation.

Like China, which was exposed to the ravages of the communist armies, Outer Mongolia and Sinkiang also suffered from the machinations of the Comintern. In Manchukuo the Comintern had endeavoured by forming district committees to win robber gangs and to use them for their aims. In Japan, where the extreme left for a time lost power after the Manchurian events, the energy of the communist movement was again increased after the VIIth Congress of the Comintern.

The Japanese Government had, it was true, always carried on an unequivocal policy in respect of the Comintern. In view of the increasing danger, however, Japan was now compelled, in order to safeguard her security and to maintain peace in Eastern Asia, to take stronger defensive measures.

As the organisation and activity of the Comintern was international in character, every measure of defence must be taken in international cooperation. Germany had taken firm action against Communism since 1933. Japan and Germany were in a similar position in respect of the Comintern. The Japanese Government had therefore found it necessary to conclude an agreement which represented the first step in defence against Communism.

The agreement related to joint defence against the subversive measures of the Comintern and provided for the exchange of information regarding the activity of the Communist International. Its object was consultation and the execution of defensive measures with the possible inclusion of further Powers.

In conclusion, the Japanese Government refers to the Additional Protocol to the Agreement and expresses its desire that as many States as possible may adhere to the defensive measures against the danger of the Comintern. Lastly it specially points out that there are no other arrangements at the side of this agreement, that Japan has no intention of forming any special international bloc and that the agreement is not directed against any third country.

Statement by Ambassador von Ribbentrop on November 25th, 1936

At the VIIth Comintern Congress, Bolshevism declared war to the death on all order-loving States, and proclaimed as its object the carrying out of the revolution in all States and the foundation of the Bolshevik world dictatorship.

The latest victim of this desire for destruction on the part of the Bolshevik mischief-makers is Spain. That country of old European culture is to-day laid waste by civil war, its towns and villages are everywhere in ruins, and the Spanish nation is subject to afflictions and agonies which are scarcely paralleled in history.

These are the dreadful results of the interference of the Communist International in execution of the decisions taken at the VIIth Comintern Congress. The Comintern had nothing else in mind than to start the "Soviet Republic of Spain" by propaganda and violence, in order to continue from there to undermine Europe. Who is to be the next victim?

Many States, for instance America, have raised the sharpest protest against the decisions of the VIIth Comintern Congress but without result.

Germany and Japan, who are not prepared to tolerate any longer the machinations of communist mischief-makers have now taken action.

The conclusion of the agreement that has been signed to-day by Germany and Japan against the Communist International is an epoch-making event. It is a turning point in the defensive struggle of all nations loving order and civilisation against the forces of subversion.

By the conclusion of this agreement our Führer and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan have carried out an historical act which will only be appreciated to its full extent by coming generations.

To-day a strong defensive front of two nations has been formed, and they are equally determined to bring about the failure of any attempts at interference by the Communist International in their countries.

Japan will never permit the spread of Bolshevism in Eastern Asia. Germany forms the bulwark against this plague in the heart of Europe. Lastly Italy, as the Duce has declared to the world, will hold high the anti-Bolshevist banner in the south.

I am convinced that the countries which are not yet aware of the Bolshevik danger will one day be grateful to our Führer for having recognised clearly and in good time this menace to the world.

The agreement provides for an invitation to other States to take part in this struggle.

We desire and hope that the other civilised States will recognise the necessity of the concentration of all against the work of the Communist International and will adhere to this agreement. In this way it will be possible definitely to ward off this world enemy, to maintain internal and external peace and to save our ancient culture.

Statement by the Japanese Ambassador, Count Mushakoji, on November 25th, 1936

I wish to express my sincere pleasure that the agreement against the Communist International has to-day been concluded between Japan and Germany.

The Communist International, as is generally known, is an international organisation which possesses its cells throughout the world and aims at the subversion and violation of existing States.

As the interference of the Communist International in the internal affairs of the nations not only endangers their internal peace and social well-being, but also threatens world peace as a whole, it is natural that every civilised State for reasons of self-maintenance should protect the life and well-being of its own people against this danger. It should be pointed out that there is only one effective means of guarding against this international communist organisation, namely the cooperation of the States.

Japan and Germany, against whom the decision of the VIIth Comintern Congress is specially directed, feel themselves to be the most threatened by the subversive work of the Communist International and are therefore the first to decide to unite against this danger.

I am convinced that the Japanese Empire under the glorious régime of His Majesty the Emperor and New Germany under the heroic leadership of the Führer and Chancellor will, as guarantors of world peace in the East and West, contribute by this step to the pacification on the world.

II. ITALY'S ACCESSION TO THE GERMAN-JAPANESE AGREEMENT ON NOVEMBER 6TH, 1937

On November 6th, 1937 a Protocol was signed at the Palazzo Chigi in Rome, by which Italy accedes to the Agreement against the Communist International concluded on November 25th, 1936 between Germany and Japan. The protocol was signed: for Italy by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Galeazzo Ciano; for Germany by the Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the German Reich, Herr von Ribbentrop; for Japan by the Ambassador Hotta.

Protocol

The Government of the German Reich,
The Italian Government and
The Imperial Japanese Government,

Considering that the Communist International continues constantly to endanger the civilised world in the West and East, disturbs and destroys its peace and order,

Convinced that close cooperation between all States interested in maintaining peace and order can alone diminish and remove this danger,

Considering that Italy, which since the beginning of the Fascist Government has combated this danger with inflexible determination and has eradicated the Communist International in its territory, has decided to take its place against the common enemy side by side with Germany and Japan who for their part are animated by the same desire to guard against the Communist International,

Have agreed as follows, in accordance with Article II of the Agreement against the Communist International concluded on November 25th, 1936 in Berlin between Germany and Japan:

Article I.

Italy accedes to the Agreement against the Communist International together with the Additional Protocol, concluded between Germany and Japan on November 25th, 1936, a copy of which is annexed.

Article II.

The three Powers signing the present Protocol agree that Italy shall be considered as an original signatory of the Agreement and Additional Protocol mentioned in the preceding article, the signature of the present Protocol being equivalent to the signature of the original text of the said Agreement and Additional Protocol.

Article III.

The present Protocol is considered as an integral part of the above-mentioned Agreement and Additional Protocol.

Article IV.

The present Protocol is drawn up in the German, Italian and Japanese languages, each text being regarded as an original. It comes into force on the date of signature.

In faith whereof the undersigned, being duly authorised by their respective Governments, have signed this Protocol and thereto attached their seals.

Done in triplicate at Rome, the 6th November 1937—in the XVIth year of the Fascist era, i.e. the 6th November of the 12th year of the Showa period.

Signed. Joachim von Ribbentrop.

Signed. Ciano.

Signed. M. Hotta.

* * *

After the signature of the Protocol, Ambassador von Ribbentrop made the following statement:

"The agreement concluded to-day between Germany, Italy and Japan to guard against communism is an event of historic importance, for by this means a powerful and definite halt is called to the further menace to the world from the Third International."

The subversion of national States by Bolshevik propaganda within as a preparation for armed intervention from without is still the aim of the Comintern. This agreement, which is not directed against any State and is open to others is therefore a guarantee for the free development of the national life of the peoples and a guarantee for world peace."

The Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, said:

"With the signature of the Three-Power Pact, the three Great Powers, Italy, Germany and Japan, combine against the dangers of Bolshevism. The healthy and constructive forces of all civilised countries will be at one with them."

The Three-Power Pact pursues no secret aims. It is not directed against any State and it is open to all States who desire to join with us in joint action. It is an instrument that is placed realistically in the service of peace and of the civilisation which Fascism has maintained and will defend against every danger."

The Japanese Ambassador Hotta made the following statement:

"Italy, Germany and Japan, in signing a protocol, have desired to express their determination to protect themselves against the Communist International which threatens the peace and order of the world. As the three countries belong by their tradition to the oldest nations and by their claims to the youngest and are at the same time the most industrious in their national existence, I have not the slightest doubt that the agreement will have a good influence and will show fruitful results."

Mussolini's Telegram to the Führer

"I thank Your Excellency for the message which you have sent me today and which has given me great pleasure. With the Anti-Communist Pact concluded today, Fascist Italy and National Socialist Germany have formed a new bond of community and agreement with each other and with Japan for the joint defence of civilisation and of world peace. I request you to accept my congratulations and my friendly personal greetings. Mussolini."

Telegram from the Japanese Prime Minister, Prince Konoye, to the Führer

"In the conviction that the protocol signed today by the representatives of Germany, Italy and Japan regarding the accession of Italy to the Anti-Comintern Pact represents a stage in the history of the defensive struggle of our nations against the international danger of communism, I express to Your Excellency my warmest congratulations together with my sincere wishes for the future of the allied German nation."

Telegram from the Führer to Mussolini

"On the day of Italy's accession to the Anti-Comintern Agreement, I cordially greet the Fascist Government as a member of the community of parties to the Agreement. I express my sincere pleasure that Italy is now formally united with Germany and Japan in joint defence against the subversive work of world Bolshevism which threatens their internal peace.

(Signed) Adolf Hitler."

Telegram from the Führer to the Japanese Prime Minister, Prince Konoye

"On the day of Italy's accession to the Anti-Comintern Agreement, I desire to express to Your Excellency my own sincere joy that the community of nations which have combined in defence against the subversive work of world Bolshevism which threatens their internal peace, has now been formally increased by a further member.

(Signed) Adolf Hitler."

III. ADOLF HITLER ON THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BERLIN-ROME-TOKIO AGREEMENT

From the appeal in the Bürgerbräukeller in Munich in remembrance of the events of November 9th, 1923.

"Germany is not isolated. We all can be happily confident that the isolation which we suffered for 15 years is over, and not as a result of say-nothing participation in unimportant assemblages of nations, but as a result of the importance which Germany has created for herself. As a result of this importance we have won new relations which cannot, perhaps, be regarded as fitting into the League of Nations ideology. However, they are suitable for us and for our interests. And they suit the interests of other nations which have entered into these relations with us.

The firmest guarantee for the permanence of such relations is not phrases of one kind or another, but the clear and sensible appreciation of their suitability for their purpose. This suitability has brought together three States. First a European axis and now a great worldpolitical triangle. I am convinced that the effort of our old opponents to spread unrest throughout the world will be made more difficult in the measure in which this triangle fortifies itself. For it consists not of three powerless images but of three States which are prepared and determined to protect decisively their rights and vital interests."

COLONIES AND RAW MATERIALS⁽¹⁾

The Position of the International Discussion.

I.

The Present-Day Importance of Space and Raw Materials

Speech by General Ritter von Epp, at the Swedish-German Association, Stockholm, October 21st, 1937

From the political point of view, one of the special features of our time is that efforts are considered necessary on every hand to safeguard the peace of the world, and in particular of Europe. In addition to a few scattered actions for laying the foundations of this peace, there are countless theoretical discussions which aim, or appear to aim, at the same object.

One of the predominant themes of this world-wide discussion is the "German colonial question"—an international debate on the German claim to the return of the German colonies and the claim to a definite reparation of the injustice of Versailles.

Why is this particular theme the central point of the public discussion, not only in countries which administer German overseas property in the form of mandates? Why does world public opinion react in this particular case with a flood of proposals for a solution, which, however, for the present only come from unofficial quarters?

How is it that even opinions averse to the return of the colonies to Germany are based on the admission that the issue is a "burning question" and "an important problem"?

The sole reason is that facts cannot be talked away, and that the definite or indefinite feeling of an existing serious disturbance of world equilibrium arising out of the spirit of Versailles results in a conscious or unconscious reaction. It is because conscience is aroused. There is something to justify or defend.

If Germany's colonial demand were merely an arbitrary demand, if it were merely a cover for an unjustified striving after power, world public opinion would not discuss the question as soon as it proved on closer examination to be a mere pretence.

* * *

From the biological point of view, Germany's colonial claim is based on the natural recognition that the possibilities of life of every nation lie primarily in the forces of its territory and secondarily in what the industry and knowledge of its people can draw from the potentialities of the soil. Industry and knowledge are in the long run valueless or of very restricted importance if they lack material for use, just as on the other hand the forces of the territory can only be rightly exploited by the industry and capacity of the people. From the geographical point of view, there is a nation living in the heart of Europe which, despite the greatest possible human effort, the maximum degree of achievement and the highest capacity, is not in a position to ensure the foundation of its existence from the resources within its territory.

There is a third factor, of psychological nature, due to natural causes, which has proved itself unconditionally and universally in history to be opposed to any permanent peace, namely that peaceful mutual relations and real unity cannot be created or permanently maintained as a result of superfluity obtained on the one side and distress imposed on the other side.

These are the factors around which the international discussion moves, with the desire, consciously or unconsciously, to recognise them or to reject them.

Since the beginning of the nineteenth century the population of Europe has been almost trebled. In an area which accommodated about 180 million people in 1800, there were 450 millions in 1914. The German population rose from about 20 millions in 1800 to 67.8 millions in 1914.

The trebling of the population in an area which remains unchanged is equivalent to a reduction by two-thirds of the potentialities or resources of the territory.

The demand for the return of our soil does not arise from the German desire for conquest, but is a consequence of a vital law of mankind, which acts in a similar manner on other nations according to their position.

In the case of Germany there is in addition her central position. While the great civilised nations of the west are situated round the great centre of Germany, they have almost all free access to the other parts of the globe. Germany has only the narrow passage through the British Channel.

On considering the factor of natural growth, we must bear in mind that the process does not stand still. Its progress changes according to the time, the period and the place. In the case of some nations it is constant, and in the case of healthy nations it is a governing factor. Statesmen must take account of it. It constitutes part of the new ideas.

The lack of resources of the soil could only be made up by the increased capacity of technical inventions and the mechanical industry. It is true that machines replaced enormous numbers of men; but on the other hand—I take the case of Germany—the machine placed the German people in a position to provide work and bread for the surplus population. But this again was only possible because the achievements of the mechanical system worked up quantities of raw materials of which only a small part was to be found in German territory. On the other hand it was not possible to dispose within the German frontiers of more than a small part of the products created or refined with the assistance of machinery. The raw materials had to be imported from other parts of the world and the products had to seek a market in other countries.

Such a process and the position to which it gave rise was only possible on the basis of world trade based primarily on the idea of a peaceful course of world policy, respect for private property and for business activity in the world. I shall have something to say later of the manner in which this basis was destroyed.

At the side of this development, Germany, by acquiring her colonies, obtained valuable tracts of land for the future nourishment of her people by the resources of her own territory; she extended the food potential of her territory.

The brief period of economic development work carried out by Germany in her colonies proves the existence of planned German action and displays a development unsurpassed by any colonial Power. Germany did not take the path of violent conquest, or of a policy of exploitation or overcropping. She worked according to a plan. This is proved by the capital investments, the construction of railways, telegraphs and other means of communication, the erection of buildings and cultural and social institutions. The total colonial trade increased eight times in volume from 1898 to 1913. In 1914 the Imperial grant amounted to only about a third of the actual revenue of the colonies and merely served to maintain the protectorate troops and the administration. All the other expenditure, such as the interest on the loans, the financing of traffic constructions etc. was already covered by the colonies themselves. At the beginning of 1914 the German colonies entered the stage of successful economic development.

Germany had laid the foundation for developing to a wide extent within the territories under her sovereignty resources which formed a necessary complement for the maintenance of her surplus population.

Then came the Versailles "Diktat", crude, stupid and mendacious. Germany's colonial territories were placed under foreign sovereignty and utilisation. And Germany was not only deprived of the necessary oversea reserves of space, but also of 13 % of her home space.

The colonial empire which, though comparatively small, was of great importance for Germany's future, came under the exploitation of nations and States which had not the slightest need of further colonial possessions. This is clear from the fact that they could not develop these territories at all because they were too busy elsewhere, but merely drew from them the profit obtainable according to their development at that time. For England and France this profit amounts approximately to a further 5 % to what they already draw from their colonies, and in the case of Belgium about 2.3 %.

It can be objectively proved by figures that our colonies under mandate, as compared with neighbouring territories of the mandatories enjoying the same climatic and other conditions in respect of production, have been promoted to a much less extent in respect of all raw materials and many other economic matters. The export figures (for instance for oil fruits and oil seeds from the Cameroons and Togoland as compared with the Congo and Nigeria) show clearly that the colonies have been more systematically developed than the mandated territories. (The same picture is shown by the export figures of building and other timber of the Cameroons as compared with French Equatorial Africa, and by the exports of cotton from German East Africa as compared with Kenya-Uganda.)

Germany was placed in a position of need by those who were themselves not in that position, so that only about two-thirds of the German population can live on the resources of their own territory, and that the other third can only live if the goods that are lacking are obtained elsewhere.

This is an indisputable fact.

At the present time a group of statesmen and politicians endeavour to put a construction on these historical and economic facts which aims, by means of artificial combinations and catch-words, at evading the possibly hard recognition of their own mistakes at Versailles and the clamour for revision.

The tactics of our opponents is to point out that the German colonies had a very small share of Germany's trade before the War, and that they are therefore of little importance to Germany at the present time.

The invalidity of such an argument becomes immediately clear when one considers not only the importance of our colonies before the War but the importance which they have gained in the last 25 years as a result of the economic and political methods of those who at present advance these arguments.

The disturbances of normal economic development caused by Versailles entirely reversed the pre-war position. Before the War, Germany had about 12,000 million Dollars invested throughout the world, and was able to use the yield of these investments to buy the raw materials which she required. The dictated Peace deprived Germany of her entire foreign capital. Before the War the raw material markets were completely free. International commercial relations were based on long-term commercial treaties. Since Versailles the opposite tendency has prevailed.

Of what significance is it for the present capacity of Germany's colonies that they did not represent a predominant item in German total trade before the War? Of what significance is this for their importance in view of the economic position created by Versailles?

In order to judge the value of colonies in general and of the German colonial possessions in particular, only the present figures and the present position are of importance.

What are these figures for Germany's colonies?

Taking into account the neglect of economic development by the mandatory administration to which I have already referred, the total exports of raw materials from the German colonial possessions in 1935 amount to about 159 million Marks. Experts working on the basis of exact particulars make the conservative calculation that in 8 or 10 years the exports can be raised to about 500 million Marks. This means that in a comparatively short space of time Germany could cover roughly 12% of her total imports from her colonies. The imports of tropical products in 1935 amounted to 731,720,000 Marks or 15.5 % of the total; the comparison shows that Germany could cover a very great part of her imports of tropical products from her own colonies without expending foreign currency.

Apart from the fact that our colonies have not been administered by us since 1914, figures relating to the present capacity of our colonial possessions are subject to the further consideration that the production cannot be influenced by the German market, and that there is therefore no relation between the increased requirements in the mother country and the colonial capacity of production.

The calculated colonial export of 500 million Marks a year must be considered not only in relation to these figures, but also from the point of view of the increase in value, i.e. the figure obtained by comparing the value of the raw material with the value of the product obtained or refined from the raw material. For instance, if half a kilo of raw cotton costs about 65 Pfennigs, the 10 pairs of stockings made from this quantity cost 10 Marks. Handwork, industry, transport and trade produce many times the value of the original raw material. It is of very special importance that this co-efficient is usually very high in the case of colonial products. For instance in the case of fuel it is about 2, cotton about 10, raw cocoa about 12 ½. It is extremely favourable in the case of almost all tropical oil seeds etc.

A further increase in the value of raw materials from a country's own colonies is obtained by re-export. Colonial raw materials, after being refined in the home country and re-exported, produce amounts of foreign exchange with which other raw materials can be obtained from other countries.

All these considerations demonstrate the value of one's own raw materials bought in one's own currency, and the importance of one's own economic territory overseas. But they also show the importance to be attached to deprecatory statements about the value of colonies in general.

A statesman (Mr. Eden, on September 20th) recently stated at Geneva that only 3 % of all raw materials come from colonies. In so far as such tactics have not been sufficiently dealt with by the above remarks, it must be pointed out—as was done by the Polish representative on that occasion—that at the present time not 3 % but 9.7 % of all raw materials on the world markets come from the colonies. This figure, moreover, takes no account of future possibilities of development nor of what a productive nation can obtain from the possibilities of space and material in its colonies.

The "Daily Express" of September 22nd gives the following comment from the pen of Lord Beaverbrook, who certainly cannot be charged with pro-German sentiments:

"... In support of his reasoning he said that the colonies only produced 3 % of the raw materials of the world.

That implies a condemnation of his own Government. For the British colonies alone could produce far more raw materials if they were properly developed by the Government..."

A further important contribution to the colonial debate is thought to consist in the objection that in 1912 in East Africa, "Germany's largest, finest, most populated and most valuable colony", there were only about 4000 Germans. This fact is used in an endeavour to make us understand that our colonies, in addition to their economic insignificance, were valueless as settlement territories.

These facts advanced by the other side are just as relevant or irrelevant as the fact that the entire British world empire, with its 443 million inhabitants, is inhabited by an insignificant number of British: the motherland 45 millions, the colonies 11 millions. It would hardly be possible to prove to the inventors of such arguments that the percentage of British in the British world empire amounts to half that of the 4000 Germans to which they refer in East Africa.

People live on the resources of the space which they inhabit—its soil, water and even air—that is what I call the space potential; in this connection the presence of people in one territory or another is of quite secondary importance. Great Britain lives on the resources of its Empire; Belgium feeds its surplus population from the space potential of the Congo, without thinking of sending its unemployed to Central Africa, although there are 266 inhabitants per square kilometre in the mother country, while in the Congo there is only 1 Belgian per 175 square kilometres and per 1000 natives. It is also quite clear that 137 persons per square kilometre cannot live on the resources of Germany's space, whereas in Sweden 15 persons have an approximately equal standard of living per square kilometre of comparatively equal if not better space potential.

The resources of the territory, or the space potential, form the core of the colonial question, as also of the raw material problem and the life of the nations in general.

* * *

For nations that do not possess sufficient resources within the frontiers of their own State, there are three solutions by which they can be extended: the acquisition of colonies, foreign trade, and the production of raw materials from their own soil by chemical and technical means.

The question of extending the territory in the continent of Europe does not come into consideration. Apart from the fact that it is not one of the peaceful solutions, it can, in view of the present position of the population of Europe and the distribution of living space in that continent, hardly lead to a real extension of space. A violent solution of this kind would be entirely based on a fundamental illusion. The frontiers would be changed, but the populations within them would remain the same. This is not the least lesson of Versailles.

The production of raw materials by chemical and technical means and mere foreign trade form only a conditional substitute for colonies, i.e. for the natural space potential. It is conditional on account of the onesidedness of such possibilities, which sooner or later always make the lack of natural resources felt.

It is true that no nation will claim to obtain everything that it needs for its economy from the resources of its own territory. No country alone possesses all the necessary raw materials. That is even true of Russia, of the United States and of the British Empire. But it is undoubtedly true that these countries are in an extremely favourable position in respect of their national supplies of raw materials, infinitely more favourable in any case than the Have-nots, who must consequently use every means of securing the basis of life within their own territory in other ways. This is especially true of a nation that, in comparison with the number, working capacity and standard of living of its population, is poorly equipped with such resources by nature and situation and encounters difficulties in the international exchange of commodities which not only impair its prosperity but may endanger the existence of the masses. No industrial country is in such an inferior position as Germany in this respect, but, in spite of this, very little comprehension is shown for her efforts to improve her position, although economic autarchy is constantly spreading on all sides and, after the experience with Italian sanctions, economic nationalisation has everywhere become a predominant tendency. But in proportion as the systems of autarchy and protection gain ground, the possibilities disappear of making up for the lack of resources by mere foreign trade; the greater the difficulties of obtaining raw materials, the greater are the efforts to produce them by chemical and technical means and the more urgent is the natural demand of the Have-nots for the return of their former colonial possessions which they acquired by peaceful and legal means.

* * *

The above facts call for a final reply to two further pretexts advanced against Germany's demand that the colonial question should be cleared up:

First, that the Have-nots, i.e. Germany, are in front of an "open door", of a "supply of raw materials open equally to all", and secondly that the raw material question is not a colonial question.

The "open door" proves on closer examination to be a carefully closed door. Since 1924 the most important countries of the world market have gone over to extreme protectionism. At the head of them, England by means of the inter-imperial economic system (Ottawa) has secured a very special preferential position on the great raw material markets. England has the least cause of all to speak of the free access of others to raw materials. The Customs preferences granted to a mass of British goods range from 5 to 40 %. Let us take a few examples at random from the long Customs list. Bermudas: import duty on motor cars 30 % ad valorem, for the United Kingdom only 10 %; Sierra Leone: import duty on shirts, boots, shoes, umbrellas 60 %, for the United Kingdom only 20 %; Solomon Islands: import duty on machinery 12 ½ % for the United Kingdom duty-free; Honduras: import duty on nails, nuts, wire, metal fencing 20 % ad valorem, for the United Kingdom 10 %; barbed wire and wire cloth 5 %, for the United Kingdom duty-free; essential and medicinal oils 30 %, for the United Kingdom 15 %; toys and games 25 %, for the United Kingdom 12 ½ %.

British Somaliland : Customs provisions : " Preference duties are the lowest rates charged on goods produced or manufactured in a part of the British Empire or coming therefrom . . . Goods shall not be regarded as manufactured in the British Empire unless at least 25 % or in special cases 50 to 75 % of their value is due to the cost of material grown or produced in a part of the British Empire or to work carried out in a part of the British Empire."

Fiji Islands : Import restrictions and prohibitions : " Colours and dyestuffs which are not the produce or manufacture of the British Empire ; all derivatives of coal tar, commonly known as intermediate products, which are used as dyestuffs . . . or which can be converted into dyestuffs or further worked . . . all oil colours, all vegetable colours and any other synthetic colours . . . "

Nigeria : Import prohibition for all cotton tissues and all kinds of artificial silk.

All these are goods for which Germany is especially dependent on export.

The effects of the restrictions on the acquisition of raw materials have also been passed over in silence in the international discussion. In the British Malay States and in British Nigeria there are discriminatory export duties on tin ore. These British export duties are not the only ones. In French Indo-China the Customs Tariff states : " Products exported from French Indo-China to France or to the French colonies are exempt from any export duty. Products exported to other foreign countries are subject to the export duty tariff."

Shipping between France and the colonies and other French oversea possessions may take place by ships of any flag, " but the transport of colonial products from ports of the colonies to France is reserved for the French flag."

Export duties exist in Italian, Spanish and Portuguese colonies.

From the above extracts from foreign laws and the examples given, it will be seen that, as a result of the most various special provisions, the colonial territories of the European Powers certainly do not present an open door. A glance at the import duties is sufficient to show how threadbare is the statement that the Have-nots only need to have sufficient foreign currency in order to have their share of colonial wealth. In the first place the compulsion of paying in foreign currency is in itself a burden ; in the second place, countries deprived of their former property have no other means of obtaining foreign means of payment than by the sale of goods. Foreign exchange for imports and other payments can only be obtained by exports. For such countries, goods have become the only real means of payment in world economy. But they cannot market their goods on account of prohibitive import duties.

The tremendous preponderance of imports from the colonial Powers into the colonies which they administer as compared with imports from other States is carefully passed over in silence. Imports from France into Morocco represent 43.7 % of the total, from Great Britain to Nigeria 55.2 %, from Belgium to the Congo 43.4 %. The part played by Germany at present as a supplier of the requirements of her colonial territories as compared with the former position is particularly illustrative. Take South West Africa and German East Africa as examples. The place which Germany occupied in the total imports and exports in 1912 has now been taken by the British Empire.

German South West Africa

	1912	1933
Supplying countries	Percentage of total imports
Germany	81.4	11.1
British Empire	13.2	77.7
Markets	Percentage of total exports
Germany	83.1	18.5
British Empire	1.1	64.1

German East Africa

Supplying countries	Percentage of total imports
Germany	51.3	10.2
British Empire	22.5	46.1
Markets	Percentage of total exports
Germany	56.7	11.8
British Empire	10.8	53.9

The above figures clearly show the predominant part of the British Empire in the total trade of the two mandated territories. Germany's share in her other African colonies shows an even smaller percentage.

But even if payment is made in foreign exchange there is no question at present of equal rights for all, as the political influence of the possessing Powers, even if not openly displayed, may make it quite impossible for potential opponents to obtain certain raw materials.

The alleged " open door " is proved by statistics to be a pure farce.

But there is a further proof.

The same authority that refers Germany to the " open door " and that repeats at every opportunity : " You can buy from us on the same conditions as ourselves ", and expressly adds : " Germany's raw material question is not a colonial question ", recently stated on the same occasion (Mr. Eden's speech at Geneva on September 20th, 1937) that it was prepared " to enter into negotiations with any Governments desiring a reduction of colonial preferences."

The protagonists or such contradictions are refuted in their own country. A memorandum by the British National Union of Manufacturers expresses itself unequivocally against any sacrifice of the Empire preferential system and states that the offer made is not calculated " to satisfy a country whose object it is to regain its lost colonies."

* * *

Such jugglery and attempts at diversion do not change the facts nor the effects of these facts on the life of the German people. They are, moreover, only used in order to maintain the Versailles " Diktat " unchanged in this sphere.

As against this, Germany's demand that the exceptional position should be removed and that her indispensable property should be returned to her rests on a sound basis. It is legally and materially based not only on the principles of the natural right to life, but also on the previous history of the so-called Treaty and its contents.

The claim is not inequitable and not exaggerated. Germany does not desire to take away any of the property of other nations, but she desires the return merely of the part of the overseas territory that belongs to her ; she formerly acquired it in a legal manner and now absolutely requires it for her economic life. The Leader and Chancellor, Adolf Hitler, made this perfectly clear at the last Party Congress at Nuremberg.

I should like to conclude my remarks on space and economy in connection with the colonial question with the reflection that an improvement in the economic position of Germany would help the recovery of world trade. Just as it is impossible in the long run to deprive a highly developed people of 68 millions one-sidedly of their right to live, it is equally impossible to exclude an intensive economic territory in the heart of Europe from the economic process and cultural activity—in short from a world that has become so small. This is contrary to commercial common sense.

From what force is the decision to come in this critical question which is of such importance for the future of Europe ? We in Germany and many thinking people throughout the civilised world count on the forces of common sense which are making constant headway and on the disappearance of the psychosis arising out of and created for the War. The statesmen and leading politicians will also abandon the idea that nations can arbitrarily or as a punishment be deprived of their necessary living space and that these nations will submit to such a position patiently and unresistingly, just as in another sphere the opinion will also be abandoned that parts of a growing nationality can be torn away and placed under the sovereignty of other foreign nations without permanently endangering peace between the nations. When these old-fashioned ideas have been removed, the remaining fragments of the devastating Versailles "Diktat" will fall, and a new idea will bring about a new settlement of the present intolerable position—an idea that takes account of the right to live and the moral factors of the nations.

I imagine this will take place as follows. Just as the doctrine of human rights, i.e. the rights of the individual, governed the internal politics of the nineteenth century, the doctrine of the vital right of the national individualities will assume a leading role in the foreign policy of the twentieth century. This will be a logical continuation, for the individual needs the force of his nation in order to protect and satisfy his claim to life.

I even go further and think that the western nations, at any rate of the European continent, which form a cultural community dating back over a thousand years, have every reason to suspend the constant struggle with each other to extend their territory or improve their standard of living, because thereby they seriously jeopardise their predominant position in the world. There are signs of this on the political horizon. The consequence of this view would be that the white nations which have themselves enough living space in the world should not prevent those who do not possess such space from obtaining it wherever it exists in a free and unused state in the world. Colonies today mean a basis of life which is not in direct connection with the mother country. It is of no importance how far the road is to that aim if the other countries do not block the road.

II.

The Treatment of the Raw Material Problem by the League of Nations

A Critical Review of the Report of the Raw Material Committee of September 8th, 1937 and of the Discussion on the Subject in the Eighteenth Assembly of the League

The Raw Material Committee of the League of Nations, the first development of whose work we reviewed in our May/July issue, No. 192/206 (page 87), a special number on the problem of "Colonies and Raw Materials", has published in document A. 27 1937 II.B an examination of complaints and difficulties experienced with regard to the supply and to the acquisition of and payment for, raw materials. Annexed to this publication were 1. a memorandum by Professor Ivar Högbom on the development of world production of raw materials and 2. a memorandum by two members of the Committee on the improvement of regulation schemes.

During the discussion in the Assembly and Second Committee, the representatives in particular of the colonial countries, England and France, spoke in favour of this report. As we observed in our No. 2 of October 15th, the report was subject rather to a political interpretation and stress was laid on the statement in the introduction to the effect that colonial territories only produce three percent of the raw materials of the world; inter alia, this caused Mr. Eden, the British Foreign Secretary to state in the Assembly on September 20th that the raw material problem was not primarily or even essentially a colonial problem; the French delegate M. Faure also used this argument in the Second Committee. We will revert later to the value of these statements.

We may state immediately that, as a result of the inquiry, the report reaches the conclusions (page 30) that certain difficulties in regard to supply exist, but none of them is insuperable. The difficulties in regard to payment vastly transcend in importance those in regard to supply and "the Committee would be failing in its duty if it held out any hope of an easy solution of them". It states further that there is doubtless an inequality in the distribution of raw materials and that certain countries have particularly serious difficulties in supplying their requirements. The report mentions certain measures for alleviating these difficulties, but the only general and permanent solution of the problem of commercial access to raw materials is to be found in a restoration of international exchanges on the widest basis. The formation of such a solution, which would involve political, financial and economic factors, is, it states, far beyond the competence of the Committee, but, in the interest of a practical result, it suggests that the report should be referred to the Financial and Economic Committees of the League.

It will be seen from these general conclusions, which occupy 25 lines in the report, that the Raw Material Committee showed an amount of caution which, if it were not borne in mind that various influences are always observable in League reports, would almost seem to be exaggerated.

1. Qualifying Statements.

Whether this caution is to be regarded as reserve is a matter of opinion. Generally introductions to reports give an opportunity of expressing tendencies which are not always identical with the conclusions, but provide the framework within which the conclusions are shown up. We have already referred to the statement in the introduction regarding the notorious "three percent". The limitation contained in the report on this point is however passed over in silence by those who used this argument. The report says: "It should not, however, be concluded from these figures that the importance of colonies, as sources of raw materials, can be neglected. The importance of a particular material is not indicated by its aggregate weight or value in international trade, but consists in the greater or less degree of indispensability which it possesses for the industry of the consuming countries."

The introduction to the report points out that the raw material problem has two aspects: difficulties of the consumers and difficulties of the producers. In the depth of the depression a few years ago, the question was how to save the producers of raw materials from ruin in view of the heavy drop in prices.

Another statement in the introduction, which may be considered to have a qualifying effect, is to be found on page 9. It is to the effect that public opinion is easily led to suppose that the existence of raw materials in a particular territory means that they are available for economic exploitation. In this connection reference is made to two diagrams in Professor Högbom's memorandum indicating the limits of economic exploitation. For many forms of raw materials, it states, the potential production, for instance of the interior of Africa, is not always commercially accessible. In some countries, considerations of economic profit may lead them to accept certain burdens in this connection.

In another place—and this may also be considered as a qualifying statement—the introduction opposes the view of a part of public opinion that the raw material problem is purely a colonial problem; there are, it says, only three typical colonial raw materials: palm oil, rubber and copra.

It will be seen from these qualifying remarks in the introduction that, in view of certain political aspirations of have-nots, some conclusions have been picked out and that a preface appears to be more important than the conclusions.

2. Lack of objectivity.

Reference may be made to one part of the report which is certainly not governed by objective considerations. According to the terms of reference, under which the Committee had to work in the sense of the Assembly resolution of October 9th, 1936, political interpretation and views were excluded from its work. The introduction states, inter alia, that it was not the Committee's function to discuss the distribution of the territories from which raw materials were drawn or the question of restricting raw material supplies in order to discourage aggression. It is therefore surprising that, in the most important place in the report, on page 30, immediately after the conclusions, there should be a declaration by M. Rosenblum which compromises the entire value of the report. This Soviet Russian declaration expressed the view that the Committee had not shown sufficiently clearly how the problem of raw materials was affected by present-day conditions. The difficulties connected with the supply of raw materials were disclosed mainly in the financial distress of certain industrial States which was due mainly to their armaments policy, their ambitions and aggressive acts. Financial assistance for countries lacking in raw materials which was recommended in the report should only be granted if these countries could prove that the credits would not be used for purposes detrimental to the peace of the world. At the present time, the attention of the Assembly should be drawn to the fact that raw materials were being used by certain States for aggressive and warlike purposes.

One wonders what such a declaration, the only one which appears in the report, and that as a conclusion, has to do with the report.

3. Barriers to the access to raw materials.

What is the result of the Committee's inquiry into the difficulties experienced with regard to the supply of and payment for raw materials? In the first place, there is an obvious contradiction between the result of the experts' work and the conclusions. This contradiction lies in the fact that it cannot be concluded from the indication of obstacles in the report that there are ways and means of finding a practical solution.

As regards the supply of raw materials, the report makes the following statements:

1. In order to safeguard the supply of food, some countries temporarily prohibit the export of wheat, vegetable oils and other foodstuffs. 2. There are cases where export prohibitions and restrictions have been placed on industrial raw materials with the object of retaining them for the use of domestic industry or of economising the natural resources of a country. 3. Export prohibitions in order to preserve a monopoly. 4. Export prohibitions and restrictions on raw materials with the object, in the case of colonial territories, of preserving for the mother country the right to apply some form of processing to the raw material. 5. It is an essential part of almost all international regulation schemes relating to the supply of raw materials that the export of the regulated commodity is restricted by the Governments of the participating countries. 6. Apart from international regulation schemes, certain countries attempt to regulate the trade in commodities of which they are either the principal or very important producers.

The report brings out the scope of these prohibitions and states that serious objections can be taken to prohibitions and restrictions which are designed to apply pressure on other countries, to preserve uneconomic industries or to maintain an artificial level of prices, by arbitrarily raising or lowering the supply on the market or by maintaining monopolies.

The report then goes on to discuss export duties, which, it says, are used as a form of restriction on export in order either to reserve raw materials for domestic industry or to protect a domestic processing industry. It then refers to export duties imposed in the mother country and in the colonies for purely revenue purposes. Lastly, it mentions export duties which are discriminatory in character. Different duties, it states, are imposed on export goods to foreign countries, or lower duties are charged on goods exported from a colonial territory to the mother country than on those exported from that territory to other countries.

The finding of the report in this connection seems to us to be remarkable; the Committee has no knowledge of any complaint in sufficiently precise terms to enable it to determine whether any real discrimination is involved.

The report thus gives a formidable list. International conferences have been unable to put an end to these obstacles. Moreover no one has ever had any hope that these duties, prohibitions and restrictions could ever disappear; they are too firmly rooted in the sphere of interest of certain richly endowed States and Empires and form a component part of the economic defence organisation of such countries; it is reserved for League organs to speak of the hope of improving these conditions.

4. The bar before the "open door".

In view of the terms of reference received by the Raw Material Committee from the Assembly ("the time has now arrived when discussion of, and enquiry into, the question of equal commercial access for all nations to certain raw materials might usefully be undertaken"), section III of the report deals with questions relating to the development of natural resources—a subject which was described in the interim report as "the régime of concessions".

There are some very just statements in this section, but they are of no practical use because recommendations to which they might lead are sought for in vain.

After pointing out that economic advancement depends to a large degree on a progressive development of natural resources, the report continues:

"But this progress has not been uniform; while some countries command natural resources in excess of their needs; others are less favoured; moreover, in some of these latter the population is still steadily increasing. The Committee has not found it within its competence to discuss population questions as such, nor the question of the adjustment of population to geographical and economic conditions and industrial changes. For countries with rapidly increasing population, however, one solution of the resulting difficulties can be found in industrialisation, especially when international migration is at a standstill. Since, however, this industrialisation can only be built upon a basis of imported raw materials, it is of vital concern to these countries that they should be assured of unrestricted supplies of raw materials and of a market for their increased output.

Such supplies can normally be obtained by purchase from abroad; but, in making payment, some countries encounter difficulties, which are examined in another part of the present report, owing to a shortage of foreign exchange. They would experience less difficulty if they could take part in the development of sources of supply in foreign countries."

Up to this point there can be no objection to the statements of the report, though in accordance with the "terms of reference" the question of a transfer of sovereignty over such sources of raw materials is not mentioned. But the conclusion that is drawn shows that it is intended to treat the raw material problem only within the general complex of economic questions and independently of them. But, after the above quotation, the report continues: Nevertheless, it should be borne in mind that the development of new sources of supply requires, in the initial stages, an investment of capital which may, for a considerable period, be unremunerative. Such development, involving at least some expenditure in foreign exchange, may therefore involve a greater demand on financial resources than direct purchase from existing sources of supply. This wise remark might be called naive, if it was not a case of theoretical discussions. For the advantages of direct exploitation and the investment of capital are obvious as compared in the long run with purchase, even if—and there is no question in the report of anything else—such direct development of raw materials takes place on foreign soil. The advantages of one's own methods of work and one's own means of transport and the primary interest of the exploiting party in the direction of rational organisation need merely be borne in mind in order to make up for the apparently cheaper price of direct purchase. Though it is a matter of importance that in the initial stage the investment of capital remains unremunerative for a comparatively lengthy period, that has never prevented any enterprise in the world from taking the risk with a view to future profits. The report or its authors have quite overlooked the fact that risk has always been the main driving force and soul of economic work and individual initiative, and that in any case countries lacking raw materials are less afraid of such a risk than of the constant anxiety that their sources may at any moment be exhausted as a result of innumerable fortuitous circumstances and currents of interests; it may be that the sovereign State has impaired international relations with the foreign exploiting party in a totally different sphere and is applying reprisals, or that the exploiting party who is graciously permitted to extract the resources from the soil of the foreign country is deprived of his rights at the moment when his work has reached the profitable stage. At the same time such a proposal by the League is not only inadequate, but an attempt is even made to frighten countries lacking in raw materials from investing capital for the development of raw materials in foreign countries. If such development work is to function normally in the international interest, after the right of the countries lacking in raw materials has been recognised and after it has even been recommended that they should themselves develop such materials, it can only be a question of transferring territories to the sovereignty of such countries.

In reply to the endeavour of certain members of the Committee to find means for removing the obstacles which, in certain overseas territories rich in raw materials, stand in the way of the establishment of firms and finance undertakings, the report states: "It should be recognised that the Governments of countries which are important suppliers, actual or potential, of raw materials have a responsibility not unreasonably to hamper the development of their raw materials. Their legislation on this subject should not be framed in such a way as to protect their own interests only, but should also take into account the interdependence of all countries."

* * *

The report goes on to state that the position in sovereign countries and that in colonial territories must be discussed separately. It considers that it may be necessary—for economic, social and political reasons—for Governments to reserve certain forms of enterprise entirely to their own nationals and that they should have a right of control over the development of their natural resources by foreigners. Harmful results might follow from a sudden influx of foreign capital or from a mass immigration movement upon the existing organisation of a country. This also applies to colonial territories, where such control should be exercised by the Governments in order to safeguard the interests of the native populations. The colonial Powers, it states, have frequently stressed these social obligations.

The report then points out that Governments which control colonial territories are in a position to secure special privileges in the colonial territory for nationals of the mother country which may be withheld from other nationals. Experience shows, it states, that even where such privileges do not exist the mother country normally enjoys a predominant position, being favoured by all the links binding them to one another, and especially a common language, long-established commercial and financial relations and cultural affinities. It has been stated, according to the report, that even where there is no formal discrimination, advantages are sometimes secured for the nationals of the mother country by deliberate policy or administrative action. In these circumstances, the Committee recommends a progressive modification of this state of affairs in a more liberal direction; it also recommends that the Governments concerned should be invited to consider the possibility of taking action in this direction. Apart from the question of discrimination, it was pointed out to the Committee that certain countries were anxious to take part in the development of natural resources of colonial territories which were not yet exploited. Some members of the Committee expressed the hope that nationals of countries poor in raw materials of colonial origin might be given direct access to natural resources by means of concessions for which their own capital or labour could be used. They also suggested that the régime of the "open door" which prevailed in the Congo Basin by virtue of the treaties and in territories under A and B mandates should be extended. The next paragraph of the report states that these proposals are not designed to alter the political status of colonial territories or to convert them into mandated territories. Certain members referred, however, to the possibility of an international convention in order to open up direct access to raw materials. Other members, however, pointed out that the Governments controlling such territories could not be invited to assume international obligations which might conflict with their duties to the local inhabitants.

* * *

Our above statement that development under foreign sovereignty offers innumerable disadvantages is proved by the further mountain of obstacles to which the report itself refers. This is clear merely from the desire of the Governments "to reserve certain forms of enterprise entirely to nationals of the country" and also to reserve "the right to exercise a measure of control over the development of their resources by foreigners". This involves discriminatory treatment—a fact which the report does not conceal—and it merely requests the Governments to adopt a more liberal policy. This is slight consolation. Apart from the primary advantages which a sovereign State guarantees to its nationals by all kinds of links, stress is also laid on the privileges for a territory which in practice is only handed over to foreigners if it is of no interest whatever to the nationals, especially if these foreigners by reason of their industry make anything out of the valueless object. Do not these privileges of the sovereign State contain an incitement to what has already been done, in a less legal manner, with the German colonies? At the moment when these colonies reached the stage when they became profitable, the work done by innumerable German farmers with such heavy sacrifice for over twenty years was destroyed and expropriated—destroyed when it meant competition, and expropriated when it gave an easy profit.

* * *

At the end of the part on the subject of complaints and difficulties in respect of the supply of raw materials, the report deals with international schemes for regulating the production and sale of raw materials and the question of monopolies. The former series of questions, which is clearly separated from the monopolistic form, obviously appears to be favourable in the report. The plans established by the Governments, it states, have generally been an important factor in the improvement in economic conditions in producing countries during the depression. The conclusion to this section points out that every such scheme should make adequate provision for effective representation of consumers and should be subject to the supervision of the Government which could take immediate action in the event of an unreasonable rise of prices or other effects prejudicial to the consumers. This conclusion is no doubt due to the critics who referred to the unjust policy of the formation of stocks in the interest of a price policy as carried out by the cartels, so that it might be concluded that there was no essential difference between these planned regulation systems and monopolies. As regards monopolies, various forms are merely enumerated, and the report draws special attention to natural monopolies for the production of certain raw materials, such as helium gas (United States), jute (India), cinchona bark (Netherlands Indies) and camphor (Japan). It is undeniable, the report states, that such monopolies may give rise to apprehensions in consuming countries, but these fears should not be exaggerated; such monopolies are very rare and the monopoly price cannot rise above a certain level.
